CHAPTER I.

WILLIAM AND MARY.

[1689 to 1691.]

Accession of William—The Convention converted into a Parliament—Discontents in Scotland—James arrives in Ireland—Siege of Londonderry—Battle of the Boyne—Inglorious Conflict between the English and French fleets—Exploits of Marlborough in Ireland—Conspiracies in London—Proceedings of Ginckle in Ireland—Affairs abroad—Cruel treatment of Macdonald.

THE flight of James, and the establishment of William on the throne of England, impress the reflecting reader with admiration and gratitude for the dispensations of that providence, which converts even the vices and infirmities of individuals to the purposes of general felicity, and deduces from a train of circumstances, apparently unpropitious to the wishes of the good, and to the progress of national happiness and freedom, the most important and most favourable results. It is to that very intemperance of spirit and that bigotry of principle which threatened our religion with continued persecution, and our liberties with extinction, that we are indebted for the establishment of our constitution on a durable basis, and for the perfect and rational enjoyment of our rights as members of one great and free community.

WILLIAM began his reign by issuing a proclamation, continuing in office all protestants who had been in place on the first of the preceding December; and on the 17th of the month he formed a privy council, consisting chiefly of such persons as had been most active in raising him to the throne. To facilitate the introduction of his friends, the several boards and the chancery itself were put into commission. The earl of Nottingham, who had so violently opposed the elevation of William, and the earl of Shrewsbury, who had adhered to his views, were made secretaries of state. The marquis of Halifax and the earl of Danby, though rivals in policy, were admitted into the cabinet; the former as lord privy seal, the latter as president of the council. Among the Dutch friends of William, Bentinck his favourite was made privy purse, groom of the stole, and privy counsellor; Auverquerque was appointed master of the horse; Zuylistein received the office of master of the robes, and Schomberg was placed at the head of the ordnance. Burnet, who had contributed by his intrigues to the success of William's designs, was nominated, in spite of the opposition of Sancroft archbishop of Canterbury, to the diocese of Salisbury. The whigs were selected as the peculiar objects of favour and preferment; an indication of partiality which excited in the breasts of the opposite party the most uncontrolable feelings of resentment and suspicion.

The privy council, having determined that the present convention might be legally converted into a parliament, the king went in procession to the house of peers, with the usual state of a sovereign; and in a speech to the two houses from the throne, expressed his sensibility to their kindness, recommended to their care the perilous situation of Holland, descanted upon the necessity of a well-defined and stable settlement at home, and represented the dangers which threatened Ireland. He observed that it rested with them alone to adopt those measures, which promised the most effectually to preclude delays, and to attain that first and greatest object of their anxiety and his own, the prosperity and happiness of the nation.

A bill was immediately brought in to prevent all questions and disputes concerning the assembling and sitting of the existing parliament; it was read twice, unimpeded by formal opposition, and passed the next day. In a committee, however, of their whole house, the commons were agitated by a violent debate, whether a king, elected by coming to and consulting with the lords and commons, did not constitute as complete a parliament, as if such king had ordered new elections to be made by writs. Afraid of the inconvenience of re-elections, and convinced of the necessity of expedition, the majority of the house decided the question in the affirmative, but on the bill which had been passed by the house of lords being brought down to the commons, it experienced considerable opposition. Its opponents having declared in the course of the debate, that they would give no countenance, by taking their seats, to an illegal parliament, and influenced by a real conviction, that the formation of the parliament was inconsistent with constitutional principles, or by a secret wish to evade the oaths of allegiance to their new sovereign, they retired into the country.

Having determined that the revenue of the late king expired with his power, and after many indications of a disposition to withhold the grant of a permanent establishment, so long as their reluctance might lead their sovereign to concessions, which they had neglected to demand, at a more propitious opportunity, they resolved, that the propriety of granting a revenue to the king and queen, should be taken into consideration. In the midst of their discussions, a message was received from the king, in which he acquainted the house, that Ireland was threatened with an invasion conducted by the late monarch, and four hundred and twenty thousand pounds were therefore voted to be levied by a monthly assessment; a sum as inadequate to the service of the kingdom, as beneath the expectations of William.

The party averse to the government of the new monarch, who rejected the notion of a king de facto, and all other distinctions and limitations, who contended for the absolute power, and the hereditary and indefeasible right of sovereigns, and were denominated Nonjurors, had already engaged in secret intrigues, or open hostilities against the stability of government. Notwithstanding the complacency of the commons, who waited upon him in a body with an offer of their lives and fortunes, and the suspension at his request of the act of habeas corpus, the situation of William was neither secure nor enviable. His prejudices in favour of the Calvinists, excited the jealousy and the resentment of the people, and the secret or open opposition of the most powerful members of the church, the senate and the bar. He was foiled in his endeavour to abolish the sacramental test; and his declaration on the 16th of March, in the house of lords, that he was anxious to admit all protestants into the public service, exasperated the adherents of the church, and awakened the vigilance of its legislative advocates. To that part of the oath in which the king swears to maintain the protestant religion, the church party subjoined the words, "as established by law;" an artifice which appeared to exclude the dissenters from his protection, and which equally offended the king and disconcerted the ministry.

PERCEIVING the discontents of the army, William resolved to transport to Holland the regiments whose spirit appeared most dangerous. The states had demanded their own troops, but the king was not willing to part with soldiers on whose fidelity he could rely; and the royal Scotch regiment of horse, with Dumbarton's regiment of foot, the command of which had been conferred on count Schomberg, were ordered to Ipswich to embark for Holland, in order to replace the Dutch battalions, that William determined to keep in England. The horse having almost totally deserted, they were followed in a body by five hundred foot, headed by five captains, and directed their march in triumph towards Scotland. William, after sending a message on the subject to the two houses, dispatched under the command of Ginckle three regiments of Dutch dragoons, in pursuit of the deserters. Discouraged by the treachery or cowardice of other troops, who had promised to support them, the mutineers surrendered to Ginckle at discretion. They were brought back with every mark of disgrace, and as an appropriate punishment, sent to Holland according to their former destination.

AFTER vainly exerting his regal influence, to oppose the progress of the bill respecting the coronation oath, in which it was prescribed, that the monarch should swear to maintain the protestant religion, as established by law, a clause which, as I have before observed, was apparently introduced with the intention of excluding the dissenters from his protection; his attention was diverted from objects of more immediate anxiety, by the fortunate concurrence of events in Scotland. Notwithstanding the lenity and moderation which had characterised the conduct of James towards the Scottish people, the injudicious choice of his servants had excited their jealousy, and enflamed their prejudices. The declarations of the prince of Orange were circulated by means of Scottish refugees, who, influenced by the expedience of paying court to a prince apparently destined to ascend the English throne, had taken up their residence in Holland: the religious tenets of the king, who was an enthusiastic Calvinist, extended his popularity throughout every rank of the Scottish nation; and the persons who composed the regency, already hated and despised, were weakened by reciprocal quarrels. The marquis of Athol assembled the council, and proposed a warm address to the prince of Orange, which was rejected for one more moderate. Disappointed in his expectations, he repaired to London, where the progress of political events was so prosperous as to satisfy the most sanguine expectations. Thirty peers, and near eighty gentlemen, formed themselves into a convention. The prince of Orange requested their advice; and after some confusion, occasioned by the earl of Arran, son to the duke of Hamilton, the president of the convention, who proposed that they should invite back the late king, the meeting waited upon William in a body, and requested him to take into his hands the administration of the affairs of Scotland.

THE duke of Gordon, a Roman catholic, still held the castle of Edinburgh for the king, but being a person of timid character, they hoped to terrify him into a surrender of that fortress. The duke of Hamilton having been re-elected as president of the convention, in opposition to the marquis of Athol, the first business of the convention was to summon the duke of Gordon to quit the castle in twenty-four hours. The duke yielding to his fears, promised to obey, but was afterwards persuaded to evade his engagements, by demanding terms which could not with decency be granted. After summoning him to surrender by the heralds at arms, in all their formalities, he was formally proclaimed a traitor at the market cross of Edinburgh.

ON the day after this proclamation, two letters were received at the same time from the abdicated monarch and from William, the one expressed with good sense and moderation, the other more characteristic of passion than of prudence. The bearer of James's letter, Crane an Englishman, after being consigned for a short time to proper custody, was dismissed with a pass instead of an answer. The relation of the various contentions in which the partisans of William and James struggled for success, belongs so peculiarly to the history of Scotland, that I shall confine my attention to those important measures and events which bear most directly on the ultimate result of these internal commotions. The committee appointed by the convention agreed that James, by his misconduct, had forfeited his right to the crown; and having afterwards drawn up an act, by which the claims of William and Mary to the vacant throne were established, the king and queen were on the eleventh of April proclaimed at Edinburgh.

The castle of Edinburgh was still retained in the name of James, by the duke of Gordon; but despairing of relief, and pressed by a siege, he surrendered the place on the thirteenth of June. The adherents of James, alarmed and dismayed by so unexpected a misfortune, turned their eyes to the viscount Dundee, a nobleman who, having been urged in vain to return to the convention, was publicly proclaimed a fugitive, an outlaw, and a rebel. Driven by his enemies, he sought refuge in the Grampian mountains; and being afterwards joined at Gordon castle by fifty gentlemen, he passed through the county of Murray to Inverness, before which town Macdonald of Keppoch was encamped, with seven hundred men. By pledging himself to the magistrates of Inverness, for the money extorted by Macdonald, he induced the latter to join his arms; and after many marches and counter-marches, and being frequently misled by false intelligence, he re-occupied the station of Lochaber, two hundred only of his force remaining in the field. His fate was decided by the battle at Killikranky, between the miserable force he was afterwards able to collect, and the troops of William, under the command of Mackay. As he was raising his arm, and pointing to the Camerons to advance, he received a ball in his side. He survived the battle, but died the next morning at Blair.

The perverse and unadvised policy, by which James had lost the dominion of England and Scotland, had been carried to excesses still more alarming in the management of the affairs of Ireland. The earl of Tyrconnel, who had obtained by corrupt means the favour of Sunderland, a man of profligate habits, and a bigotted Roman catholic, was raised in the year 1687 to the government of that kingdom. His abuses of power were frequent and infamous; and the earl of Castlemain, who had fixed his views on the government of Ireland, found means to convey the mismanagements of the lord deputy to the king, and proposing to call a parliament, which should be servilely devoted to government, transmitted to England the outlines of a bill, which, under the pretext of relieving a few distressed and injured papists, should artfully destroy the whole settlement of the kingdom. Though James received the proposal with complacency, he decided against it on future consultation; and the Irish commissioners, being dismissed with contempt, were hooted from the English metropolis.

On the accession of William to the crown of England, aware that, should Ireland submit to his dominion without resistance, no pretence would remain for keeping an army in pay, he listened with coolness to the overtures of Tyrconnel, who, offended by his indifference, and Londonderry having shut its walls against the new-raised troops of the king, dispatched lord Mountjoy, a protestant, to reduce the refractory city. The inhabitants, regarding him as a friend, admitted him upon conditions, and he assumed the command with a secret determination to assist the cause of William.

The whole force of the expedition, with which James, adventured to attempt the preservation of Ireland, amounted to fourteen ships of war, six frigates, and three fire-ships. His force amounted to one hundred French officers, and twelve hundred of his native subjects in the pay of Lewis. After leaving Kinsale in a state of tolerable defence; after placing in that fortress the arms, money, and ammunition he had brought from France, James advanced to Cork, where he was joined by Tyrconnel. Having summoned a parliament to meet at Dublin on the seventh of May, he received an address from the protestant clergy, representing their grievances; and from the university of Dublin a statement of complaints, and congratulations. In the appearance of prosperity, however, he was involved in the utmost distress. He was totally destitute of every implement of war; and having been joined, since his arrival, by several thousands of an unarmed and indigent rabble, he retained out of the number only fourteen regiments of horse and dragoons, and thirty-five regiments of foot. On the eighth of April he left Dublin. The protestant insurgents retired on his approach to Derry and the other side of the river Finn, where they defied the unarmed and undisciplined rabble by whom they were pursued. A passage, however, to Cladiford was effected by Hamilton, Pusignian, and Berwick, in the face of six thousand of their enemies, the insurgents having determined to reserve their efforts for the defence of Derry. Through the mismanagement of Rosen, to whom the attack upon this place had been entrusted, the intended capitulation of the city was delayed till the arrival of two English regiments, under the command of colonels Cunnyngham and Richards. Lundy, who commanded in the place, was swayed by treachery or fear. Without permitting the men to land, he ordered the officers to hold a council of war, who agreed that the town was untenable. Their resolutions were communicated to the magistrates, and they resolved to offer terms to the king. The English regiments prepared to return; the populace were alarmed; the governor and magistrates lost all their authority, in the violence and clamour of the crowd. Some desperate persons flew to the walls, and turned the cannon against the enemy. Walker, a clergyman, and one major Baker, were elected governors. Their whole force consisted of seven thousand and fifty men, and three hundred and fifty officers, with which they determined to defend the town to the last extremity.

But the chief defence of the people of Londonderry, consisted in the weakness and destitution of their enemies. Unprovided with battering cannon, and almost unsupplied with musquets, they formed a blockade rather than a siege. The insurgents had to contend with no enemy but famine; though, impatient of inactivity, they made a sally on the day after the king's departure, and were only repulsed after the death of Maumont, to whom the command of the besieging army had been entrusted, and after a resolute and formidable struggle.

The hopes of James rested upon the scarcity of provisions, which threatened to create a famine in the town. Upon the arrival, however, of some artillery in the Irish camp, the blockade was converted into a siege, but the works of the besiegers were destroyed in a sally. The latter possessed neither the means nor the skill adapted for attack. A force sent from England appeared in the lake of Londonderry on the thirteenth of June; but Kirk, who commanded the succours was either too cold or too cautious in his operations. Though he assured the spirits of the townsmen, by promises of speedy relief, he avoided every hazardous enterprise, and for five weeks remained inactive in his ships, or loitered on an island in the lake. Apprised of the arrival of the English, the mareschal de Rosen was sent by James to command before Derry. Rosen committed the care of the siege to Hamilton, and posted himself on the banks of the lake, to prevent a descent from the English fleet. From the deficiency of warlike stores and ammunition, the siege proceeded but slowly; and the only hope of the besiegers rested on the apparent impossibility of conveying provisions into the town. On the 29th of June, the town proposed to surrender, but the firing of the besieged was continued, and Rosen rejected the overture as a stratagem for gaining time.

Rosen, incensed at so determined and unexpected a resistance, placed four thousand unfortunate persons, collected from the surrounding country, between his lines and the town; expecting that the besieged would relieve their friends, or surrender themselves. Convinced, however, by the conduct of the townsmen, who fired upon their friends from the wall, of the folly of his expedient, he withdrew the unhappy people, after a few hours' exposure, and permitted them to return to their homes. The cruelty of Rosen on this occasion, and his obvious disregard of the commands and wishes of James, awakened the just indignation of the latter; but such was his dependence on the aid of France, that he durst not indicate his displeasure, by depriving him of his command. Desertion and sickness had now reduced the besieging army to five thousand men, destitute of every necessary, and equally deficient in discipline and enthusiasm. The siege was again converted into a blockade; the besieged were reduced to the last distress, and were obliged to subsist on the flesh of horses and dogs. At length the serjeants and soldiers, disregarding their leaders, transmitted a signed paper to major-general Buchan, offering on certain conditions to surrender the next day. In the mean time, the wind became favourable for the ships; two victuallers, advancing in full sail, broke the boom which the Irish had placed across the river; the town was supplied with provisions; and Rosen, having made every disposition for a retreat, retired.

While Rosen was conducting the siege of Londonderry, lord Mount Cashel advanced against the protestants of Inniskillen; and, after making an unsuccessful attempt on Crom castle, resolved to retreat to his former station at Belturbat; but being pursued as far as Newton, and forsaken by his men, he was overpowered and taken prisoner.

Afflicted and dismayed by this humiliating intelligence, aware that the individuals surrounding him, and particularly De Rosen, were prepared to render him a sacrifice to the real or supposed interests of Lewis, and unwilling to recal the parliament, which he had prorogued to the eighteenth of July; the distress of James was exasperated, and his difficulties multiplied by the invasion of Ireland by a foreign force. Ten thousand men, commanded by the duke of Schomberg, appeared on the twelfth of August in ninety transports, on the coast of Donaghadee. He first marched to Belfast, and then invested Carrickfergus. Having summoned the garrison in vain, he opened four batteries against the town, attacked it with the guns of the fleet, and commenced a furious bombardment. The garrison, after all their ammunition was expended, marched out on the ninth day, with all the honours of war: but the soldiers broke the capitulation: they disarmed and stript the inhabitants, without any regard to sex or rank; women deprived of their apparel were whipped between the lines; and every outrage perpetrated that could disgrace humanity.

The duke of Berwick, having broken up the roads to retard the enemy, abandoned Dundalk, in the neighbourhood of which place Schomberg immediately encamped. Joined by the Inniskilliners, and the regulars under Kirk, he had advanced slowly through a difficult country, deformed with bogs and encumbered with mountains. But the country now before him was perfectly level. It was his duty to prevent the cavalry of the enemy from cutting off his communication with the fleet, which had not yet arrived, as he had directed, in the road of Carlingford. His troops were without experience or discipline, weakened by disease, and destitute of provisions. The rain and frost were uncommonly severe, and he therefore was resolved to remain at Dundalk, and to fortify himself against the attacks of an enemy, whom he could not engage in the field with any prospect of success.

Having arrived within three miles of Dundalk, James advanced on the 20th of September close to the lines of the enemy, and endeavoured to provoke him to fight. But Schomberg remained within his entrenchments; and James, after standing three hours in order of battle before Dundalk, retired slowly to his camp, and ordering Atherdee to be fortified, in anticipation of future hostilities; by thus demonstrating that he could stop the progress of the enemy, terminated the present campaign with unexpected reputation.

The French having invaded Ireland, and clandestinely assisted the Scots, the king, at the pressing instance of his parliament, on the seventh of May proclaimed war against France. On the twenty-fourth of July, the princess Anne of Denmark was delivered of a son, who had the name of William given at his baptism, and was created duke of Glocester.

Among the other less important transactions of the year, may be numbered, the passing of an act of indemnity, the burning by the hands of the common hangman of a pastoral letter from bishop Burnet, asserting that William had obtained the crown by right of conquest, and the reversal of several attainders passed in the preceding reign. Dr. Oates, the notorious witness respecting the popish plot, endeavoured to vindicate the veracity of his evidence, and excited considerable agitation in both houses of parliament; but obtained only a remission of the remainder of his sentence, and liberation from his imprisonment. A bill was passed determining the succession, and containing a clause in favour of the house of Hanover. A feeble and absurd discovery of the conspiracy of lord Griffin, who had been raised to the peerage, by the late monarch, only a month before his abdication, and of which the particulars were discovered in a pewter bowl, ended in the admission of his lordship to bail; and viscount Preston, a Scotch peer, having the presumption to claim a seat among the English lords, under a patent from James, after his exclusion from the throne, was committed to the Tower; but obtained his liberty, on asking pardon and pleading ignorance.

On the fourth day of June, in the next year, William left London, and on the fourteenth arrived at Carrickfergus. He passed from thence to Lisburn, the head-quarters of the duke of Schomberg, and afterwards reviewed his army, which consisted of 1690.

thirty six thousand men, at Lough Britland. His troops were composed of English, Dutch, Germans, Danes, and French; all confident in the justice of their cause, and supplied with all that was necessary to render their strength effectual. On the approach of William, the Irish army having abandoned Othardee, retired to the south of the Boyne, a river of which the south side was hilly, and strengthened by ditches. The river itself is deep, and rises very high with the tide. Influenced by these advantages, and reflecting that flight would dispirit his troops, and tarnish his own reputation; he determined, notwithstanding the inferiority of his numbers, and the advice of his officers, to retain his position. Assured of the aid of a powerful fleet, and encouraged by a projected invasion of England, he had previously determined to quit Ireland, but the strength of his situation, and the danger of retreat before a superior enemy, induced him to change his resolution.

On the thirtieth of June, 1689, the two armies were opposed to each other on the opposite banks of the river. William, having reconnoitred in person the position of the enemy, determined to attack them on the next day. His army was divided into three columns: the right, under the count de Schomberg and Douglas, was ordered to pass near the bridge of Slane; the centre, commanded by the duke of Schomberg, was directed to force the fords in front of the enemy. The king himself led the left to a fordable part of the river, between his camp and the town of Drogheda. James had extended his troops in two lines opposed to the deep and dangerous fords of the Boyne; his left was defended by a morass, and his rear was protected by the village of Dunmore. Three miles beyond this village was the narrow pass of Duleck, calculated equally to retard and cover his retreat.

At six in the morning, general Douglas, with young Schomberg, advanced towards Slane bridge, and passed the river with little opposition. When they reached the opposite bank, they found the enemy drawn up in two lines, to a considerable amount in horse and foot, with a morass in their front, so that Douglas was obliged to halt, in expectation of reinforcements, which, having at length arrived, the foot advanced to the charge through the morass, while count Schomberg rode round it with his cavalry to fall upon the enemy in flank. The Irish, instead of waiting the assault, wheeled about, and fled towards Duleck, with the utmost precipitation; but were overtaken in their flight by young Schomberg, who put a considerable number of them to the sword.

The centre, commanded by the duke of Schomberg, passed the fords with little interruption. The Dutch guards formed gradually upon the bank, and then advanced. The Irish regiments descended from the rising grounds upon the enemy, but instantly deserted their officers. The cavalry behaved with more spirit, and drove a body of dragoons into the river, but were afterwards repulsed with slaughter by the Dutch. The duke of Schomberg fell in the conflict; but whether by the arms of the enemy, or by the bullets of his own soldiers, who, in their endeavours to rescue him from the French guards, who had been mistaken for friends, poured in their fire upon the enemy, it was not in the power even of those engaged in the conflict to determine.

After young Schomberg had forced the passage of the river, he stretched his line to the right, James believing that the main body of the English was following his right, had weakened his own right wing and centre, by reinforcing Lausun, who had marched with his left to observe the motions of the enemy. While James and the French general having united within half cannon-shot of their opponents, were consulting together on the manner of attack, they were informed that the enemy had forced the passage of the river. The only resource that remained was an immediate charge upon Schomberg; but the ground was so much intersected with ditches, as to render it impracticable: and the whole line of the English began to move towards their right. James, in order to prevent the enemy from obtaining possession of the pass of Duleck, and intercepting his retreat from Dublin, marched towards his left; his forces being already acquainted with the defeat of his right. Influenced by the persuasions of Lausun, he effected, in the course of the night, his retreat to Dublin.

Such was the result of the partial, and comparatively bloodless, battle of the Boyne. Of all the troops which had fought under the banners of James, the French alone remained attached to his standard. Both monarchs incurred a certain degree of blame, for not improving their respective advantages. William, it is asserted, by pushing on directly to Dublin, might have seized all the principal papists, effectually secured Limerick, Galloway, and other important places, and have struck the whole party with such consternation, as would have disabled them from the possibility of further resistance. James, it is alleged, might have collected his scattered troops; and, by reinforcing his army from his numerous garrisons, have put himself in a condition to keep the field, or to act on the offensive.

When James arrived at Dublin, he found letters from the queen, and an account of the victory obtained by the French at Fleurus, over count Waldec. Encouraged by this intelligence, he complied with the wishes of his friends, and determined to retire into France. On the next morning he posted to Waterford, accompanied by the duke of Berwick, Tyrconnel, and the marquis of Powis, having previously ordered all the bridges to be broken down behind him, in order to prevent a pursuit. He immediately embarked in a vessel, which he had caused to be prepared before the battle. He was taken up off the coast by M. du Quesne, who had been dispatched with three French frigates, at the earnest entreaty of James's queen to M. de Seignelai the French minister of Marine. Arriving safely in France, he returned to St. Germains, the place of his former residence.

The flight of James was succeeded by the departure from Dublin of all the considerable papists: and a committee was formed to take care of the government. The precipitate flight of the abdicated monarch diminished the confidence of his friends, and was of the most injurious consequence to his interests. Lewis XIV., who had been master of the sea since the battle of Bantry bay, had intended to assist his cause by diversions in the channel; and M. de Seignelai, the author of the project, having been taken suddenly ill, his commission devolved on the chevalier de Tourville; but the flight of James rendered the full execution of the plan no longer possible. His reception by Lewis accorded with the folly and imbecility of his conduct; he was greeted with coldness, and regarded with neglect.

Having sent a detachment under M. Mellionere to invest Drogheda, which surrendered after a short resistance, William proceeded to Dublin, which he entered in triumph, and published a declaration of pardon to all who should return to their places of abode by the first of August; but with a singular degree of injustice and impolicy, he excepted the gentry, whom he resolved to abandon to all the rigours of war and conquest. He issued a commission for selling all their estates and effects, though no court of judicature was open to proceed according to law. The opportunities thus afforded to his dependants were pursued in every form of avarice and rapacity, and exasperated the Irish to despair. The generals who had accompanied James to Waterford, returned with a determination to continue the war. The Irish, assuming courage from the langour of the enemy, assembled round their colours, and directed their march to Limerick and Athlone.

On the ninth of July, William sent general Douglas, with a strong detachment of horse and foot towards Athlone; while he himself, having committed the government of Dublin to brigadier Trelawny, proceeded with the rest of his army to Inchequin, on his way to Kilkenny: at Carlow he detached the duke of Ormond, to take possession of the latter place. Major-general Kirke was sent with a party to Waterford, the garrison of which surrendered on honourable conditions: and the fortress of Duncannon submitted on the same terms. Intelligence of disasters and dangers in England, had induced the king to form the resolution of returning to that kingdom; but being informed that the designs of his domestic enemies were discovered and defeated, that the fleet was refitted, and that the French had done very little injury on the coast, and had already retired to Brest, he changed his resolution, and determined to invest Limerick, which M. Boisseleau commanded as governor, aided by the duke of Berwick and colonel Sarsfield as inferior officers.

Douglas, in the mean time, pursued his destructive route to Athlone; plundering the country as he proceeded, and murdering or persecuting the peasantry, who, trusting to the king's declaration, presented themselves in numerous bodies, to demand his protection. He sat down with his cruel followers before Athlone, and having summoned the place to surrender, colonel Grace, the governor for king James, fired a pistol at the trumpeter, saying, "These are my terms." Having lost his best gunners, and being alarmed by a report that Sarsfield was advancing with fifteen thousand men, Douglas thought proper to abandon the enterprise.

On the ninth of August, the king, having advanced with his whole army, augmented by the junction of Douglas, sent a trumpeter into the town, with a summons to surrender. Boisseleau replied, that the most likely mode of obtaining the good opinion of the prince of Orange, would be a vigorous defence of the town. Before the siege was regularly formed, colonel Sarsfield, with about six hundred horse and dragoons, passed the Shannon in the night, attacked the king's train of artillery on its way to the camp, split the cannon, destroyed the carriages, waggons, and ammunition, and returned in safety to Limerick.

Notwithstanding this disaster, the trenches were opened on the 16th of the month, and a battery was raised with some cannon brought from Waterford. William directed the troops to make a lodgement in the Counterscarp; but the assailants were repulsed with the loss of twelve hundred men, either killed on the spot or mortally wounded. This disappointment, together with the badness of the weather, induced the king to abandon the siege on the twenty-second day after its commencement.

Nor was this the only mortification which William was condemned to endure. The English and Dutch fleet, having sailed from St. Helen's, on the twenty-fourth of June, admiral Torrington came to an anchor at Dunnose, and perceived at eight in the morning the French fleet, which had been hovering off the coast of England, and repeating signals of defiance, at anchor in Compton bay. On the thirtieth of June, the two fleets stood in their lines off Beechy head, and about one in the morning the Dutch, leading the vanguard, gave the onset; but, not being seconded by the admiral's squadron, the Dutch, and the few English ships by which they had been joined, were severely shattered. The engagement continued till the evening, when the French bore away and came to anchor. One English ship was taken, and five burnt: the Dutch lost several burnt or sunk, and the French coasted after our fleet, till it took refuge in harbour, when having landed some men, and committed some petty depredations, they retired to their ships. For this inglorious result, which was attributed, by the Dutch officers, and the English populace, to the conduct of the English admiral, Torrington was tried on shipboard, and acquitted; but one Godfrey Cross, of Kent, who had been seized on his return from on board a French ship with treasonable letters, was tried, and suffered the penalty of his crime.

Having sent away from before Limerick the heavy baggage and cannon, in the direction of Clonmell, having appointed lord Sidney and Mr. Coningsby lord justices of Ireland, and entrusted the command of the army to count Solmes, William set sail from Duncannon with prince George of Denmark, and arrived on the next day in king's road near Bristol, from whence he repaired to Windsor. Notwithstanding the violence of the whigs and tories, who formed her council, the good sense and circumspection of the queen precluded the otherwise inevitable consequences of their dissentions, and enabled her to act with the spirit and promptitude required by the domestic necessities, and foreign relations of the country.

On the 21st of September, the earl of Marlborough, having been dispatched from England, landed his men, after trifling opposition in the neighbourhood of Cork: he was joined at that place, with five thousand men, by the duke of Wirtemburg, with whom, after some dispute respecting precedence, he agreed to command in turn. Between five and six thousand seamen, soldiers, gunners, and carpenters, were occupied in raising works, and erecting batteries. The besieged being attacked both by the army and the fleet, the garrison beat a parley, and surrendered themselves prisoners of war, on condition of favourable terms for the inhabitants. The victory was dearly purchased, for the duke of Grafton, the most accomplished of all the children of Charles the second, was mortally wounded in one of the attacks, and died lamented by the nation and the army.

After a siege of ten days, one of the forts of Kinsale surrendered on honourable terms, the other having been taken by storm. By the reduction of these maritime places, communication between France and the enemy, on that side of the island, was effectually cut off, and the Irish were confined to the province of Ulster, where their subsistence was scanty and precarious.

Having proved his title to the character of an able general, Marlborough returned with his prisoners to England, and was graciously received by the king, who observed to his courtiers, that he knew no man so fit to be a general, who had seen so few campaigns.

After presenting an address of congratulation on William's safe return, the parliament proceeded to grant him the supplies necessary for carrying on the war with promptitude and vigour. The marquis of Carmarthen being deeply engaged in the interest of the tories, and obnoxious to the opposite party, a number of the latter, at the suggestion of the earl of Shrewsbury, resolved to revive his old impeachment. A committee of lords was appointed to examine precedents, and to enquire, whether impeachments continued in force from parliament to parliament; but the merits of the marquis, and the evident injustice of the attempt, prevailed over the machinations of a few turbulent individuals, and the enquiry was not pursued to its conclusion.

Having adjourned the parliament in a very conciliating speech, the king left Whitehall for Holland, on the 6th of January 1691, and after some delay and difficulty, occasioned by the frost, arrived at Oramen Hack, from whence, after being complimented by the deputies of the states, he proceeded to the Hague, and received the congratulations of the constituted authorities. The other confederate powers agreed, in conjunction with the assembly of the states, to furnish an army of 220,000 men, in the prosecution of the contest against France, of which 20,000 were to be provided by England.

While the king was thus exciting the nations of the continent to resistance, against the ambition and rapacity of France, and communicating energy and system to the exertions of his native country, London was agitated by a conspiracy to obtain the restoration of James. Lord Preston, a Scot, John Ashton, and Edmund Elliot, were captured on board a smack by captain Billop, as they were proceeding to France, with papers containing secret intelligence, and an intimation to Lewis, that he might successfully contribute to the restoration of James, while William was in Holland. Preston and Ashton were brought to trial, and condemned; but only the former endured the infliction of his sentence. The earl of Clarendon, who was implicated in the conspiracy, after a short confinement in the Tower, was afterwards permitted to seclude himself at his country-house; a favour for which he was indebted to his affinity to the queen, of whom he was first cousin. Graham, Penn, and the bishop of Ely, having absconded, a proclamation was issued for apprehending them as traitors.

On his return from Holland, the king appointed Ginckle to the direction of the campaign in Ireland. Though the winter had suspended the regular operations of war, the miseries of that unhappy country had increased during the season. The French having retired to Galway, to wait for a passage home, the whole weight of their own defence devolved on the native Irish. Despair and animosity seized their minds. Their success against William at Limerick, had lately increased their confidence and courage. In their excursions against the enemy, their progress was distinguished by misery, ruin, and desolation. The inhabitants were plundered, and their houses and cabins burnt to the ground. The winter was throughout disgraced by acts of severity on both sides. Tyrconnel, though stript of his character of chief governor, had returned from France with a trifling sum of money, to continue the Irish war. Yielding to despondence, or swayed by resentment for his disgrace, he endeavoured to persuade the Irish to submit, on certain conditions, to the government of William. This measure was opposed by Sarsfield, who had acquired so much reputation during the former campaign. To terminate a dispute, which threatened his interest in Ireland with ruin, James conferred the chief command upon St. Ruth, a French general of experience and reputation. That officer arrived in Ireland, but he was furnished with none of the necessaries of war. Unprovided with arms, ammunition, or provisions, a great part of the army were compelled to disperse: St. Ruth was obliged to act on the defensive, and having placed a strong garrison in Athlone, he resolved to wait for the enemy, on the other side of the Shannon.

Having compelled the town of Ballimon to surrender, general Ginckle appeared before

Athlone. The English town was taken by storm; great numbers of the Irish were killed, and several drowned by crowding upon each other, in passing across the bridge which divided the new town from the old. The castle and fortifications of the Irish town were laid in ruins by the vigour and constancy of the assailant's fire, but without exciting alarm in the minds of the enemy, or paralysing their exertions: nor would the contest have been easily decided had not an advantage obtained, by burning their bridge of boats, lulled them into a fatal security. On the 30th of June, Ginckle, suddenly entering the river in columns, surprised the town, after a feeble resistance. The boldness and vigilance of Ginckle, who for this exploit was created earl of Athlone, could only be equalled by the negligence of the Irish. History can scarcely furnish a parallel to the successful execution of an enterprise, apparently so impracticable. A fortified town, attacked across a river, while sustained behind by a considerable army, was taken in less than a quarter of an hour, by a body of three thousand men, who advanced to the breach, breast-high in water. St. Ruth, when informed of the assault, would scarcely give credit to the intelligence, though he ordered some battalions to hasten to the succour of the beseiged; but their arrival was too late; the works of the town towards his camp were entire, and the enemy had already lined the walls, and repulsed the Irish from their own works.

Ginckle having left a garrison in Athlone, pursued the French and Irish to a position near Agrim, where they halted in a situation defended by a bog in front, and surrounded by hedges and ditches. On Sunday the 12th of June, the general attacked the enemy, about three in the afternoon, under disadvantages which stimulated St. Ruth to express his confidence of victory. In the midst of his exultation he was killed by a cannon shot, and with him died the courage of his army. The English having gained the pass, and edged in behind the bog, dismayed the French by the impetuosity of their onset, and compelled the Irish to accompany their flight. The horse and dragoons pursued them more than three miles; but the approach of night, and the heaviness of the rain, prevented them from intercepting the retreat of the fugitives to the advantageous position of Lough Ireah. The loss of the English in slain was 1000, that of the Irish 4000.

The army having been indulged in a short repose, general Ginckle marched to Galway, and summoned the governor, lord Dillon, to surrender. On his refusal, a part of the English army crossed the river, and, seizing the fort which the Irish were busily employed in erecting, the governor changed his resolution, and surrendered on advantageous conditions. The only strong place which now remained in Ireland, to the cause of James, was Limerick, to which the army rapidly approached. On the first of October, several batteries having been erected, the Irish agreed to twelve articles, by which it was stipulated, that all other towns, forts, and castles, which yet held out, should be surrendered; that as many of James's army as were desirous of being conveyed to France, should have that liberty, and that all Roman catholics should enjoy the same toleration, as in the time of Charles II. The place was put into possession of the English; the French and many Irish were sent away in transports, the remainder of their army in the field submitting to be included in the amnesty. Such was the termination of a war, which had threatened the catholics with absolute destruction.

William, in the mean time, having retired from the Hague to Loo, placing himself at the head of the army, advanced to Hale, within the sound of the enemy's guns. The state of his troops was so bad, and the plans of the enemy so good, that he durst not venture a battle, and Mons was taken, after a gallant defence, on the ninth of April. He therefore returned to the Hague; embarked on the 12th of April for England, and the next evening arrived in London, where he found the palace of Whitehall in ruins, by an accidental fire. His first business, after his arrival, was to fill the vacant sees. Though the nonjuring bishops had been long in a deprived state, in consequence of the act for altering the oaths, their removal became the subject of much polemical disquisition and altercation. Having settled the affairs of the church, and prorogued the parliament, he resolved to return to the continent, to place himself at the head of the allied army. He embarked at Harwich on the second of May, on the evening of the third arrived at the Hague. Having learned that Luxemburgh, with an army of forty thousand men was advancing to besiege Brussels, while the marquis de Boufflers, with 40,000 men, sat down before Liege, he immediately put himself at the head of his troops, and arrived in time to cover the former place, and raise the siege of the latter. Luxemburgh, however, having suddenly possessed himself of Hale, kept close within his lines; and William, at the head of a superior army, failed in all his attempts to place the fate of the campaign on the decision of a battle. Some unimportant movements were made on both sides, but the French had determined to engage only at a manifest advantage. Fatigued and disgusted by so tedious and profitless a warfare, the king resigned the command of the army to prince Walduck, and returned to the Hague. That prince, in withdrawing the troops from Leuse, was attacked unexpectedly in the rear by Luxemburgh, but the French obtained only a trivial success. The glory of having checked the progress of a superior army, was the only advantage gained by Lewis, on the side of Flanders, since the capture of Mons.

After a short residence at the Hague, William embarked for England, and arrived at Margate on the 18th of October. On the 22nd of the same month, the parliament having met, the king in his speech represented the necessity of recruiting the fleet, and maintaining a considerable army. The reply of both houses was consonant to his wishes. They congratulated him on his safe return, and on the success of his arms in Ireland; and declared their determination to assist him, in prosecuting the war against France with vigour. Notwithstanding these gratifying and loyal professions, it soon appeared that a powerful party was formed against the government. They descanted with vehemence and plausibility on the dangers of a standing army, and on the prejudices of William in favour of the Dutch, to the exclusion and neglect of the English. The deportment of the king was cold, formal, and reserved; and his distrust of the whigs, and his evident attachment to the theory, if not the practice of arbitrary government; equally disgusted and alarmed, those who, convinced of the rectitude of public measures, were dissatisfied with the principle of the new settlement, and of those who believed the measures of the court to deserve reprobation, but were firmly attached to the established government.

In the course of this year the war with Scotland was fortunately terminated by the submission of Sir Evan Cameron, who at the head of a few Highlanders had opposed all treaty with William. The lenity of William to the presbyterians, the influence of James, who was anxious that his friends should keep their means of action in reserve instead of wasting them in desultory efforts, and the arts of bribery, all contributed to this timely and desirable result of a war, which promised neither the glory of a splendid contest, nor the usual rewards of an easy victory.

The English parliament was occupied, during some part of the session, by examining the case of one Fuller, who having been unjustly suspected, as a party in a pretended conspiracy, resolved to take advantage of the delusion; and by an enquiry into the conduct of admiral Russel, and the cause of his inactivity during the last season. The admiral was so fortunate as to transfer the blame from himself to the admiralty, and Fuller, having been declared guilty of a gross and scandalous imposition on parliament, and insult to the queen, was condemned to expiate his offences in the pillory.

A circumstance occurred at this moment, which contributed to excite the discontent even of the moderate party, and to render the king still more suspected and unpopular. The earl of Marlborough, having represented to his majesty the dangerous consequences of his partiality to foreigners, and his wife being suspected of having persuaded the princess of Denmark to solicit an independent settlement, was dismissed from all his employments, civil or military. The odium thus acquired, was much encreased by a barbarous massacre committed in Scotland, though his knowledge of the circumstances by which it was accompanied, is more than doubtful. In the preceding August, in consequence of the pacification with the Highlanders under Cameron, a proclamation of indemnity had been issued to such insurgents, as should take the oaths to the king and queen, on or before the last day of December. Of the chiefs who had taken up arms in the cause of James, all complied except Macdonald of Glenco; and even he set out, towards the end of December, to make his submission at Inverary before the magistrate. The way to his place of destination lay across almost impassable mountains. The season was extremely rigorous, and the whole country covered with a deep snow. So eager, however, was Macdonald to take the oaths before the limited time should expire, that, though the road lay within half a mile of his own house, he would not stop to visit his family. After various obstructions, he arrived at Inverary. The time was elapsed, the sheriff hesitated to receive his submission; but Macdonald prevailed over his reluctance with importunities, and even with tears.

The profligate and specious sir John Dalrymple, afterwards earl of Stair, who acted as secretary of state for Scotland, took advantage of Macdonald's neglecting to take the oaths within the time prescribed; and procured from the king a warrant of military execution, against him and his adherents. Campbell of Glenlyon, a captain in the earl of Argyle's regiment, and two subalterns were commanded to repair to Glenco, with one hundred and twenty men. Campbell being uncle to young Macdonald's wife, was received by the father with friendship and hospitality. The men were treated in the houses of his tenants with free quarters and kind entertainment. The officers, on the very night of the massacre, (the 13th of February) passed the evening, and played at cards in Macdonald's house. In the night, lieutenant Lindsey, with a party of soldiers, called in a friendly manner at his door. He was instantly admitted. Macdonald, as he was rising from his bed to receive his guest, was shot dead from behind with two bullets. His wife was already dressed; but was stript naked by the soldiers, who tore the rings off her fingers with their teeth.

The slaughter now became general. Neither age, sex, nor infirmity was spared. In one place nine persons, as they sat enjoying themselves, were shot dead by the soldiers. Several who fled to the mountains perished by famine, and the inclemency of the season. Lieutenant-colonel Hamilton, who had the charge of the execution from Dalrymple, was on his march, with four hundred men, to occupy all the passes which led from the village of Glenco. He was obliged to stop, by the severity of the weather, which proved the safety of the unfortunate clan. He entered the valley the next day, laid all the houses in ashes, and carried away the cattle and spoil, which were divided among the officers and soldiers!—That the warrant, which was thus productive of bloodshed and misery, might have been signed through inadvertency, or that it might have been enforced beyond the rigour of Hamilton's orders, have been the usual topics of apology by the friends of William; but his refusal to punish the authors of the tragedy, his promotion of the most active and distinguished to his favour, apparently belied the excuses of his advocates, and rendered him the object of general and excusable suspicion.

CHAPTER II.

Disaffection of Russel—Victory of La Hogue—Siege of Namur—Repulse of the Allies at Steinkirk—Debates in Parliament—Triennial Bill—Operations in Flanders—Successes of Tourville—Communications between King James and Russel—Death of the Queen—Military Operations—Various Acts, for the benefit of the Subject—A Conspiracy discovered against the Life of William—Distresses of Lewis XIV.—Negociations at the Hague—Treaty of Ryswick.

1692. THE resentments of Marlborough and Russel, were stimulated into action by the general diffusion of distrust and discontent. The former solicited, in terms of extraordinary humiliation, the forgiveness of James and his queen; and so far wrought on the weakness or affection of the princess of Denmark, that she wrote a letter imploring his forgiveness, and promising to join him whenever he should land in England With regard to Russel; to refrain from action with the French fleet, should it fall in his way, was impossible; but it was always in the admiral's power to steer the fleet in a course distinct from that of the enemy, under the pretence of orders. The native subjects of James in France, were almost equal to the purpose of an expedition. The transports which conveyed the French to Ireland in 1690, conveyed 500 Irish to France. Fourteen thousand troops were sent to France, in consequence of the capitulation of Limerick. While the king of England, therefore, was conducting the army of the confederates in Flanders, Lewis, in order to facilitate the landing of an army in this country from Normandy and Bretagne, dispatched to sea nearly the whole of his naval force. Russel, after loitering at St. Helen's, and avoiding as much as possible all observation of the French squadron, was at length enabled or compelled, on the 19th of May, to discover the enemy, consisting of about one half his number of ships, sailing on the same tack with himself. Either borne away by the impulse of a sanguine spirit, induced to politic compliance with the enthusiasm of the fleet, or having wavered in his policy, Russel performed the duties of an English admiral. After two severe engagements, and the loss of many ships, either sunk or blown up, the contest ended in the rapid and disastrous flight of the enemy.

YET such was the imperfection of our naval arrangements at that period, and such the activity of the enemy, that the victory of La Hogue was productive of no decisive consequence. The French privateers abounded in the channel, and commerce was almost at a stand. The ministry complained of Russel, and Russel of the ministry.

THE fears of invasion were removed by the victory of La Hogue, but the domestic tranquillity of the country was still disturbed by surmises of plots, conspiracies, and treasons. A person, named Young, a prisoner in Newgate for forgery, had drawn up a fictitious set of articles, designated as containing the principles of a pretended association against government; to which he annexed the names of Salisbury and Marlborough, the deprived archbishop of Canterbury, the bishop of Rochester, and other persons of rank. The bishop of Rochester being confronted with Blackhead, a coadjutor with Young, detected the villainy of the accusation, to the satisfaction of the council; but the court suspecting Marlborough of secret designs, discharged Young from custody, and Marlborough, in defiance of the laws, was detained as a prisoner in the Tower.

LEWIS XIV. and William set out on the same day to join their respective armies. The first arrived in his camp on the twentieth of May. On the twenty-third, all his troops were in motion, and he immediately undertook the siege of Namur, with an army of one hundred and twenty thousand men. The place being amply supplied and strengthened with a new work, under the superintendance of Cohorn, and the governor being convinced that William would take every method of relieving it, the parties besieged were confident of successful resistance; but the assailants acted with so much vigour and dexterity, that within seven days after the trenches were opened, the town surrendered, and the garrison retired to the citadel.

The king, being reinforced by the troops of Brandenburg and Liege, encamped within cannon-shot of the army of Luxemburgh, which was posted on the opposite side of the river; but such precautions had been taken by the French general, that the siege could not be interrupted, nor the French lines attacked, without evident disadvantage. The assailants were so animated by the presence of their monarch, that the fort of Cohorn was surrendered after a very obstinate defence. The fate of the citadel was soon afterwards decided. The garrison evacuated the place on the thirtieth of July, and Lewis returned in triumph to Versailles.

To retrieve the glory which he had lost before Namur, William endeavoured to surprise the French army, under the duke of Luxemburgh, at Steinkirk. The attack was chiefly carried on by the English in columns. They ascended, with the most determined resolution, the rising ground on which a wing of the French army lay encamped. They took possession of their batteries, and were for some time masters of their line. The whole camp was in confusion, but the assailants were not properly supported; the second line of the French advanced, and, after an obstinate contest of four hours, the allies were repulsed, having left many thousands of the enemy, as well as of their own number, dead on the field. The king gained no reputation for his conduct, but the valour of his troops deserved great applause. The generals Mackay, Lanier, and Douglas, the earl of Angus, and several officers of distinction were slain, and 3000 English left dead upon the scene of battle.

The campaign in Flanders languished after the battle of Steinkirk. The discovery of a plot against the life of William, and the execution of one Grandvil, the pretended assassin, gave occasion to much reflection and surprise. Lewis XIV. and the abdicated monarch, were involved by the discoverers in this conspiracy; but the suspicion of participation in such a design, is utterly inconsistent with the character of Lewis; and it is now ascertained beyond the possibility of doubt, that though many plans of a similar description were offered to his acceptance, he rejected them all with indignation and abhorrence.

King William, in conjunction with the states-general, having adjusted the plan of the next campaign, and appointed winter-quarters for the army, embarked for England on the fifteenth of October, and landed on the eighteenth at Yarmouth. His majesty, in his way to the palace at Kensington, passed through the city of London, amidst the acclamations of the populace. The parliament meeting on the fourth day of November, the king thanked them for the last supplies, congratulated them on the success by sea, and expressed his concern for the advantages gained by the enemy on land; he intimated his determination to make a descent on France, and demanded large supplies, to assist him in prosecuting the war with vigour, as the best security for a safe and honourable peace.

The earl of Marlborough and other noblemen, having been admitted to bail by the court of king's bench, the peers declared their resolution of asserting their violated rights. The judges were summoned to attend the house; and upon witnesses being examined, respecting the evidence against the lords, who had been committed to the Tower, a vehement debate took place; and the opinion of the judges proving unsatisfactory, the matter was referred to a committee of the whole house, who passed a resolution, purporting that, in pursuance of the habeas corpus act, it was the duty of the judges to discharge the prisoner on bail, if committed for high treason, unless it be made to appear on oath, that there are two witnesses against him, who cannot be produced until the sessions or jail-delivery. A warm debate then took place, as to the manner of restoring the lords to liberty; and the controversy being warmly maintained, the fears of the courtiers dictated an expedient, which had the desired effect. The house being purposely adjourned to the eighteenth day of the month, the king released the noblemen from prison, after which they were made acquainted with the late proceedings. After another spirited debate, a formal entry was made in the journals, purporting that the house, being informed his majesty had given orders for the discharge of the lords, who had given bail in the king's bench, no further debate on the subject should take place. The resentment of the peers being thus appeased, they proceeded to the consideration of his majesty's speech.

This concession from the court was not sufficient to allay the heats in parliament. The commons, on the tenth of November, had voted thanks to the king for his speech. They ordered an address to the queen, acknowledging her prudent administration in the absence of her husband. But they, at the same time, resolved to present an address, requesting that the alliances made with the states in the months of April and August, 1689, and all other alliances with foreign states or princes, should be laid before the house. They entered into an examination of the management of the war at sea. They voted thanks to admiral Russel for his victory, but they resolved to enquire, Why that victory had not been pursued? A violent animosity appeared in the house against the preference given to foreigners: and it was suggested, but afterwards abandoned, that the king should be advised to fill all vacancies as they should happen among the general officers, with the subjects of Great Britain; and that the commander-in-chief of the English troops should be an Englishman. This resolution was aimed at the count de Solmes, on whose conduct towards the national troops, the parliament severely animadverted.

The parties were so equally poised, that almost the whole winter was spent in the fiercest debates. The people themselves were not unconcerned spectators of the contest. The opposition lords in some measure at length prevailed. A remonstrance was presented to the king, consisting of five articles. The peers desired, in accordance with the wish of the commons, that the commanding officer of the English, next the king himself, should be an Englishman; that the English officers should have precedence of all officers of the same rank, in the confederate armies, except those of crowned heads; that the abuses committed in pressing sailors should be remedied and prevented; and that all foreigners should be excluded from sitting at the board of ordnance. William was not of a temper to grant demands, so contrary to his views and predilections. He refused the request of the lords, by answering, that he would consider their address. The opposition had carried their point with so much difficulty, that they dropt the remonstrance without farther efforts. Their ill-humour, however, continued, and filled the remainder of the session with ineffectual altercations and debates. In the midst of their struggles, they framed a bill, providing for triennial parliaments, and annual sessions. It passed both houses, but William resolved to obstruct a bill so hostile to the power of the crown, and rejected it when presented for the royal assent. This was the second time he ventured to exercise a prerogative, which neither of his immediate predecessors had assumed the courage to exert.

On the third of March, lord viscount Sidney was raised to the government of Ireland. 1693. The arrival of Sidney in his government, though it might lessen the fear of future oppressions, diminished not the resentment of the people for former injuries. Having carried a proposition for an additional excise, he gave vent to his resentment against the parliament. He sent for them on the fourth of November, reprimanded them severely for invading the prerogatives of the crown, and prorogued them to the sixteenth of April. Inflamed with what they deemed a public insult, several members of the Irish house of commons, came in the name of their country to England, and on the 24th of February laid their complaints before parliament. Some circumstances appeared, upon the enquiry, which served to heighten the mismanagement of government, and the grievances of Ireland. The army, in want of pay from the crown, had levied money, by military distress, to the amount of two hundred thousand pounds; the stores left by James in the kingdom, to the value of eighty thousand pounds, were embezzled by Coningsby; the lord-lieutenant himself, and Ginckle, who had been created earl of Athlone, were accused of possessing themselves of almost all the forfeitures which ought to have fallen to the public; and among the most flagrant violations of justice, and instances of disregard to the interests of the constitution must be numbered, the wresting from the citizens of Dublin the right of electing their own magistrates.

To prevent the two houses from proceeding in their enquiries, or from acting with decision and effect on the ample materials afforded by the complaints of the Irish, William prorogued the parliament on the fourteenth of March, immediately after receiving the remonstrance. The dismission of the parliament, however, could not prevent the clamours of every rank of society, from disturbing the tranquillity of the throne. The malcontents were so much disgusted with the manners of William, or by real and imaginary grievances, as to receive the assurances, and listen to the promises of James with eagerness, and sometimes with enthusiasm. But the plans of James were frustrated, and his hopes defeated, by the duplicity and inactivity of Lewis, who listened to his proposals with complacency, but entertained no serious determination to assist him in carrying them into effect.

The king, impatient to open the campaign in Flanders, left Kensington on the thirty-first of March, and arrived in the Maese on the twenty-second of April. The French had disturbed the winter itself, with military excursions and attacks. They had taken Furnes and Dixmuyde, in the end of November, with their garrisons, consisting chiefly of the English, who had reduced those places in the close of the preceding campaign. His own preparations detained the king at Loo, and at the Hague, till the middle of May. Having joined the troops of the allies at Deigham, he marched from thence to Parks near Louvain, and by that judicious position, confounded the designs of France on Brabant. Lewis XIV. had placed himself at the head of his army, with a luxurious equipage and numerous attendants; but having fallen sick, he resigned to Luxemburgh the conduct of military operations in Flanders. That general, on the fifteenth of June, placed his headquarters at Meldert, within half a league of the camp of the allies. The two armies continued in this situation above a month. Each endeavoured to find an opportunity of giving battle to advantage, while both suffered great hardships from the incessant rains.

The mareschal de Luxemburgh, despairing to force William to fight at a disadvantage, left his camp on the eighteenth of July, and sat down before Huy, which surrendered in two days. Having amused the enemy with a feigned design upon Liege, he suddenly quitted his post at Hellicheim, crossed the Jaar in four columns, and directed his march towards the allies, being determined to attack them in their camp, or, if they retreated, to fall upon their rear. His van was in sight before they were apprised of his march. The king made the necessary preparations for receiving the enemy with vigour. He sent away his heavy baggage, he ordered his infantry to entrench themselves within the front of his camp. The river Geette bounded his camp, and ran winding along his rear. On the left, and in the front of the left, was the brook of Landen. A thick hedge joining with one end of the right wing, the Criette covered part of its front. The village of Neerwinden, with intrenchments before it, was between the left end of the hedge and the centre. The village of Romsdorf stood further advanced, opposed to the front of the left wing, and the intrenchments before it stretched to the village of Landen. A line of intrenchments extended themselves behind the two villages, and behind these the army of the allies was formed. Their whole front was covered with one hundred pieces of cannon, which, by being advantageously placed on an eminence, commanded all the approaches to their line.

On the evening of his arrival in sight of the allies, mareschal de Luxemburg dislodged a detachment of the enemy, posted in the village of Landen, which stood far advanced before the brook of that name. Between this village and that of Romsdorf, he placed forty battalions in the night. He formed his centre of eight lines of horse and foot intermixed. His horse on the left wing were ordered to extend themselves to the Geette, opposing their line to the thick hedge, which covered the front of the enemy's right. The French were formed before five in the morning, and the cannonading began on both sides. Six brigades, under the duke of Berwick and two other lieutenant-generals, attacked the village of Neerwinden. This important post was carried, but was soon recovered by the vigilance of William, who had the good fortune, at the same instant, to see his enemy repulsed on every side. The centre of the French army was not properly sustained by either wing

But Luxemburgh was not to be intimidated. He made a second effort at Neerwinden, and succeeded. He was again repulsed. He resolved to attack some other quarter of the enemy; but they were inaccessible every where. Neerwinden was attacked for the third time. William with great bravery led twice the English infantry to the intrenchment, which the enemy endeavoured to force. Nothing, however, could resist the impetuosity of the French. Their centre, reinforced by their right, opened a way for their cavalry, into the very lines of the allies; out-flanked the English, and charged and put to flight the Hanoverians and the Spaniards.

William, perceiving this disorder, advanced suddenly with a part of his left wing; but the enemy allowing him no time to form, flanked the Dutch horse as they came, and broke them in a furious onset, before the English could draw into a line. The king, however, was not to be driven from the field; he ordered his troops to charge even in their present situation, when he perceived his right wing driven headlong into the Geette. Nothing but confusion could now be seen throughout the camp; the bridge being too much crowded by the runaways, many were drowned in the river. William retreated in some order, with the remains of his left wing, leaving a complete victory to the enemy. Sixty-six pieces of cannon, eight mortars, eighty standards, colours, and other trophies, fell into the hands of the French. Twelve thousand of the allies were slain, and two thousand made prisoners. Luxemburgh gained little but glory by the conflict. He lost eight thousand of his best troops in the field, and his number of wounded was so considerable, as to prevent him from taking immediate advantage of the consternation of the enemy. Being at length reinforced by detachments from the coasts of Picardy and Normandy, the French marshal moved towards Charleroy, and sat down before that place on the eleventh of September. William made no efforts to raise the siege, though the garrison behaved with such spirit as deserved relief. The king quitted the army on the fifth of October, and Charleroy surrendered on the eleventh of that month.

Nor were the fortunes of William more propitious at sea. While the navy of England had been culpably neglected, the navy of France had been augmented by every means which ingenuity could devise. All their ships in the ports of the ocean, had assembled at Brest under Tourville. The designs of France were facilitated by the judicious but unfortunate conduct of the English merchants. Having suffered, in consequence of the neglect of the admiralty, to a great extent, from the privateers of the enemy, they resolved to keep their richest ships in their ports, till sufficient convoys could be obtained. Four hundred merchantmen, consisting of English, Dutch, and Hamburghers, many of which had been for eighteen months ready to sail, and bound for the Straits, lay waiting for convoy on the nineteenth of May, when orders were sent from the admiralty, for the whole fleet to sail, with as many merchantmen as might seem convenient. They accordingly sailed for the Straits, under the protection of sir George Rooke, with a squadron of 23 men of war, English and Dutch.

The fleet commanded by Tourville had sailed from Brest in the middle of May, and had steered towards the Straits, in hopes of joining the squadron expected from Toulon, under D'Estrees. Having arrived in the bay of Lagos, he remained in that place till the fifteenth of June; when Rooke, and the fleet under his convoy, appeared. Deceived by false intelligence concerning the strength of the enemy, the English admiral prepared to engage. Perceiving his mistake, he stood away with an easy sail. He ordered, at the same time, the merchantmen nearest to the land to take refuge in the ports of Spain. The French came up with the sternmost ships of the fleet: three Dutch men of war fell into the hands of the enemy, and eighty merchantmen were taken in their flight, or destroyed in ports where they had taken shelter. Had Tourville pursued the merchant vessels, he might have surrounded and taken one of the richest fleets that had yet sailed from the shores of any country in Europe; but in his eagerness (a pardonable weakness in a hero!) to pursue the Dutch ships, he suffered this propitious opportunity of acquiring wealth and glory to escape.

In the midst of the commotion excited by these disorders, William arrived from Holland. The parliament met on the seventh of November. The disasters at sea, and the disappointments by land, had supplied the opposition party with ample materials of declamation, and had excited throughout the country a general feeling of impatience and discontent. Advantage was taken by James of the state of the public mind, and he continued his correspondence with the disaffected clergy. He maintained a correspondence with Caermarthen, and by his advice, William, according to the wishes of James, reinstated Russel in the command of the fleet. Sunderland himself, if credit may be given to the Stuart papers, was not unwilling to proffer his services to James, but was repulsed by that monarch, who, having once experienced the extent of his treachery, could not be persuaded of his sincerity.

In his opening speech, the king expressed his regret, that his joy at the meeting of parliament was repressed by disappointment by land, and miscarriages at sea. The former he attributed to the number of his enemies, and the latter to the misconduct of those, to whom the naval force had been entrusted. He declared his resolution to punish the offenders, and trusted that his faithful parliament would enable him, by the liberality of their supplies, to prosecute the war both naval and military with vigour and success. The speech was received with opposite sentiments; and it was not till after six days of violent debates among the lords, that the question of supply was permitted to precede the investigation into the disasters of the fleet. In the money bill of this year, the first lottery, and the establishment of a bank of England, were remarkable expedients of finance. One million was raised by means of the first, and one million five hundred thousand pounds by the second: but even these resources were unequal to the requisite supply, and the borrowing of sums upon interest, to be paid out of funds arising from permanent taxes, laid the first foundation of the national debt.

A bill for the naturalization of all foreign protestants, created violent debates in the house of commons; and excited every class of society to so determined an expression of alarm and intolerant enthusiasm, that the court party was intimidated into silence, and the measure was relinquished.

The Irish gentlemen, who had made their appeal to the English parliament, renewed their complaints of Coningsby and Porter, whose injustice and tyranny had reduced Ireland to misery, and exasperated every persuasion and every rank of society. Though the charges were of the blackest die, and though they were fully proved, and had been committed since the establishment of a regular government, the commons declined to support the bill of impeachment, preferred against them by the earl of Bellamont, on the ground that, in times of domestic commotions, exertions of power might be necessary, which should not be punished, though they ought not to be sanctioned. Coningsby and Porter received a pardon under the great seal, while the earl of Bellamont, for his exertions in the cause of justice, was deprived of his place under government. Such is too frequently the reward of intrepidity and rectitude!

The adherents of the late king had represented to the court of France, that thirty thousand men would be necessary to ensure a revolution in England; but, discouraged and alarmed by the vague and unsatisfactory answers of Lewis to their proposals, they became more moderate in their demands, and more urgent in their entreaties. Marlborough continued, in his letters, to exhort the abdicated monarch to activity; and Russel received the emissary of James, a captain Lloyd, with every mark of respect and confidence. He refused to avoid the French admiral, but promised to use his utmost exertions to gain over the officers of his fleet, and to promote the revolution. A correspondence equally clandestine and criminal, was interchanged with James by Shrewsbury, who had succeeded Nottingham as first secretary of state, Godolphia, first lord commissioner of the treasury, and the earl of Sunderland, of whom the latter two were the confidential advisers of William. Unacquainted with their proceedings, or trusting to his own vigilance in counteracting their intrigues, William selected Russel as first commissioner of the admiralty; Shrewsbury possessed at least the reputation of an honest whig; and the prudence of the marquis of Caermarthen was regarded, as a security for his fidelity to the existing powers. Several individuals, who were known to be adverse to the late revolution, were either continued in employment, or raised to office; and the earl of Abingdon, at that time in actual correspondence with James, succeeded to a place of profit and responsibility.

In the beginning of May, the king landed in Holland, where he held a conference with the states-general. On the third of June, he was met by the electors of Cologne and Bavaria at Bertherine Abbey. The exertions of the confederates were such as to promise an easy and triumphant campaign. The duke of Luxemburgh had taken post between Mons and Maubeuge; and the dauphin, having assumed the command, crossed the Sambre to a position at Fleurus. From this place he removed on the eighteenth, while the confederated army marched to Rosbeck, and formed his encampment between St. Tron and Wanheim. The intention of William, to cross the Scheldt, was prevented by the rapid and unexpected march of the enemy; a circumstance so acceptable to the French monarch, that he commanded his letter of thanks to be read at the head of each regiment and squadron of the army. The allied army having compelled the town of Huy to surrender, and Dixmude, Deus, and other towns being occupied and fortified as winter-quarters, the dauphin returned to Versailles, and William made preparations for his departure for England. On the eighth of November he landed at Margate, and opened the session of parliament on the twelfth. The king, in the hope of obtaining a liberal supply, agreed to the provisions of the bill for triennial parliaments, by which it was enacted, that a parliament should be held once in three years at least; that no parliament should continue longer than three years at the utmost, to be counted from the first day of the first session; and that the parliament then subsisting should cease and determine on the first day of November next following. Several noblemen, however, protested against the bill, as tending to the continuance of the present parliament, longer than was consistent with the constitution of England.

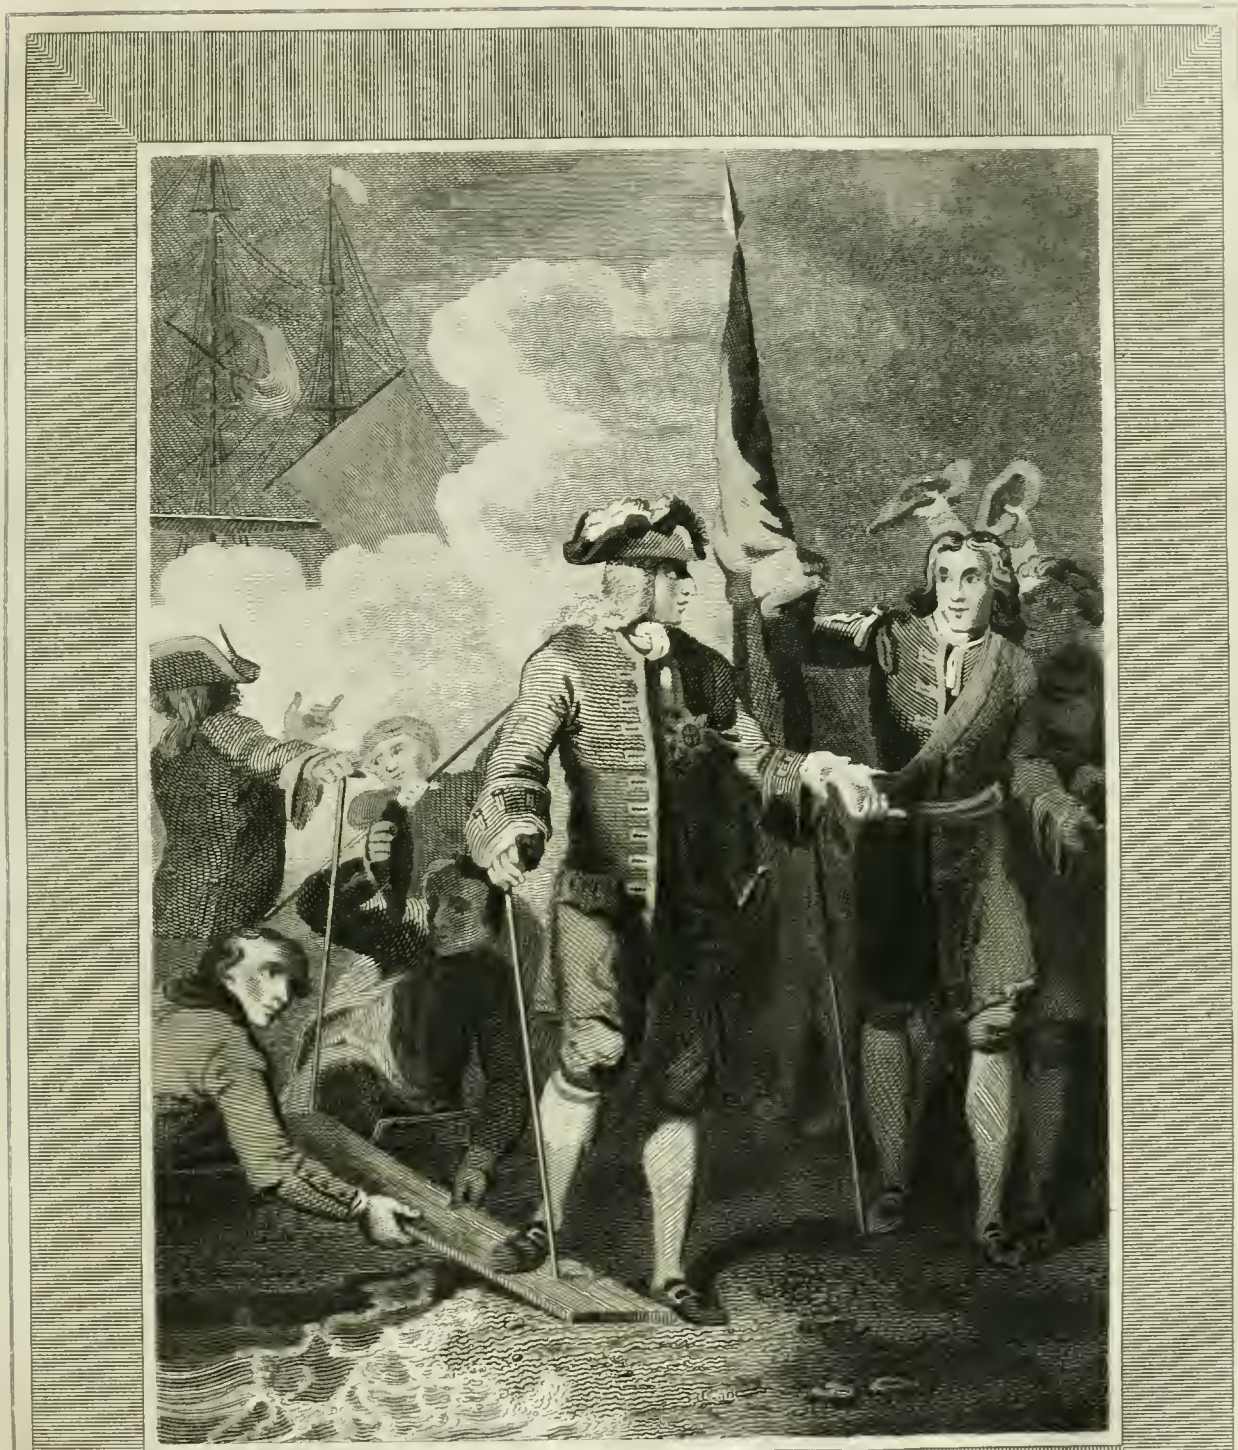
The attention of William was diverted, for a time, from the intrigues of his court, and the debates of contending parties, by the alarming indisposition of his consort, which terminated in her death on the twenty-eighth of December. Her affability, discretion, and propriety of demeanor, had rendered her the object of general attachment. Her person was tall and graceful; her manners elegant, easy, and imposing; her eye was piercing; and though her complexion was not fair, the features of her countenance were regular and pleasing. An implicit deference to the will and inclination of her husband, the predominating virtue of her life. Though she acted, during the absence of William, with judgment and discretion, she was better qualified by nature to fulfil the duties of domestic life, than to adorn the throne, or direct the government. Her good qualities were rather negative than positive; her good sense was always more apparent and predominant than her sensibility; and with every consideration for the difficulties of her peculiar situation, it is impossible not to accuse her of inexcusable unkindness, as a sister and a child. On her deathbed she refused to see the princess Anne, but was afterwards persuaded to send her a a message of forgiveness. The princess had begun, in the year 1692, a correspondence with her father, but the death of Mary having opened a nearer prospect to the crown, she thought it expedient to conciliate the favour and confidence of William. The king, on his part, was induced by the dread of her resentment for former injuries, and by reflecting that a great proportion of his subjects had been retained in their allegiance by a sentiment of respect to Mary, as the daughter of the late king, to present her with her sister's jewels, and load her with other indications of particular favour.

WILLIAM.

The death of the queen neither excited any unusual sensation in the people at large, nor interrupted the course of parliamentary business. A futile charge, the offspring of cunning, knavery, and ignorance, against certain pretended conspirators in Lancaster and Cheshire, was laid before the commons, but regarded with merited contempt. Lunt, the informer, being desired to point out the prisoners, in the court at Manchester, mistook their identity. At the Lancaster assizes, the witnesses were tried and found guilty of perjury.

After several vehement debates, respecting the affairs of the East India Company, the impeachment of the duke of Leeds, who had been successively distinguished by the titles of sir Thomas Osborne, lord Latimer, the earl of Danby, and marquis of Caermarthen, and was suspected of participation in the frauds of sir Thomas Cooke, the governor of the East India Company, became the most important subject of parliamentary discussion.



LANDING OF WILLIAM AT TORBAY.

London, Pub. May 2-1785 by Rich.d Evans White row Spitalfields.

It being discovered, however, in the course of the debates, that 10,000 pounds of the sums embezzled by Cooke, had found their way into the coffers of William, and several minor sums into the pockets of his favourites, the proceedings were languidly conducted; and one Robarts, a Swiss, being the only person who could prove the guilt of the duke, he was sent to his own country. A proclamation for shutting the ports of the kingdom against his flight, was not issued till nine days after the address of the lords, recommending that measure; and all proceedings were prevented, by the prorogation of the parliament on the third of May.

Having appointed on that day a regency, consisting of the chief officers of state, the king arrived on the fourteenth of May at the Hague. The mareschal de Luxemburgh had paid the debt of nature, and Lewis, despairing to find a successor to so great a captain, instructed his generals to act, during the course of the ensuing campaign, on the defensive. The mareschal de Villeroy received the command of the principal army in Flanders; the second army was submitted to the orders of De Boufflers. The line to be defended by the French, extended from Namur on the right to Dunkirk on the left. De Boufflers assembled his army near Mons to cover Namur, and Villeroy posted himself between the Scheldt and the Lys to protect Tournay, Ypres, and Dunkirk.

William assembled his army in three divisions: the first, under the elector of Bavaria, advanced to the Scheldt and the Lys; the third division, under the duke of Wirtemburgh, invested the fort of Knoque; and the king himself was posted with the second division at Becelaer on the Heule. In order to amuse the enemy, he made a variety of movements, and risked the attack of any one of his divisions by the whole French army. But Villeroy possessed not the resolution or sagacity of his immortal predecessor: and William, having completed his preparations, resolved to prosecute the siege of Namur. The enterprise was formed by the elector of Bavaria with his native troops, the forces of several German princes, and a body of cavalry. Villeroy, at length perceiving the designs of William, directed Boufflers to throw into the place seven regiments of dragoons, while he himself, instead of making any attempt to relieve Namur, resolved to fall upon the prince of Vaudemont, who lay, with an inferior force, within three leagues of his army. Notwithstanding the disadvantageous circumstances and situation of the prince's encampment, his adversary deliberated concerning the manner of attack, till the opportunity was lost. The same advantage was presented for the second time; but the prince retreated, in the presence of Villeroy, with admirable skill, and sought protection beneath the cannon of Ghent.

In the mean time, the trenches were opened before Namur. On the eighteenth of July, after forcing the French (who had attempted a sally) to retreat, William commanded the traverses and the advanced works to be stormed, and the ground taken from the enemy to be occupied with batteries. On the twenty-first of July, the king carried the first counterscarp, and the elector of Bavaria found means to throw a bridge across the Sambre, which facilitated the reduction of the place. Notwithstanding the obstinate bravery of the French, the out-works were at length carried by the besiegers, and a practicable breach was effected in the inner wall. The town capitulated on the fourth of August, and the garrison under De Boufflers retired on the sixth to the castle. Villeroy, in the mean time, having crossed the Lys and the Scheldt, made a demonstration of hastening to raise the siege, though Brussels was the real object of his designs. Under the pretext of revenging the attacks of the English fleet, on the maritime places of Flanders, he bombarded that city. After destroying fifteen hundred houses, and many public buildings, undisturbed by the prince de Vaudemont, (who, an eye-witness of Villeroy's proceedings, was unable to prevent or avenge the destruction of the town,) he directed his march towards Namur; but found the allies so strongly posted, that he retired in the silence of the night. The confederates pursued the siege of the castle with vigour; and, on the thirtieth of August, made so formidable a lodgement, that the French proposed to capitulate on the first of September. The want of success that marked the exertions of William in preceding occasions, and the loss of that important place in the last campaign, rendered its capture at the present moment peculiarly gratifying. Having enjoyed, for some time, at his favourite residence of Loo, the plaudits of his friends, and the recollection of his past success, he repaired to the Hague on the seventh of October, and after settling the operations of the next campaign, returned to England, and arrived at Kensington on the twenty-first day of the month.

The naval operations of the year were few and unimportant. St. Maloes, Dunkirk, and Calais, were successively bombarded by lord Berkeley, without exciting alarm, or being productive of extensive injury; Wilmot and Lillingston, who commanded an expedition against the French in Hispaniola, neglected the interest of the public in their eagerness for spoil; and the marquis of Caermarthen, stationed with some ships at Scilly, mistook a fleet of merchantmen for the enemy's navy, and fled, with all his sails, from the vessels which he ought to have defended.

The elections for the ensuing parliament, were decidedly in favour of the cause of William, and of those principles that contributed to the origin and success of the revolution. The two houses met on the twenty-second of November, and before any supply was voted, a bill was brought in for regulating trials, in cases of treason and misprision of treason. The bill was opposed in its progress by the adherents of the court; but, the popularity of the measure at length prevailed. By this salutary law it was provided, that no person shall be tried for high treason, unless the indictment be found within three years after the offence is committed; that the prisoner shall have a copy of the indictment, and a list of the pannel of jurors two days before his trial, and that he shall have the same compulsive power with the crown, to force his witnesses to appear. On the second of December, the commons voted a supply: two millions five hundred thousand pounds were assigned to the navy, and two millions for the support of an army of eighty-seven thousand men. The commons were for some time agitated by vehement debates respecting the currency, which terminated in passing a bill for a new coinage, and voting twelve hundred thousand pounds to supply the deficiency arising from clipped money. The sum was raised by a duty for seven years, on houses and window-lights. On the fourteenth of December, the lords sent down to the commons an address to the king, against an act passed in the Scottish parliament, for erecting a company trading to Africa and the East Indies. The commons having concurred with the peers, the two houses attended the king with their address, and were answered by William, that he had been "ill-served" in Scotland, but hoped that some remedy might be found, for the evil of which they complained. This indefinite reply was unsatisfactory to the commons; and they resolved, that the directors of the Scottish company should be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors; that a council of trade should be established by act of parliament, for the preservation of the commerce of England, and that the commissioners should be nominated by parliament, though none of them should be members of either house.

William regarded this attempt to establish a new board, by act of parliament, as a precedent for future invasions on his executive power, and he ordered his servants to oppose the bill, with all the influence of office; but the discontent of the people, occasioned by the numerous losses at sea, swayed even the dependants of the court, and the earl of Sunderland supported the bill, in opposition to the declared sentiments of his sovereign; whose disappointment and mortification were still further enhanced, by a formal complaint before parliament, from the gentlemen of Denbigh, respecting a warrant issued by the king, conferring upon Bentinck, created earl of Portland, several valuable lordships in the principality, and a part of the antient domains of the prince of Wales. The house immediately voted an address against the grant, and the king reluctantly recalled the warrant.

The discontents of the people, and the violence of the commons, re-animated the hopes of James, and awakened Lewis from his indifference. The French monarch agreed to furnish an army, and every thing necessary for a descent; troops intended for the invasion repaired to Calais and Dunkirk, and James himself arrived at the former of these places on the twentieth of February. During the progress of these preparations, one Crosby was sent over by the disaffected party, to extort from James his express approbation of a projected attempt on the person of the king; and obtained a commission for general insurrection, against William and all his adherents. This commission was placed in the hands of sir George Barclay, a native of Scotland, a man of courage, and an experienced soldier. He arrived in London in the month of January, and formed an intimate connection with one Harrison, a priest, with captain Charnock, who had formerly been a fellow of Magdalen college, Oxford, and had become a convert to the Roman catholic religion; with Porter, a captain in the army, and sir William Perkins.

After revolving a variety of enterprises, these daring and inconsiderate partisans of the late king, determined to attack William, with an armed party of forty men, in the midst of his guards. The scene of the intended treason, was the lane between Brentford and Turnham Green, through which he usually passed on his return from Richmond. But their views were disappointed by the treachery of a captain Fisher, whom the conspirators had resolved to employ in the attack. He disclosed every circumstance, relating to the conspiracy, to the earl of Portland, two days before that appointed for the execution of the design; and his testimony was confirmed by Prendergrass, an Irishman, who had joined in the conspiracy. The king, having examined them in person, requested them to avoid suspicion, by resuming their intercourse with their friends; and remained at home on the fifteenth of February, the day appointed for the execution of the plot. The conspirators, therefore, postponed the further prosecution of their design till the twenty-second of February; but on that day the king again remained at home. A panic seized the whole party; a few were able to escape, but the rest were seized in their beds on the ensuing night.

On receiving intelligence of the failure of the assassination plot, and that Russel was dispatched to the coast of France, with a fleet, consisting of 150 sail of the line, James relinquished his design of invading England, and, disembarking with his troops, returned to St. Germains.

On the twenty-third of February, his majesty informed the parliament of the plot against his person and government; and was answered by an address from both houses, congratulating him upon his happy deliverance. They also subscribed articles of association, by which they solemnly bound themselves to maintain his government, to protect his sacred person against the late king, and his other enemies, foreign or domestic. All the corporations in England followed the loyal example of the parliament. The objections of the people to William were obliterated at once, by the abhorrence of the conspiracy against his life; and the imprudence of his enemies confirmed the stability of a throne, of which his possession had before been comparatively precarious.

In consequence of a proclamation for apprehending the conspirators, several of them fled beyond sea. Of those that were apprehended, Charnock, King, and Keys were executed on the eighteenth of March; sir John Friend, and sir William Perkins, on the thirteenth of April; and brigadier Rookwood, major Lewick, and Mr. Cranbour, on the nineteenth of the same month. Some time afterwards, sir John Fenwick was apprehended, and charged particularly with having been concerned in that part of the plot, relating to the intended invasion. Having seduced one of the witnesses against him to abscond, it was found that, in case of trial, he could not suffer conviction; and an act of attainder was therefore passed, by a small majority of both houses; many of the lords and commons, though convinced of his delinquency, being unwilling that he should be punished by proceedings so contrary to the principles of the constitution. Sir John was executed on the twenty-eighth of January.

So sanguine were the expectations of Lewis, that he actually regulated his military operations in Flanders, on the supposition that the plot against the life of William would succeed: and with a design of attempting some exploit of importance, early in the campaign, while the allied army should be weakened by the absence of the English troops, he established an extensive magazine at Givet. The earl of Athlone, and lieutenant Coehorn, left Namur, at the head of forty squadrons and thirty battalions, having fifteen pieces of cannon and six mortars. With part of this army Athlone invested Dinant, and, in the mean time, Coehorn advanced to Givet, and early in the morning began to bombard the town, which, together with the large magazine established there, was wholly destroyed by four o'clock in the afternoon. Having performed this important service, the generals led their troops to their former station.

Having committed the powers of government to persons, in whose integrity he could confide, the king embarked at Margate on the seventh of May, and in the evening arrived at Orange Polder, from which place he immediately proceeded to the Hague. The French had taken the field early in the spring, but were obliged to act entirely on the defensive; and as the plans of the English monarch were rendered abortive by the scarcity of money, no enterprise of importance was attempted during the campaign. The land bank, an establishment founded on land-securities, was scarcely projected before it failed, after having greatly injured the credit of the bank of England; and all the other funds of the year proved defective.

The treasury of Lewis being exhausted, and the losses the nation had sustained having dispirited his subjects, he determined to direct his attention to conciliatory measures. He therefore dispatched an ambassador to Holland; but the states-general declined holding any conference on the subject of a peace, without the consent of William and the allies. In order to accelerate the negotiation, Lewis pursued offensive measures in Catalonia, where his general, the duke de Vendome, attacked the Spanish camp in the neighbourhood of Ostalric; but, after making several spirited assaults, and putting the enemy to considerable loss and inconvenience, he was obliged to retreat.

A peace between France and the duke of Savoy changed the aspect of affairs in Italy. This pacification, which greatly disconcerted the allies, had been long negotiated by the count de Tessé, as intermediate agent between the duke and the mareschal de Catinat. The duke, willing to secure the supplies of the year from England and Holland, concealed the treaty for some time after it was actually signed. When he professed to avow the conditions, they only seemed to comprehend the neutrality of Italy; he suppressed the terms which concerned his own interest; but, to convince the confederates that he was determined to abide by his agreement with France, he laid siege, on the thirteenth of September, to Valentia, in conjunction with the marquis de Catinat.

In the course of this summer, the French coast was harrassed and despoiled by the activity of lord Berkeley. Yet the ministry were so greatly apprehensive of an invasion, that they constantly maintained six thousand men in arms, for the protection of the maritime places. A small fleet, commanded by admiral Berbon, was dispatched to block up Dunbart in the neighbourhood of Dunkirk; but that intrepid commander, taking advantage of a thick fog, effected an escape, and directing his course towards the Baltic, fell in with a fleet of Dutch traders, under the convoy of six frigates, which he captured, together with half the merchantmen. A short time after, meeting with the outer bound fleet, convoyed by thirteen ships of the line, all his prizes were retaken, except thirteen, with which he returned to Dunkirk, having turned two of the frigates adrift, and burnt the other four.

William left the army, under the command of the elector of Bavaria, and repaired to his palace at Loo, where he indulged himself for some time in his favourite amusement of stag-hunting. After visiting the court of Brandenburgh at Cleves, and conferring with the states of Holland at the Hague, he embarked for England, and landed at Margate on the sixth day of October. On the twentieth of the same month, he opened the parliament: he informed them that overtures had been made for a general peace, but that the only means to establish the public tranquillity, was to shew themselves prepared for a vigorous and effectual war, for which purpose an immediate and liberal supply would be demanded. The commons agreed to a resolution, pledging themselves to grant his majesty such support, as should enable him to prosecute the war with vigour: and voted six millions for the service of the ensuing year. It was resolved to raise supplies, by imposing a tax on all persons, proportioned to the real value of their personal estates, their stock upon land and in trade, or their emoluments by offices or professions; and a duty of one shilling a week was exacted from all persons who did not receive alms. A resolution was formed to yield all possible support to the credit of the bank of England, and in consequence of this it was agreed, to engraft upon the capital new subscriptions to the amount of eight hundred thousand pounds, at the rate of eight per cent. interest, to be paid by tallies and bank notes. A million was subscribed in a few days; and from this period, the credit of the bank so rapidly encreased, that its bills bearing interest were esteemed better than cash.

1697. The public business was finished on the sixteenth of April, by a speech, in which the king declared his intention to leave the administration of the government in the hands of persons, on whom he could depend. An event, which happened three days after the rising of parliament, rendered remarkable the concluding paragraph. To the astonishment of the nation, William raised the earl of Sunderland to the office of lord chamberlain, in the room of the earl of Dorset, who had suffered himself to be bought out of his place with the public money. That this nobleman uniformly betrayed the late king to the views of the present, when prince of Orange, is now known, and was even then suspected: there seemed, therefore, to have been a degree of imprudence in the appointment, though the place which he held before in William's favour entitled him to a share in the management of public affairs. On the twenty-second of April, the earl was sworn privy-counsellor, and as such took his place at the board; and though at the time in correspondence with James, was one of those persons, on whom William declared to his parliament, that he could thoroughly depend.

The government being thus established, and a regency nominated, on the twenty-sixth day of April his majesty embarked for Holland, in order to be present at the congress appointed to be held on the tenth of February, for the negotiation of a general peace. The conference was opened by Callieres, the French minister, who informed the other plenipotentiaries, that he was authorised by the king his master, to agree to the following preliminary articles: That the treaties of Westphalia and Nimeguen should be the basis of the present treaty; that Strasburgh should be restored to the emperor, and Luxemburgh to the Spaniards, together with Mons, Charleroy, and all the places captured by the French in Catalonia, since the conclusion of the treaty of Nimegnen; that Dinant should be ceded to the bishop of Liege; that all the re-unions since the treaty of Nimeguen should be void; that Lorraine should be destroyed, pursuant to the treaty for that purpose; and that, immediately upon the negotiation being concluded, the king of France should formally acknowledge William to possess an indisputable claim to the sovereignty of England, and all its dependancies. The progress of this treaty was interrupted by the death of Charles XI. of Sweden, who was succeeded by Charles XII. then a minor; but the queen and five senators, to whom the late king had by his will delegated the power of government, being determined that the mediation should go forward, dispatched a commissioner to the Swedish plenipotentiary, intimating their pleasure. The demands of the imperial plenipotentiaries, and of the representatives of the several German princes, were now delivered to the mediator.

The French king, apprehensive that the house of Austria might insist on the treaty of the Pyrenees, determined to make a final effort in Flanders and Catalonia, to compel the Spaniards to accept his own terms. The campaign was opened with the siege of Aith, which surrendered in a few days. William joined the army in person on the 24th of May. The marshals De Villeroy and Boufflers were too advantageously posted to be attacked; but the king frustrated the designs of the French on Brussels and Trous. The chief efforts of Lewis continued on the side of Spain. The duke de Vendome laid siege to Barcelona by land, while the count d'Estrees blocked up the place by sea. The count de Velasco, dividing the force with which he proposed to raise the siege, was surprised in both his camps, and put to flight. The city capitulated on the last day of July, and that conquest determined the emperor and Spain to listen to proposals for a general peace.

The princess of Denmark had for six years maintained a correspondence with her father, full of assurances of duty, and expressions of repentance. The bad health of the king had awakened her ambition, and she wrote to her father, desiring to know his pleasure, whether he would permit her to ascend the throne, according to the act of settlement, should the prince of Orange (for so she called king William) happen to die. She insinuated that, should he refuse to accede to this expedient, considering the present disposition of the kingdom, he would be still further removed from the hope of regaining his authority: since the sceptre would fall into more tenacious hands, out of which it could not be so easily wrested. The reasoning of the princess was too refined for the temper of her father. He expressed his conviction, that of all restitutions, none is harder to make than that of a crown. He excused himself to his daughter, but declared his adherence to the resolution of placing himself in the hands of his former subjects.

The popular historians of England, destitute of information which accident has supplied, through the medium of the historical advocates of James, have speculated with wonder, on the mode of negotiation, preparatory to the treaty of Ryswick. The earl of Portland, on the part of the king of England, and De Boufflers, in the name of Lewis, met between the armies, and held a conference in the open field, on the tenth of July. They met again, on the fifteenth and twentieth of the same month, in the same manner. But on the 26th of July, and the 2nd of August, they retired to a house in the suburbs of Hall, and reduced to writing the terms to which they had agreed in the field. So singular a mode of negotiation involved the European world in wonder and perplexity. The documents, which have descended unexamined to modern times, unveil the mystery. Lewis, unwilling to desert James, proposed that the prince of Wales should succeed to the crown of England, after the death of William; a proposal to which the king agreed with little hesitation. He engaged to procure the repeal of the act of settlement, and, by another act, to declare the prince of Wales his successor to the throne.

The fifty thousand pounds a-year, settled as a jointure on king James's queen, was agreed to be paid: though the money was afterwards detained on various pretences. On the third of August, the king left the army, and retired to Diereu. He sent from thence the earl of Portland, to acquaint the ministers assembled at the congress, that he had adjusted his own affairs, and those of his kingdom with France; and that he earnestly desired the allies, and particularly the emperor, to hasten the conclusion of an honourable, but expeditious peace.

In these concessions to France, he yielded all his professions to England; and, by an act of indiscretion or indifference, deserted the principles to which he owed the throne. The successors provided by the act of settlement, he hated or despised; he had no children; and his few relations he did not love. Though James had displeased the nation, he had not injured William; and the son might demand compassion, but could not deserve his hatred. That his birth was spurious, was only reported to amuse and deceive the vulgar; and would no longer impress the minds of men. But James, though he could bear with patience the asserted usurpation of his nephew, would not permit his son to occupy his throne. The same parliament that had conferred the royal authority on the prince of Orange, had settled the reversion of the crown on the princess of Denmark, and by reversing the act of settlement, he disjointed the whole chain which bound the people to his government. James remembered too, that the repeal of the act of settlement would, in all probability, include a condition, that the person and conscience of the prince of Wales should be in the custody of the English. The French king urged no further a point, on which the obstinacy of the exiled monarch was so evident; and William, having arranged the terms of a pacification with Lewis, left the army on the third of August, and retired to Dieren, dispatched from thence the earl of Portland, to impress the congress, and particularly the servants of the emperor, with the expedience of acceding to a peace, no longer impeded by the disposition of the French monarch, or by his own concerns. The treaties of Munster and Nimeguen served as a basis for that with Holland. The places taken in Catalonia, the dutchy of Luxemburg, the county of Chinei, Charleroy, Mons, Aith, Courtrai, and all places united to France by the chambers of Metz and Briscoe were restored to Spain. The king of England agreed to pay fifty thousand pounds a-year, by way of jointure, to king James's queen; and Lewis XIV. engaged not to disturb William in the possession of his dominions. The peace was concluded on the 10th of September, and proclaimed in London on the 20th of October.

CHAPTER III.

WILLIAM III.

[1697 to 1702.]

Proceedings in Parliament—Establishment of an East India Company—Missionaries to America—Intrigues of Lewis—Difficulty attached to the Spanish succession—Reduction of the Land Forces—Trial of Warwic and Mohun—Valuation of the forfeited Estates—Discontents of the Scotch East India Company—Dismissal of Somers—Second Partition Treaty—Mortifications to which William is subjected—Death of the Duke of Glocester—Discussions on the Treaty of Partition—Death of King James—Impeachment of Somers—Acts relating to the Succession—The King's Illness and Death—His Character.

THE emperor agreed to an armistice with France, two days after the signature of the preceding treaties, and in the course of the following month acceded to the negotiation; having obtained in his own behalf, or in that of the empire, the restitution of several towns and districts, which had been gained to the enemy by actual conquest, or seized under specious but unfounded pretexts.

THE advantages arising to England, from the peace of Ryswick, were by no means commensurate with the amount of blood and treasure expended in the war. Though weakened and discouraged, the empire of France was neither reduced so low in spirit or resources, as to preclude her future designs on the other states of the continent, or her co-operation in the re-establishment of James: and even the present generation has reason to lament, that the intimate union, at this period, of England and Holland, involved us in that superfluous and officious interference in the affairs of the continent, from which we have escaped without destruction, by singular, and perhaps undeserved good fortune.

IN his opening speech to the two houses of parliament, William congratulated the parliament on the conclusion of the war; expressed his sorrow that the debt on the fleet and army, and the deficiency of the various funds, would preclude his people from all the relief that might otherwise have been expected; and suggested the necessity, (the revenues of the crown having been anticipated to public uses,) of a more established and regular provision for his personal necessities. He urged the experience of confirming the security of England, by the maintenance of an adequate force by sea and land; and concluded, by assuring the parliament of his determination to correct the abuses, that might have crept into the administration during the war, and effectually to suppress profaneness and atheism. The suggestion of the king, that a land-force would be necessary to the security of the kingdom, was received with dissatisfaction by the commons, who resolved, without a division, that all the land-forces of the kingdom, which had been raised since the 29th of September 1680, should be paid and disbanded. The courtiers made several efforts to procure a relaxation of this vote, but their exertions were in vain; and the earl of Sunderland, having strenuously supported the wishes of the king, was alarmed, by the violence of his parliamentary opponents, into the resignation of his office. As some compensation for the mortification thus inflicted on their sovereign, the commons voted that, in acknowledgment of his great services to the nation, £700,000 should be granted to him out of the civil list. Of this sum it was intended that £100,000 should be appropriated to the payment of the jointure of James's queen, as if she were a widow; but the removal of James from St. Germains being the condition of the payment, and that stipulation not being executed, the performance of the other parts of the contract could not be expected.

Among the other objects which attracted the attention of parliament, the establishment of a new East India Company, the punishment of smugglers with France, and of false endorsers of exchequer bills, and the investigation of the frauds committed by Knight and Duncombe, were the most remarkable. Several deficiencies having occurred, in the funds granted during the last session, a vote passed for providing for the payment of the exchequer bills. As these bills bore interest when they were re-issued, after they had been received in lieu of taxes, some of the officers of the exchequer, customs, and excise, backed them with false endorsements, in order to obtain the accumulating interest. For this fraud Duncombe and Knight were expelled the house of commons, and imprisoned in the Tower. A bill for punishing Duncombe, by the forfeiture of nearly one half of his ample fortune, was rejected by a majority of one voice in the house of lords, which commanded the release of the delinquent. He was remanded to prison by the other house, jealous of the interference of the peers, and remained in confinement during the remainder of the session.

1698. A petition being presented to the house of commons, by colonel Melchinburne, who commanded in conjunction with Walker, during the siege of Londonderry, requesting the payment of arrears to the troops employed in its defence, the commons bestowed warm encomiums on the bravery of the officers and soldiers, and recommended the petition to the king. A committee from the house of commons reported, that a pamphlet published by William Molineux, a gentleman of Dublin, was of a dangerous tendency, because it inculcated an erroneous opinion, that Ireland was not dependent upon, and unalienably annexed to the regal throne of England. The commons, therefore, addressed his majesty, imploring him to discountenance and punish all who had been or might be guilty of such nefarious attempts, a request with which the king promised to comply.

Religion next engrossed the attention of the sovereign and the nation. In reply to an address from the commons, on the general corruption and immorality of manners, William expressed his desire, that some more effectual means might be adopted, of suppressing infamous books against the Trinity. A plan was formed, under the auspices of Dr. Thomas Bray, for sending missionaries, with proper books of instruction, to the English colonies of America; and a bill having been brought into the house of commons, for the better discovery of estates given to superstitious uses, Dr. Bray presented a petition, that some part of these estates might be granted for the propagation of the reformed religion in Virginia, Maryland, and the Leeward Islands; and a society for the reformation of manners was formed under the patronage of the king, who prorogued the parliament on the third day of July, after thanking them for the many testimonies he had received of their affection. Two days afterwards the parliament was dissolved.

Though William assumed the language of satisfaction and of gratitude, the resolutions of the commons, with regard to the army, made a lasting impression on his mind. Believing himself to be left by the reduction of his forces in a state of utter insecurity, he endeavoured to avert the hostility of France, by acts of friendship and conciliation. The earl of Portland, in the capacity of ambassador extraordinary, made his public entry into Paris, with a pomp more congenial with the vanity of Lewis, than with the gravity of his own master. The pacific views of William were met with corresponding sentiments on the part of the French king, whose ambition had been for a moment repressed, by the scantiness of his remaining resources, and the general distress which pervaded his kingdom.

Yet notwithstanding the conviction of Lewis, that a long interval of uninterrupted peace would best extend his glory, and re-establish his power, he could not look with apathy or inattention at the contest for the inheritance of Spain. The only pretenders to the succession of that kingdom, prior to the treaty of Ryswick, were the emperor and the elector of Bavaria; the first, as the male representative of the family of Austria; the latter as the husband of an arch-duchess, the only surviving child of the emperor, by the second daughter of Philip IV. of Spain. The powers of Europe, from jealousy of the house of Bourbon, had contested the right of the dauphin of France, though the son of the eldest daughter, Maria Theresa. Philip himself, to her exclusion, had declared the descendants of her younger sister, Margaret, born of a second marriage, the heirs of his crown. The son of the elector of Bavaria, in default of male issue by Charles II., would therefore have possessed the whole succession, if the testament of Philip IV., or the renunciation of his eldest daughter, at her marriage with the French king, had been deemed valid and decisive.

The elector of Bavaria, either diffident of his right, or of his own power to support his claims, had applied for the protection of Lewis XIV. and had desired to know from that prince, what part of the Spanish dominions he would choose to reserve for himself. Lewis returned an evasive answer, and in December 1697, sent the marquis d'Harcourt, in the character of ambassador, to learn the state of parties in Spain, to enquire into the views of the court, and the disposition of the grandees, and above all, to discover and counteract the secret measures of the imperial ministers. Though he found that the party which favoured the lineal succession, in the family of Bourbon, were the most numerous, they had the least credit. The queen and her creatures favoured the emperor, and held the reins of government. When they despaired of the life of the king, they injured, by their eagerness, the cause they wished to promote. The prince of Hesse Darmstadt, who governed in Catalonia, supplanted the Spanish officers with Germans, and took every measure that seemed calculated to secure that province to the house of Austria, while he ultimately disobliged the Spaniards, without accomplishing his own views.

Such was the situation of affairs soon after the arrival of Portland at the court of France. Lewis XIV., wishing to preserve the peace, was anxious to enter into treaty with the king of England. But his designs were obstructed by the officious zeal of Portland, who insisted, to a degree beyond the intentions of his master, on the removal of James from St. Germains. Lewis, perceiving also that Portland was not sufficiently instructed to conclude the treaty, sent the count de Tallard with full powers to England. William disapproved of the mode of partition proposed by France; but the defenceless state, in which he had been left by his parliament, induced him to listen to any terms, calculated to continue the repose of Europe. His health was declining, and a feeble constitution had subjected him to a premature old age. The negotiation begun in France, between Lewis and the earl of Portland, was continued in England, between William and Tallard. Portland, in the mean time, was recalled, and succeeded in his embassy by his brother-in-law, the earl of Jersey. But though the negotiation advanced, it was not concluded, till William, by the dissolution of parliament, found leisure to repair to Holland.

The king appointed a regency, to govern in his absence, and departed for Holland in the latter end of July. His excuse for absence was founded on the necessity of recruiting his bodily strength, reduced by indisposition and fatigue. He appointed a regency to govern the kingdom in his absence, and, as one of the number, nominated the earl of Marlborough, who had regained his favour, and been constituted governor to the duke of Glocester. Sealed orders were left with the ministers, directing that sixteen thousand men should be retained in the service, notwithstanding the vote of the commons, by which the standing army was limited to ten thousand. Having assisted in the assembly of the states-general, and given audience to several ambassadors at the Hague, the king repaired to his house at Loo, attended by the earls of Essex, Portland, and Selkirk. There he was visited by count Tallard, the French minister, who had instructions to negotiate the treaty concerning the Spanish succession. Portland wrote a letter to lord chancellor Somers, desiring his advice with regard to the French propositions, and accompanied by full powers under the great seal, with blanks to be filled up occasionally. The purport of this letter was imparted to the duke of Shrewsbury and Mr. Montague, who consulted with the chancellor and Vernon on the subject, and the chancellor wrote an answer to the king as the issue of their joint deliberations. Before, however, it reached his majesty, the first treaty of partition had been signed by the earl of Portland and sir Joseph Williamson. The contracting powers agreed, that in case the king of Spain should die without issue, the kingdom of Naples and Sicily, with the places depending upon the Spanish monarchy, and situated on the coast of Tuscany and the adjacent islands, the marquisate of Final, the province of Guipuscoa, all places on the French side of the Pyrenees, or the other mountains of Navarre, Alva, and Biscay, on the other side of the province of Guipuscoa, with all the ships, vessels, and stores, should devolve upon the dauphin, in consideration of his right to the crown of Spain; which, with all its other dependancies, should descend to the electoral prince of Bavaria, under the guardianship of his father; that the emperor's second son, the archduke Charles, should possess the dutchy of Milan; that this treaty should be communicated to the emperor, and to the elector of Bavaria, by the king of England and the states-general; that if either should refuse to agree to this partition, his proportion should remain in sequestration till the dispute could be accommodated; that, in case the electoral prince of Bavaria should die before his father, then the elector and his other heirs should succeed him in those dominions; and should the archduke reject the dutchy of Milan, it should be sequestrated, and governed by the prince de Vaudemont.—These arrangements were in some measure intended to obviate the will of Philip, father to the reigning king of Spain, who had settled his crown on the emperor's children. It has been already observed, that the dauphin, whose right to the succession Lewis had renounced in the most solemn manner, was son to Maria Theresa, the daughter of Philip; and the electoral prince of Bavaria was grandson to a daughter of Spain.

The king of Spain, who, contrary to the wishes and expectations of the contracting parties, had become acquainted with all the particulars of the treaty, resenting a division of all his dominions by foreigners, executed a will, declaring the electoral prince of Bavaria his universal heir, according to the testament of Philip IV. in favour of the descendants of his second daughter, to the exclusion of the house of Bourbon. The king himself unexpectedly recovered; and the hopes and fears of Europe were for a while prolonged.

After an absence which excited the jealousy of his subjects, who did not perceive, without uneasiness, his evident partiality to residence in Holland, William arrived in England on the third of December. Three days after the parliament met, and having chosen sir Thomas Littleton for their speaker, they recommended a strict attention to naval and military affairs; exhorted them to proceed in the payment of the public debts; and suggested the expedience of adoping some plan for employing the poor and encouraging trade.

The house of commons voted, on the 16th of December, that all the land forces in England should be reduced to 7000 men, and those to consist of the native subjects of the king; and that the forces in Ireland should be reduced to 1200 men. The king struggled hard to retain his Dutch guards, but without success. The number of men to be kept at sea was fixed at 15,000, to consist of seamen only; the house of commons perceiving the possibility of the sovereign keeping up an army under the name of marines. For the maintenance of these forces they gave an aid of £1,484,015 by a land-tax and subsidy of 3*s.* in the pound; and a clause was added to empower four commissioners to take an account of the estates forfeited in Ireland during the rebellion, and since February, 1688, and the quality, nature, and value of all such estates, and particulars of their grants and disposition. Certain complaints having been made by the house, in an address to the king, of mismanagement in the navy, which the earl of Orford applied to himself, that nobleman surrendered his places. On the 4th of May, the king prorogued the house to the 1st of June. 1698.

Among the other public acts of this period, the earl of Warwick and lord Mohun were tried at Westminster, in the latter end of March, by the house of peers, for the murder of Richard Cooke, esq. Warwick was found guilty of man-slaughter, and Mohun acquitted.

The king landed in Holland on the third of June; and besides receiving the compliments and visits of all the foreign ministers, was greeted with letters of acknowledgment from the grand Seignior and Peter the Great, for his mediation in the treaty of peace, which was concluded, on the sixth of January, between the plenipotentiaries of Mustapha II., the emperor Leopold, and the Czar of Muscovy; and soon after by those of the republic of Venice. He returned to England on the 17th of October, and opened the parliament on the 17th of November, in a speech recommending, as usual, a provision for the safety of the kingdom by sea and land, the 1699.

discharge of several debts, and the payment of the arrears to the princess of Denmark. On the fourth of December, the house presented an address to the king, expressing their suspicion, that some one about his majesty had endeavoured to misrepresent and create dissatisfaction towards them; a suspicion which the king declared, with frankness and promptitude, to be totally unfounded.

The commissioners appointed to examine and take account of the forfeited estates, delivered their report, from which it appeared, that the number of persons who were outlawed was 3921, of whom 1283 had been permitted to reverse their outlawry; that the total of the lands forfeited to the crown amounted to 1,060,792 acres, the value of which, calculating lives at six years' purchase, and inheritance at thirteen years' purchase, amounted to £2,685,130. Of these there had been restored 233,106 acres, amounting in value to £784,923. After every deduction and expence, the actual gain to the crown amounted to £1,699,343. A grant had passed the great seal to Elizabeth Villiers, now countess of Orkney, (a woman peculiarly favoured by William,) of all the private estates of the late king James, containing ninety-five thousand acres, worth £25,995 a-year.

The commons having examined this report, resolved unanimously, on the fifteenth of December, that a bill should be brought in to apply all forfeitures in Ireland, from the 13th of February 1689, to the use of the public. A clause was ordered to be inserted in the bill for erecting a judicature for determining claims touching the said forfeitures, but, at the same time, the house came to a resolution not to receive petitions from any person whatsoever. This uncandid proceeding offended the dispassionate, and disgusted the king. Two of the commissioners, sir Richard Leving and sir Francis Brewster, did not sign the report, and for that reason were allowed but five hundred pounds each, while £1000 was assigned to each of the rest out of the forfeitures. Sir Richard Leving was committed to the Tower, for asserting, that a member of the house wrote to the commissioners, to make a separate article of lady Orkney's grant, as that might implicate a certain person. Montague repeated this information to the house, and applied it to the king, giving for his authority Methuen, lord chancellor of Ireland. Methuen disclaimed the imputation. The commons voted that Montague's report was false and scandalous, and that the four commissioners who had signed the report, had acquitted themselves with understanding, courage, and integrity.

On the 18th of January, and the 13th of February, the commons passed severe votes against those who had procured, and the ministers who had passed grants of the forfeited estates; and they resolved that they should be applied to paying off the army. To secure the passing of their original bill, thus augmented and explained, they annexed it to the grant of the land-tax, under the denomination of a bill of supply. An attempt was made to impede its progress in the house of lords; but after many conferences with the commons, and many indications of violence on the part of the latter, William transmitted a private letter to his friends among the lords, desiring them to withdraw their opposition. The bill was immediately passed without amendments, and William came suddenly to the house, gave his assent to the act of assumption, and prorogued the parliament without any speech from the throne.

The vexations of William were augmented by a dispute on the subject of the Scotch East India Company. They transmitted a petition to the king, in behalf of a captain of one of their vessels, who went into Carthagena to refit, and was there, together with thirteen of his men, detained and treated with inhumanity. Lord Basil Hamilton, however, having never waited upon the king, or given any testimony of his allegiance, was refused admission to his presence, received it through the medium of his secretary, and replied that he would demand of the king of Spain the release of the captain and his crew. The company resented the denial to lord Hamilton, but their expostulations were fruitless. On the twelfth of February, the house of lords presented an address to the king, representing that the Scottish settlement at Darien might tend to the prejudice of England, and to the disturbance of the peace with Spain. The Scotch, exasperated and alarmed, immediately entered into subscriptions for the defence of their property, and drew up a national address to the king, which was presented on the 26th of March. The parliament of Scotland met on the 21st of May, and the duke of Queensbury, the high-commissioner, delivered the king's letter, which contained in general terms assurances of his favour and protection, desiring that the forces might be retained, and a supply granted for that purpose. The council-general of the Indian and African company, made a representation to parliament of their case. Addresses poured in from all parts of the country, and a vote was proposed in the house, that the colony of Caledonia in Darien was a legal settlement, and that the parliament would maintain and support it. The high-commissioner, desirous of impeding these proceedings, adjourned the parliament for three days, and afterwards for a longer time. A number of the members drew up an address to the king, who, being more than once pressed for an answer, wrote a letter to the privy council, in which he declared his readiness to give all possible relief, exhorted them to avoid dissensions that might affect their own security, and give advantage to their common enemies. He assured them that important business abroad was the occasion of their adjournment, and that the parliament should meet on the fourteenth of May for the dispatch of business. The discontents of the Scottish nation were not relieved or pacified by these professions, and a general revolt might have occurred, had the power of the kingdom borne any proportion to the resentment of the people.

With the view of conciliating the favour of the house of commons, which had shown itself personally adverse to lord Somers, the king deprived that nobleman on the 21st of May of the great seal, and conferred it upon sir Nathan Wright.

The king departed for Holland in the beginning of August. The greater portion of his leisure, in the former part of the year, had been devoted to the negotiation for the second partition of the dominions of Spain; but a desire of persuading the emperor to enter into the same engagements, long prevented the king and the states of Holland from signing the treaty, though the terms had been long arranged. In the month of October the emperor, after various evasions, formally rejected every treaty of partition; yet neither the king of England, nor the states shewed any eagerness to close with France, till, in the beginning of January, in this year 1700, the king of Spain so manifestly declined, that his death was daily expected. This circumstance hastened the conclusion of the treaty, which was signed at London, on the twenty-first of February, by the earls of Portland and Jersey, and the comte de Tallard, and at the Hague on the fourteenth of March, by Briord, the French ambassador, and the plenipotentiaries of the states.

By this second division of the dominions of Spain, scarcely a vestige remained of the original arrangement. The name of the archduke Charles was substituted for that of the electoral prince of Bavaria, as heir of the kingdoms of Spain and of the Indies. Naples, Sicily, the marquisate of Final, the islands on the Italian shore, and the province of Guipuseoa, were to be possessed by the dauphin, together with the dutchies of Lorraine and Bar, which their native prince was appointed to exchange for the dutchy of Milan. The country of Binche was allotted to prince Vaudemont. To prevent the union of the Spanish and Imperial crowns, in the person of one prince, provision was made, that, in case of the archduke's demise, the king of the Romans should not succeed to the throne; and in like manner it was particularly stipulated, that no king or dauphin of France should ever wear the crown of Spain. A secret article provided against the contingency of the emperor's refusing to accede to the treaty, and against any difficulties which might arise from the duke of Lorraine, with regard to the projected change of his native territories for the dutchy of Milan.

The kings of Poland and Denmark, with the Czar of Muscovy, had entered into a confederacy against the young king of Sweden, and the Danish troops invaded Holstein, whose duke was brother-in-law and ally to the king of Sweden. King William and the states-general, perceiving that every specific application from Sweden was ineffectual, resolved to rescue the oppressed. A squadron of thirty vessels was detached to the Sound, and arriving there on the thirtieth of July, compelled the Danish fleet to take refuge in their own harbours, and the Danish monarch to accede to such terms as were prescribed by the mediators. On the 18th of August, a peace was concluded between Sweden, Denmark, and Holstein.

Soon after the return of the king to England, in the middle of October, he addressed a letter to the parliament of Scotland, which assembled on the 28th, expressing his concern for not being able to assert the company's right of establishing a colony at Darien, without disturbing the peace of Europe, and recommending the raising of taxes adequate to their defence. Intelligence that the colony at Darien had been compelled to abandon that settlement, occasioned a national address to the Scottish parliament, which contained a list of numerous grievances, and gave rise to long and vehement debates. Yet the opposition gradually subsided, and on the 21st of January 1701, the Scottish parliament voted to king William an address of congratulation, expressing their determination to support his person and government to the utmost of their power.

After learning the death of the nominal duke of Glocester, whose patent was never made out, in consequence of a superstitious prejudice against the title, the king returned on the nineteenth of October to England. The young and lamented prince was son to the princess of Denmark; and William, who had never entertained any affection for the mother, was not (it may be presumed) much displeased to see her influence weakened by the death of her son. A prevalent belief that she had transmitted to her father, James, a notification of the circumstance, contributed to lessen the concern of William for the loss she had sustained.

Dissatisfied with the conduct of the parliament, William prorogued that assembly to the twenty-first of November, and dissolved them after a further prorogation. While he was thus revenging his past, and averting future disappointments at home, his views of policy abroad were confounded and deranged, by the conduct of Charles II. of Spain, who, having long struggled with a complication of infirmities, resigned his breath on the first of November. Having resolved to prevent the partition of his kingdom, his inclination, in the appointment of an heir to all his dominions, inclined in favour of the house of Austria; but the pope, whose advice he had solicited by letter, and the clergy of Spain, influenced by the cardinal Porto Carrero, so far prevailed over his superstitious timidity, that he nominated the duke of Anjou, the second son of the dauphin, the successor to all his rights and dominions. In his will, which was dated the second of October, he recognised the claims of his sister, the infanta Maria Theresa, queen of France, and mother of the dauphin. He acknowledged the right of his aunt, Anne of Austria, the mother of the French king, and consequently the right of the dauphin, as only heir by the laws of the kingdom. To prevent an alarm in Europe, at the union of such an extensive dominion to France, the dauphin's second son was called to the throne of Spain. Until this prince should arrive at Madrid, and until he was of age, a council of regency, with the king at their head, was appointed for the administration of affairs. On the death of Charles, the regency ordered the will to be delivered to the king of France; and Lewis consulted his council, in which it was resolved to relinquish the second partition treaty, and adhere to the testament of the late king of Spain. It had always been foreseen, that a war would be inevitable on the death of that prince; and the court of France concluded, that it would be much easier to keep possession of the whole kingdom, by virtue of the will, than to retain and conquer the share allotted to the dauphin, by the treaty concluded with England and the states.

It was obvious also to Lewis, that, should he refuse the bequest made to his grandson, all the dominions of Spain must fall into the hands of the emperor. The courier that conveyed the will to France, was ordered, in case of the refusal of that court, to proceed to Vienna, and tender the throne to the archduke. The resolution of accepting the will by the French court, was succeeded by the precaution of forming alliances abroad. Lewis entered into a treaty with the king of Portugal, and with the dukes of Savoy and Mantua. On the side of Germany, France estimated among her allies the duke of Brunswick Wolfembuttle, the duke of Saxe Gotha, and the bishop of Munster. The elector of Bavaria, then governor of the Netherlands, and his brother the elector of Cologne, were uncles to the new king of Spain, and resolved to maintain his right to the crown.

The disappointment of Leopold, the emperor, terminated in his claiming the Milanese as a fief of the empire, and his issuing a mandate to the inhabitants of that dutchy, which they were to obey, on pain of being considered as rebels. Vain, and irresolute, without respect abroad or resources at home, his conduct excited not the terror, but the ridicule of the house of Bourbon; but peace was still an object of anxiety to the French court, and its pacific intentions were counteracted by the servility of Spain, which empowered Lewis to take possession of the barrier in Flanders with French troops; a measure which excited the utmost jealousy of William, but in which the difficulties attached to domestic government compelled him for the present to acquiesce, so far as to acknowledge the duke of Anjou for the lawful sovereign of Spain.

Exasperated and harrassed by the refractory spirit of the parliament, during the last session, William determined to change his servants, and to decide the balance of influence in favour of the Tories. On the death of lord Lonsdale, the earl of Tankerville was removed into the office of privy-seal, and was succeeded at the head of the treasury by lord Godolphin. Sir Charles Hedges left the board of admiralty, and was made secretary of state. The earl of Rochester, a leader of the Tories, was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland, and Montague, who had suffered so much mortification in the commons, was removed into the house of peers, under the title of lord Halifax.

In Scotland, the national address for the meeting of parliament was defeated by actually calling it together; and a conciliating letter from William, promising protection to any measure that might remunerate the African and Indian companies, or promote their interests, soothed the anger of the Scottish nation, and restored it to a state of unexpected and unusual tranquillity.

1700. The English parliament met in February, and Mr. Harley was chosen speaker of the house of commons. The king remarked, in his speech, that their most serious attention would be requisite to the general politics of Europe, in consequence of the changes and embarrassments occasioned by the decease of the king of Spain; and after expressing his grief at the death of the duke of Glocester, recommended to his faithful parliament, a further provision for the regular succession of the crown in the protestant line. The whole of the succeeding session was distinguished, in the house of commons, by the violence of debates, rather than by the wisdom of its measures. Several members of the house had determined to present an address to his majesty, imploring him to recognise the title of the new king of Spain; but the success of the motion was prevented by the remark of one Monckton, who expressed his belief, that if it were carried in the affirmative, the next vote would be for owning the pretended prince of Wales. Whatever may have been the futility of this observation, it allayed the violence of the turbulent, and so effectually silenced the parents and supporters of the address, that it was silently withdrawn.

In reply to his majesty's speech, the house assured him, in the customary way, of their attachment to his person and government, and declared their readiness to maintain the protestant religion. Having expressed his gratitude for their loyalty, the king requested their advice respecting the memorial he had received from the states-general, by which he learned that they had acknowledged the duke of Anjou as king of Spain; that France had agreed to a negotiation, in which they might stipulate the necessary conditions for securing the peace of Europe; and that they were firmly resolved to do nothing without the concurrence of his majesty, and of the other allies. The commons desired that all treaties between England and Holland might be submitted to their inspection; and having examined them, presented to his majesty an address, requesting that he would engage in such negotiations as would most effectually conduce to the mutual advantage and security of Great Britain and the United Provinces, and to the preservation of the general peace of Europe. After assuring him, that they would do every thing in their power towards enabling him to fulfil his contract with the states-general, they voted that provision should be made, from time to time, for making good the principal and interest on all parliamentary funds, and passed a bill for renewing the bills of credit, commonly called exchequer bills, which received the royal assent on the 13th of March.

An intercepted letter, containing no material information, from the earl of Melfort to his brother the earl of Perth, was treated by the commons with contempt, but produced an address to his majesty from the house of peers. Having taken into consideration the part of the king's speech relating to the succession, the house of commons resolved, That for preserving the happiness and peace of this kingdom, and the security of the protestant religion, it was absolutely necessary that a further provision be made for the limitation and succession in the protestant line. But the most important business of this session, related to the treaty of partition. The whole of the late treaties and other important papers, having been examined by a committee of the whole house, an address was presented, reflecting with warmth and justice on their tendency, and containing many insinuations, obnoxious to the court. Within the walls of the house of commons, the treaty was denominated a felonious treaty. An address was carried to remove the earl of Portland, lord Somers, and lord Halifax, from William's presence and councils, and it was ordered that they should be impeached at the bar of the house. The house of lords, hearing of this address, presented a counter-address to the king, beseeching his majesty, that as those lords had been impeached at the bar, he would not pass any censure upon them before they were tried and judged. The gentlemen of the grand jury of Kent presented a petition to parliament, signed by 12 justices, and about 250 gentlemen, imploring the house to have regard to the voice of the people, and to turn its loyal addresses into bills of supply, that the king might be enabled to assist his allies, before it was too late. The petition was voted insolent and seditious, and five gentlemen who presented it were ordered into custody, and afterwards committed to prison. In consequence of these events, a bold memorial was transmitted to the speaker, and subscribed Legion, which vehemently expostulated with the house on their late proceedings. The commons, however, persevered in their impeachments. The articles exhibited against the earl of Oxford accused him of obtaining grants, and converting the public money to his own use, of enjoying offices inconsistent with each other, of encouraging Kidd, a pirate, who exercised piracy on the Indians, in his capacity of commodore to the ships of several private adventurers to Madagascar; of sparing the French fleet when it might have been destroyed, and of advising the treaty of partition. The charges against lord Somers were nearly the same, with the addition, that in his office of chancellor he had asserted doctrines inimical to the constitution; as an instance of which criminality, in the case of the bankers, creditors to Charles II., he acknowledged their right, but denied their pretensions to a remedy.

In the house of peers, the articles against the impeached lords were regarded as frivolous, and were languidly maintained. The two houses fell into an irreconcileable difference upon the mode of proceeding. The commons insisted, that the lords whom they had impeached should abstain from voting in the upper house; and that a committee should be selected from each of the houses, to adjust the time, manner, and order of the intended trials. The lords refused the first demand, as it seemed to include a condemnation before conviction; to the second they replied, that the sole right of judicature was in themselves, and that they retained the exclusive privilege of appointing the time, manner, and order of trials and impeachments. After the most vehement disputes, between the two houses, the peers appointed the days of trial. The commons refused to appear, and the impeached lords were acquitted.

In the course of the session it was voted, that whoever should hereafter ascend the throne of England, should join in communion with the national church, as by law established; that if the crown of England should descend to any individual, not a native of England, the consent of parliament should be required, to enable him to engage in any war for the defence of territories or possessions which do not belong to the crown: that no future sovereign should leave the dominions of England, Scotland, and Ireland, without the consent of parliament; that no alien, though naturalized, unless born of English parents, should be a member of the privy-council or of parliament, or hold any place of trust or emolument; that the princess Sophia, dutchess dowager of Hanover, should be declared the next in succession to the crown of England, after the reigning king, the princess of Denmark, and the heirs of their respective bodies; and that the further limitation of the crown should be restricted to the heirs of Sophia, and the heirs of her body being protestants. A bill, of which these resolutions formed the basis, was passed, after much opposition, on the fourteenth of April.

In the resolution declaring the rights of Sophia, the commons were influenced by a just respect to hereditary descent. An act of parliament had excluded all catholics from the succession; and the descendants of Charles I., except William and the princess of Denmark, were of the popish persuasion. The parliament, therefore, was obliged to return to the posterity of James I. in another line, and to Sophia, as grand-daughter to that prince by his daughter Elizabeth, who had been married to the unfortunate king of Bohemia.

Having prorogued the parliament on the twenty-fourth of June, William departed in the next month for Holland, and passed his summer at the Hague, in counteracting the intrigues of Lewis. The king of England and the states agreed with the emperor, to undertake the recovery of Flanders, as a barrier for Holland, as well as the dutchy of Milan, for the security of the emperor: and a treaty, which obtained the name of the grand alliance, was signed on the seventh of September; of which the professed objects were, an adequate satisfaction for the emperor in the Spanish succession, and security for the dominions and commerce of the allies. It was stipulated, that the king of England and the states might retain for themselves whatever lands and cities their arms should conquer in either of the Indies.

Neither the alarm nor the preparations of Lewis were commensurate with the threatened danger. His ambition was chilled by the frost of age, and his resources exhausted by a long continuance of war, and the necessary decline of commerce; his people were harrassed and dissatisfied by continual and capricious changes in the value of the currency, an evil aggravated by the quantities of bullion expended in the pay and equipments of his armies abroad, and by repeated and extravagant, but ineffectual bribes, to the ministers and confidential servants of the several courts of Europe.

The condition of Spain was equally deplorable; and the French king, conscious at length of his own unfriended and desperate situation, attempted to secure the permanent alliance of the duke of Savoy, by offering to that prince the most advantageous terms, and guaranteeing the marriage of his daughter to the king of Spain. He concluded also a treaty with the king of Portugal. This profusion, and his proffers of friendship, were rewarded with treachery and ingratitude; the duke of Savoy betrayed the interests and the views of France in the very first campaign; and the latter deserted her alliance, as soon as circumstances rendered it convenient.

Surrounded by so many difficulties, and conscious of the limited extent of his resources, it is not probable that Lewis would have been excited to any immediate display of hostility, had not an event occurred, which necessarily produced a considerable change in the policy of Europe. This was the death of the late king, who, in the month of September, as he was performing his religious offices, was seized with a lethargy, and after languishing for some days, expired on the sixth of September; having previously been assured, in the most solemn manner, on his death-bed, that Lewis would become the protector of his family, and acknowledge his son, "as he then certainly would be," king of Great Britain and Ireland. On the death of James, his son was saluted by Lewis by the name of your Majesty; but the usual ceremony of proclamation implying the claim of the English monarchs to the crown of France, his adherents, from motives of prudence and discretion, abstained from that solemnity.

Having matured and almost completed a perpetual alliance between the English and the Dutch, for the recovery and preservation of Flanders, William embarked on the 14th of November, and landed the next day at Margate. He found, on his arrival, that the animosities of contending parties, however mitigated in violence, had not yet subsided; and disgusted by the remembrance of the mortifications to which he had been subjected during the preceding year, he dissolved the parliament on the 13th of November, and issued writs for another, which he summoned to meet on the 30th of December, 1701.

Upon the meeting of parliament, 1702.
Mr. Harley, abetted by the Tories, was elected speaker, notwithstanding the exertions of the court in favour of sir Thomas Lyttleton. William, in his opening speech, exhorted the house to refrain from those dissensions and animosities, which had before so fatally divided and weakened the empire; and assured them, that on the progress and result of their present proceedings it depended, whether England was to hold the balance of Europe, and remain gloriously distinguished as the head of the protestant interest. He expatiated on the indignity offered to the nation, by the acknowledgment of the prince of Wales by the French king; he explained the dangers to which England was exposed, by placing the grandson of Lewis on the throne of Spain; and after lamenting the necessity of subjecting his people to new burthens, expressed his willingness that the accounts should be annually submitted to the inspection of parliament. This speech was received with unexampled applause, and obtained so much influence with the multitude, that it was printed and engraved with decorations, in the English, Dutch, and French languages, and became the general ornament of taverns, and places of festivity. The houses of parliament, in reply, presented an address, repeating their former professions of attachment and fidelity, and of their determination to support his throne against the audacity of the pretended prince of Wales, and the treachery of the French king. This address was succeeded by several others; and a bill for the attainder of the prince of Wales, being sent from the commons to the other house, the peers attached to it a clause of attainder against the queen, who acted as regent for the pretender. A bill of abjuration was brought into the house of commons, by sir Charles Hodges, that should be obligatory on all persons who possessed employment in church or state; and warm debates having arisen upon the question, whether the oath should be imposed or voluntary, it was carried in favour of imposition by a majority of one. A clause was inserted, making it equally penal to compass or imagine the death of her royal highness the princess Anne of Denmark, as to compass or imagine the death of the king's eldest son and heir. The bill was violently opposed in the house of lords, and when it passed on the 24th of February, ten peers entered their protests against it.

The earl of Nottingham had moved an address to the king, requesting that he would dissolve the Scottish parliament now sitting, as the legality of it might be disputed, from its having been originally a convention, and that a new parliament should be summoned, in which they might treat about the union of the two kingdoms. But the ferment prevailing in Scotland, in consequence of the failure of the Darien enterprise, rendered it impolitic to press the measure at so critical a juncture, and it was determined that, for the present, the project should subside.

After much deliberation, William had suggested a plan for effectually reducing the power of France; and had engaged, previous to his return from Holland, in a treaty with the prince of Hesse d'Armstadt, who assured him, that if he would take Cadiz, the admiral of Castile, and several other grandees of Spain, would declare for the house of Austria. The allies had also determined on the siege of Keyserswaert, which had been delivered up to the French by the elector of Cologne; Landau was to be invested by the king of the Romans, and Lewis of Baden; the elector of Hanover had agreed to disarm the princes of Wolfembuttle; and the emperor promised to send a powerful reinforcement to prince Eugene in Italy. William did not survive to mature, or attempt the important enterprises connected with these arrangements. His constitution was evidently impaired, notwithstanding his endeavours to conceal the progress of his malady; and his end was hastened by a fall from his horse, on the 21st day of February 1702, which fractured his collar-bone. On the fourth of March, he was so far recovered, as to walk without assistance in the gallery at Kensington; but while resting on a couch, he was overpowered by sleep, and on awaking was seized with a fever and diarrhœa. The prescriptions of his physicians gave no promise of relief, and perceiving that his dissolution was approaching, he granted a commission for declaring the royal assent to the malt tax, and the act of abjuration; and being unable to write his name, he affixed to the commission, in the presence of the lord-keeper and the clerks of parliament, a stamp provided for that purpose. He listened with coldness to the communications of Albemarle, who had just arrived from Holland, and replied with impatience in French, "I approach the end of my life." After thanking his physicians, he received the sacrament from archbishop Tennison, and Burnet, bishop of Salisbury. To some of the privy-council and the peers, who were admitted from the adjoining apartments, he spoke a few words: he expressed his grateful sense of lord Auverquerque's long and faithful services, and delivered to Albemarle the keys of his closet and escrutoire, observing that he knew what to do with them. The earl of Portland, for whom he had repeatedly enquired, did not arrive till he was speechless. William grasped his hand, and pressed it to his heart, with every mark of the most affectionate regard. He expired on the eighth of March 1702, in the 13th year of his reign, and the fifty-second of his age. On the twelfth of April, his body, after lying in state at Kensington, was deposited in Henry VII.'s chapel, and in the beginning of May his will, which had been confided to Monsieur Schuylemburg, was opened at the Hague. He had appointed as his heir, his cousin prince Frison of Nassau, stadtholder of Friezland, and nominated the states-general his executors; bequeathing by a codicil the lordship of Breevert, and a legacy of two hundred thousand guilders to the earl of Albemarle.

The person of William was small, his skin fair, his features delicate; his nose aquiline, his eyes lively and expressive, his air grave and deliberate, but not commanding. He was an expert but ungraceful horseman: and his skill, as an equestrian, combined with his love of estrangement from the multitude, attached him to hunting, as his sole amusement. At the head of his armies he displayed more courage than genius; and nearly all his military projects terminated in disappointment. Born for war, and intently occupied with the magnitude and utility of his views, he neglected those external indications of suavity and condescension, which might have gained the favour and secured the attachment of his people. He was averse to flattery, and above the influence of polished address. His knowledge of character was intuitive, and his first impressions, if unfavourable, were seldom eradicated by subsequent experience. He had no attachment to religion, but as it was connected with the policy of the state. His predominating passion was the love of military glory and political power, objects to which he sacrified the ties of nature, and every impulse of sensibility. In his conduct towards James, it was observed by his enemies, that he had adopted the maxim of Julius Cæsar, that justice might be violated where that violation conferred a sceptre. Fortunately for Europe and for England, his duty as a statesman coincided with the bias of his personal inclinations; and his love of power, and ardour for military reputation, contributed to prepare the way for the independence of the continent, and for the establishment of the English constitution; a foundation, which has equally defied the assaults of anarchy, and the insidious approaches of corruption.

CHAPTER IV.

ANNE.

Accession of Anne—State of Parties—The Campaign abroad—Expedition to Vigo—Unfortunate Expedition of Admiral Benbow—Discontents in Scotland—Accession of Charles to the Throne of Spain—Elections—Skilful and successful Operations of Marlborough—Battle of Hochstedt, or Blenheim—Capture of Gibraltar—Exploits of the Earl of Peterborough in Spain—Progress towards the conclusion of a Union—Debates on the Dangers of the Church.

ANNE, princess of Denmark, daughter of James II. and the next protestant heir to her sister Mary, succeeded peaceably to the crown on the death of William, notwithstanding the divisions at home, and the complicated nature of the English relations abroad. Those who adhered to the principles of the revolution were satisfied with her accession, because she was married to a protestant prince, had joined in the revolution, and to outward appearance had always adhered to the same principles. Nor was she opposed by the party which secretly favoured the pretender; they indulged a secret hope that a queen, who displayed so much partiality to her father would entertain no enmity to those who had espoused his interest: and being herself past all hopes of having more children to inherit the crown after her decease, they imagined that this circumstance would render her indifferent to the succession in the house of Hanover.

The late king, whose whole life had been spent in continued opposition to the king of France, had left England on the eve of a war with that monarch. The present sovereign was on this occasion urged by opposing councils; a part of her ministry being inclined for war, while the other no less ardently declared for pacific measures. At the head of those who endeavoured to prevent the renewal of hostilities, was the earl of Rochester, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and first cousin to the queen. He proposed in council, that the English should avoid a declaration of war with France, and act, even under the most urgent circumstances, only as auxiliaries. In support of his opinion, he urged the impossibility of England's reaping any advantage by the most distinguished success upon the continent; and reprobated the folly of involving the nation in debt, to increase the riches of its commercial rivals.

The chief of those who declared for prosecuting the war, was the earl, (since, better known by the title of duke) of Marlborough. This nobleman, though he had deserted James at the revolution, had still a secret partiality for the Tories; and, during the whole of the preceding reign, had paid the utmost attention to the present queen. He married a lady who was honoured by Anne, as her private confidant, and who possessed over her unbounded influence. Through the medium of the countess, he was able to direct the resolution of the queen, as might best be consistent with his policy and convenience, and to oppose the measures of his rivals in the cabinet. A majority of the council yielded to the influence or the reasons of the earl of Marlborough, and war was declared in form on the fourth of May.

The first speech of the queen to her parliament was severely censured, as deliberately and unnecessarily casting a reproach on the memory of William. She assured the two houses, that her own heart was entirely English, and that they should always find her a strict observer of her word. She expressed her determination to co-operate steadfastly with her allies, in reducing the exorbitant power of France, recommended a union with Scotland, and desired that the revenue for the support of the civil government should be renewed in a manner suitable to her own honour, and the dignity of the crown. The answers and votes of the parliament were echoes of her speech, and testified the gratitude or the temporizing policy of both parties, by a liberal acquiescence in her views, and a ready compliance with her wishes and demands.

The campaign abroad was opened by the siege of Keyserswaert, a small but strong town on the Rhine, in the electorate of Cologne. The town was invested on the sixteenth of April; and though the siege was obstructed by the badness of the weather, it capitulated on the 15th of June. Marshal Boufflers, having been joined by two bodies of troops, under the duke of Burgundy and count Tallard, made a hasty march to Nimeguen; but the inhabitants of that town, though despairing of success, by almost unexampled exertion, dragged the cannon from the arsenal, and, unaided by horses or carriages, planted 160 pieces on the walls. Their preparations, however, were rendered unavailing, by the presence of the Dutch army, under the earl of Athlone; who, arriving half an hour before the French forces, prevented the enemy from obtaining a free entrance into the Netherlands. The earl of Marlborough reduced Venlo, Ruremonde, and the citadel of Liege; and having thus opened the navigation of the Maese, and the communication with the town of Maestricht, concluded with reputation the campaign on the side of Flanders.

Prince Eugene, the general of the emperor, had surprised Cremona, but was expelled from the place, by the valour of the Irish troops in the French service. The marshal de Villeroy was taken prisoner by the Germans, and the command devolved on the duke de Vendome; though the young king of Spain, having left the government in the hands of the queen, had passed into Naples, and taken the nominal command of the army. The general Viscomti was defeated, and prince Eugene compelled to raise the blockade of Mantua. The advantages obtained by the French in Italy, were succeeded by a victory on the Upper Rhine, over the Imperialists under the prince of Baden, by the marquis de Villars, who had been detached from the army commanded by the marshal de Catinat. In the course of the campaign, the loss of many important towns, on the part of the French, was counterbalanced by the number of their victories in the field.

Marlborough, on his return to London, was received with every mark of public approbation. He was thanked for his services by the house of commons, and created a duke by the queen. The glory which he had acquired on the continent, consoled the nation for some unsuccessful expeditions at sea. Sir J. Munden had permitted a French squadron of fourteen ships to escape him, by taking shelter in the harbour of Corunna, for which he was dismissed the service. An attempt was made on Cadiz by sea and land; sir George Rooke commanding the navy, and the duke of York the land forces: but this enterprise also miscarried.

Admiral Benbow had been detached to the West Indies, in the preceding year, with a squadron of ten sail, to distress the enemy's trade. He discovered the French squadron near St. Martha, and immediately formed his line of battle. The rest of his fleet, having taken some disgust at his conduct, permitted him almost alone to sustain the whole fire of the enemy. The engagement however, continued till night, and he determined to resume it the next morning, when he had the mortification to perceive, that all his ships had fallen back except one, which joined him in urging the pursuit of the enemy. For four days successively did this intrepid seaman, assisted only by one ship, engage the enemy, while his officers, at a distance behind, remained inactive spectators of his activity. His last day's battle was more furious than all the former. While alone and unsustained, he engaged the whole French squadron, his leg was shattered by a cannon-ball. He then ordered that they should place him in a cradle upon the quarter-deck, where he obstinately maintained the fight as before, until, at length, his ship being quite disabled, was unfit to continue the chase any longer. When one of the lieutenants expressed his sorrow for the loss of his admiral's leg; "I am sorry for it too," said Benbow, "but I had rather have lost both my legs, than have seen the dishonour of this day. But do you hear, if another shot should take me off, behave like brave men, and fight it out."

He soon after died of his wounds. His cowardly associates, Kirby and Wade, were tried by a court-martial, and sentenced to be shot. Hudson died before his trial. Vincent, Fog, and Constable escaped with slighter punishment. Kirby and Wade were sent home in the Bristol man of war; and, on their arrival at Portsmouth, shot on board the ship, by virtue of a warrant for their immediate execution.

The house of commons having chosen Mr. Harley for their speaker, the parliament was prorogued till the twentieth of October. On that day, the queen having returned from her progress to Bath, Oxford, and Bristol, descanted, among other topics in her speech to the two houses, on the disappointment at Cadiz, and assured them of her regard for the political and religious liberties of her people. The lords returned an address of thanks, congratulating her majesty on the success of the arms of the duke of Marlborough; and the commons, of whom the majority were influenced by a rooted hatred to the memory of William, determined, after vehement debates, to assure her majesty, that the wonderful progress of the arms of the duke of Marlborough, had "retrieved" the antient honour and glory of the British nation.

The confederate fleets, consisting of fifty ships of the line, thirty English and twenty Dutch, commanded in chief by sir George Rooke, having failed in the attack upon Cadiz, the admiral and the duke of Ormond, who commanded the troops, determined to make an attempt on Vigo, where the Spanish galleons, under the convoy of thirty French ships of war, had just arrived. They came unexpectedly before the place, and discovered the enemy's vessels moored behind a streight, defended on the one side by a castle, on the other by platforms mounted with cannon, together with a strong boom formed of masts, cables, and chains thrown across the entrance. The duke of Ormond took the castle on the 12th of October, and vice-admiral Hopson, in the Torbay, broke through the boom. The French admiral, perceiving that resistance would be fruitless, ordered all the ships to be set on fire. The English and Dutch attempted to extinguish the flames, and partly succeeded. Six men of war were taken, seven sunk, and nine burnt. Of thirteen galleons, four were destroyed and nine fell into the hands of the conquerors. The booty, notwithstanding the quantity of treasure removed by the enemy, was immense; the successful issue of the enterprise equally defeated the hopes of Spain, and excited the exultation of the English; and on the duke of Ormond's return to London, he was received with the strongest testimonials of favour from the queen, and with the loud acclamations of the populace.

The discontents in Scotland had been exasperated by the continuance of the old parliament, and the appointment of the obnoxious duke of Queensbury as commissioner. A condescending letter from the queen was received with indifference; and when the parliament met on the ninth of June at Edinburgh, the duke of Hamilton rose in his place, and protested (before the commission was read) against the present sitting. He offered his reasons in a short speech to the house, and communicated a paper to the same purpose, containing his own protest, and that of such members as might adhere to his opinion. He immediately left the house, attended by eighty of the members. Those who remained behind passed a resolution, declaring the present meeting a legal parliament, and discharging all persons from disowning its authority, under the penalty of high treason. In the course of their sitting, the earl of Marchmont, attempted to introduce a bill to prevent the succession of the crown to the nominal prince of Wales; but the overture was discouraged by the court, and the parliament was adjourned to the 18th of August.

A THANKSGIVING was appointed, for the success at Vigo; and, on the 12th of November, the queen went in person to St. Paul's, attended by the lords and commons.

Sir John Packington having made a complaint to the commons against the bishop of Worcester, for an undue interference in elections, she removed that prelate, at the request of the house, from the office of almoner, notwithstanding the counter-address of the lords; to whom she declared, that though she had not received any proof of the complaints against the bishop of Worcester, she considered it as her undoubted right to continue or displace any of her servants at pleasure. In return for the queen's compliance, the commons resolved, that the yearly sum of one hundred thousand pounds should be settled upon the prince of Denmark. A message, however, from her majesty, suggesting the propriety of some return for the great services of the earl of Marlborough, and proposing to settle upon him, and on his heirs for ever, £500 per annum, which she had already granted him out of the post-office during her own life; was met by a reply, that the house could not comply with a precedent to alienate the revenue of the crown. Marlborough was obnoxious to the Tories, for having deserted James II.; and hated by the Whigs, for having betrayed the confidence of the late king. Though insinuating and plausible in his manners, above the majority of his rivals and contemporaries; yet his habits of pecuniary meanness, and his evident ambition, counteracted, to a certain extent, the influence of his great and valuable qualities.

THE house of commons, after choosing Mr. Harley for their speaker, granted the supplies requisite for the support of the war, and voted forty thousand seamen and an equal number of land-forces to act in conjunction with the allies. Admiral Rooke was honoured by the thanks of the house, and sworn of the privy-council. On the recommendation of her majesty, it was unanimously resolved that her husband, prince George of Denmark, should receive one hundred thousand pounds per annum in case he should survive the queen.

1703. EARLY in the year the house resolved, that ten thousand men should be raised as an augmentation of the forces to act in conjunction with the allies; but a discovery having been made that the French king remitted money to the elector of Bavaria in Germany, and to his forces in Italy, by means of the merchants of England, Holland, and Geneva, the commons granted this assistance on the express condition, that a termination should be put to all commerce or correspondence with France and Spain on the part of the states general. In the house of commons there were warm debates on a bill, introduced by the Tories, for preventing occasional conformity. After meeting the approbation of the lower house, it was passed, with several amendments, by a small majority of the lords. At the close of debates, the houses agreed to a conference, but the peers persisting in their alterations, and the commons declining to acquiesce, the bill miscarried.

A BILL was introduced into the house of commons, granting a longer term of one year to those who had neglected to take the oath of abjuration. Three clauses were added to this bill, declaring that those persons who should take the oath within a limited time, might return to their benefices and employments, provided they were not already filled; that any person endeavouring to disturb the succession of the crown, as limited by law, should be deemed guilty of high treason; and that the oath of abjuration should be imposed on the subjects of Ireland. The bill was powerfully opposed by the Tories, but passed in the house of lords, by a majority of one voice; a circumstance which excited the warmest exultation, in the adherents of the principles on which the constitution was founded, and in the zealous friends of the protestant establishment.

IN the course of the campaign abroad, the Dutch forces, under Opdam, were surrounded near Breda by the French, and totally discomfited; a misfortune, more than counterbalanced, by the successes of the allies on the Lower Rhine, and of the duke of Marlborough in the Netherlands. On the 25th of August, the town of Huy was taken by the allied army, and Leinburgh surrendered, after a siege of eighteen days. Guelders being taken in December, the French were driven from the banks of the Maese, and the allies became masters of Spanish Guelderland. In the same month the campaign was concluded, by the surrender of Augsburgh to the elector of Bavaria.

THE duke of Marlborough was dispatched to congratulate the archduke Charles, in the name of the queen, on his elevation to the throne of Spain. He was graciously received by the king, who accompanied the duke to England; where he arrived on the 26th of December, and whence he departed on the 10th of February. 1704.

THE house of lords presented an address, reporting their conviction that a dangerous conspiracy had been formed, for exciting and conducting a rebellion in Scotland, with the intention of invading that kingdom by a French power, of furthering the views of the pretended prince of Wales, and of subverting her majesty's government. The discontents, however, of the Scotch, and the alarms of the legislature, gradually subsided; and it was finally resolved, by the house of commons, that no reason could be assigned, for the support of a regular army in Scotland, during a period of tranquillity.

The election of members had long been a subject of contention in parliament, and of clamour and complaint throughout the nation. Persons had been admitted to a seat in the house of commons, who had no right to that dignity; and others had been excluded, however regularly and lawfully elected. A check was at last given to this growing evil, by the resolution of one man. Matthew Ashby had always enjoyed the right of voting for the town of Aylsbury; but, in the last election, he had been deprived of that right by the constables who made the return. Provoked at this injustice, he brought an action at the assizes, where sentence was given in his favour, and the constables were cast in damages.

The cause was removed into the superior courts, and in them determined against Ashby. The votes of the commons were vehement, and decidedly hostile to his claim; but the lords appointed a committee to draw up a state of the case, and upon their report resolved, that by the known laws of this kingdom, every freeholder or other person, having a right to vote at the election of members to serve in parliament, and being wilfully hindered by the returning officer from giving his vote, might maintain an action in the queen's courts against such officer, in order to assert his right, and recover damages for the injury; and that the deterring electors, when deprived of their right of voting, from prosecuting actions in the courts of law, was a flagrant attempt to prevent and impede the course of justice.

The tenths, or first-fruits, a burthen imposed on the clergy during the holy wars, and allotted as a fund for the support of the Crusades, had long been a part of the royal income. The queen relinquished, in this year, her right to this source of revenue, and the fund was devoted to the augmentation of small benefices; a change which was acknowledged with joyful gratitude, and has proved of essential benefit to the church.

The affairs of the emperor were, at this time, in a most deplorable condition. The elector of Bavaria was master of the Danube, as far as Passau; the malcontents in Hungary had rendered themselves formidable by their success; Vienna was threatened by a siege on both sides, and was only saved by the want of concert between the Hungarians and Bavarians. In this depressed and hazardous condition, the emperor implored the assistance of her Britannic majesty, and his entreaties were enforced by the influence of the duke of Marlborough, who had previously concerted, with the deputies of the states-general, the plan of the campaign. The ostensible object of the confederates, was to carry the war to the banks of the Moselle, for general Auverquerque to act on the defensive in the Netherlands, and for the duke of Marlborough to conduct the principal operations, with the main army, on the Rhine.

On the duke's arrival at the Hague towards the latter end of April, he held a conference with a deputation of the states, concerning the proposal of sending a large army to the Moselle. The deputies of Zealand remonstrated against the danger of sending their troops to a distance so considerable; but the duke, to prevent all further objections, explicitly informed them, that he had orders to march thither with the British forces.

After assembling his army at Maestricht, he began his march into Germany on the 18th of May. The French, unaware of his design, sent a detachment of seven thousand men to the Moselle, and circulated a report that they intended to attack Huy. Disregarding these indications, the duke proceeded by Bedburgh, Kerpenord, Kaliecken, and visited the fortifications of Bonne; at which place he received information, that the recruits and reinforcements of the French army in Bavaria had joined the elector at Villingen. This intelligence only induced him to advance with redoubled diligence. On the 3rd of June, he passed the Neckar, and halted at Ladenburgh; from whence he wrote a letter to the states-general, informing them of his design to march to the relief of the empire, and expressing his hope, that they would allow their troops to join in the honour of the expedition, a request with which they readily complied. At Mildenheim the duke was met by prince Eugene, and Lewis prince of Baden; and it was determined, that the duke and Lewis should command alternately from day to day, while prince Eugene should lead a separate army on the Rhine. The latter proceeded to Phillipsburg; while the duke, being joined by the Imperial army, under Lewis, and marching by Elchingen, Gingen, and Landthaussen, came in sight, (on the first of July) of the enemy's entrenchments at Dillingen. He encamped with his right at Amerdeghem, and his left at Onderingen. Understanding that the elector of Bavaria had sent the best part of his infantry, to reinforce the count d'Arco, who was posted behind strong lines at Schellenburg, a rising ground on the Danube, near Donawert, he resolved to attack their intrenchments. Having passed the Wermitz, on the next day, after a tedious march over almost impassable roads, he began the attack with the Dutch and English infantry, supported by the horse and dragoons. Their efforts to dislodge the enemy were unsuccessful, and they were about to give way, when prince Lewis, arriving with the Imperialists at another part of the line, accomplished so powerful a diversion in their favour, that they forced the intrenchments. The infantry were closely followed by the cavalry, and attacked the enemy with so much impetuosity, that they fled with the utmost precipitation to Donawert, leaving behind them six thousand men upon the field of battle. The loss of the allies was proportioned to the obstinacy of the contest.

The elector of Bavaria abandoning Donawert, crossed the Danube in his march to the river Leche; and the allies detached four thousand men to pass the latter of these rivers, and occupy a position in the country of the elector, who had taken refuge under the walls of Augsberg. Neuburg was entered by the confederates, and Rain invested.

The marshals Villeroy and Tallard, having passed the Rhine at Fort Khel, to succour the elector of Bavaria, the confederates detached prince Maximilian of Hanover, with thirty squadrons of horse, as a reinforcement to prince Eugene. Rain, Aicha, and Friedburg, having surrendered, the elector of Bavaria was reduced to the last extremity. Having been offered very advantageous terms of peace, provided he would abandon the French interest, and join the Imperialists in Italy, he pretended to listen to the duke of Marlborough's proposals, and agreed to a negotiation. On the approach of the French, he declared his determination to adhere to his prior engagements. His duplicity exasperated the allied generals, and they ravaged the country as far as Munich.

The elector, being joined by Tallard, resolved to pass the Danube at Lewingen, to attack prince Eugene before Hochstedt; and though their first movements were disappointed by the vigilance of the prince, they accomplished their purpose. The duke of Marlborough, therefore, joined the forces of Eugene at the camp of Munster, on the eleventh day of August; prince Lewis being engaged in the siege of Ingolstadt. The enemy were strongly encamped; having Hochstedt in their rear, their right wing extended towards the Danube, near the village of Blenheim, which is three miles lower down the Danube, and their left to Lutzingen, which is six miles N. W. by W. from Blenheim, near the side of a wood, which reaches down to the river Kessel, behind which the confederates were encamped. The camp of the allies extended to Munster, upon the Danube, where it receives the Kessel; and their right wing reached beyond the village of Appershoven. By this situation it appears, that they had the river Kessel extending in their front, three-fourths of which was also covered by a wood, lying to the right, and shooting to the left of the enemy's camp, between the east end of which and the Danube, there lay a narrow aperture to the left, by which it was intended to march and attack the enemy.

When the elector and the French marshals perceived that the confederates were resolved to give them battle, they threw twenty-eight battalions and eight squadrons of dragoons into the village of Blenheim. Eight battalions, at the same time, were placed in another village, towards the centre, with a design, in conjunction with those at Blenheim, to fall upon the rear of the allies, as they should approach, and place them between two fires. Such was the situation of the French on the morning of the thirteenth of August. Their wretched disposition insured the loss of the battle. Their line consisting chiefly of cavalry, formed at the head of their camp, was weakened by large detachments, while the enemy were permitted to pass the morass, formed by a rivulet which ran from the wood into the Danube, without obstruction.

The duke of Marlborough, who commanded the left of the allies, having formed his line, after passing the rivulet, ordered the two villages to be attacked immediately by the infantry, while he himself led his cavalry against those of Tallard. After various charges, the courage of the French horse began to abate, and they retired behind the fire of ten battalions, which advanced while the cavalry were engaged. These sustained the charge for a considerable time against the English foot; but the duke, having charged home the French cavalry, already wavering, drove them in their flight into the Danube, and most of those who escaped the sword were drowned in that river. The ten battalions of the enemy's foot were, at the same time, charged on all sides, and cut to pieces. Prince Eugene, who commanded on the right, had attacked the elector of Bavaria, and the marshal de Marsin. The prince, however, could make no impression on their line; but when they perceived that Tallard was defeated, they threw themselves into three columns, and quitted the field with dexterity and expedition. The troops stationed in the village of Oberclaw escaped in the confusion; but the twelve squadrons of horse, and twenty battalions of foot, in Blenheim, surrendered at discretion.

THE confederates remained masters of the enemy's camp, cannon, and baggage. Count Tallard himself was among the numerous prisoners of rank; 10,000 men, exclusive of 1200 officers, and 3000 deserters, was the lowest amount of the captives, and the total loss, including the killed and wounded, was not less than 40,000 men. There were found in the enemy's camp 100 pieces of brass cannon, with other warlike stores, and baggage in proportion. The loss of the allies amounted to 4485 killed, 7525 wounded, and 273 prisoners.

ON the next day, when the duke of Marlborough visited his prisoner, marshal Tallard, the latter assured him that he had beaten the best troops in the world. "I hope sir," replied the duke, "you will except those troops by whom they were conquered."

IN consequence of this victory, the allies became masters of a country a hundred leagues in extent. After finishing the campaign, the duke repaired to Berlin, where he procured a reinforcement of eight thousand Prussians, to serve under prince Eugene in Italy. He thence proceeded to negotiate for succours at the court of Hanover, and soon after returned to England, where he was received with the most affecting testimonials of national gratitude. The parliament and the nation in general were willing to second him in all his designs. The manor of Woodstock was conferred on him by both houses; and when he entered the house of lords, an eulogium was pronounced on his eminent services, by the lord keeper. The queen, not contented with these marks of respect, directed the comptroller of her works to build him, in Woodstock park, a magnificent palace, which remains a monument of the general's merits, and of her own munificence. The queen and the nation were little aware, that at the very moment when he was thus loaded with benefits and acclamations, he was engaged in correspondence with the excluded family; and had given them, at the commencement of the campaign, the strongest assurances of attachment and fidelity.

DURING the important operations of the campaign abroad, the transactions in Scotland engaged the attention of the nation at home. The country party, enflamed at the interference in the preceding year of the English house of lords, with a plot, supposed to have existed in Scotland, and in which Simon Frazer, lord Lovat, was a principal agent, joined themselves more closely with that party, whose almost avowed intentions were to serve the interest of the excluded family. The discontents extended from the senate to the people; and, during the remainder of the year, Scotland was one continued scene of intrigue and turbulence.

THE arms of England were not less fortunate by sea than they had been by land. The ministry understanding that the French were employed in equipping a strong fleet at Brest, sent out sir Cloudesley Shovel and sir George Rooke to watch their motions. Sir George had further orders to convey a body of troops, under the prince of Hesse d'Armstadt, in transport-ships to Barcelona, on which a fruitless attack had been made by the prince. But sir George having no confidence in the success of this expedition, the troops were re-embarked in two days afterwards, and being joined by sir Cloudesley, he called a council of war on board the fleet, while it lay off the coast of Africa, in which the admirals resolved to make an attempt upon Gibralter. The garrison was weak, and unprepared for attack. The prince of Hesse landed his troops, to the number of 1800, on the isthmus, and summoned the tower to surrender, but without effect. Next day the admiral gave orders for a vigorous cannonade; and perceiving that the enemy were driven from their fortifications, at a place called the Louth Mole-head, ordered all the boats to be armed, and to assault that quarter. Those officers who happened to be the nearest the Mole, manned their boats, and entered the fortification sword in hand; but the Spaniards springing a mine, two lieutenants and about one hundred men were killed and wounded. Two captains, however, took possession of a platform, and kept their ground, until they were joined by the rest of the seamen, who took by storm a redoubt between the Mole and the town. The governor immediately capitulated; and, astonished at his own success, the prince of Hesse took possession of the fortress.

When the intelligence of this conquest arrived in England, it was for some time debated whether the admiral deserved, by his exploit, the thanks of the parliament. It was finally decided, that the circumstances under which it was performed did not deserve the public gratitude, a resolution which was probably influenced by the indecisive issue of a battle fought with the compte de Thoulouse, about twelve leagues from Malaga. The English and Dutch fleets under sir George Rooke and admiral Calemburg, consisted of fifty-two vessels, the same number with that of the enemy. In the first onset, both fleets were materially crippled; for two successive days the English admiral endeavoured to renew the engagement, but the French fleet declined the conflict, and soon disappeared. Sir George Rooke was treated with neglect, and afterwards deprived of his command.

The present parliament, according to the triennial act, approaching its termination, the queen, in order to establish the antient prerogatives of the crown, dissolved it by proclamation on the fifth of April. The elections in general, especially in boroughs, were decidedly in favour of the Whigs. During these domestic transactions, the war abroad was prosecuted with vigour. The duke of Marlborough, having concerted operations with the states-general, took the field at the beginning of May. His great object was to improve the victories of the last campaign, by carrying the war, by the Moselle, into the heart of France; a design which was prevented by the jealousy or inactivity of the prince of Baden, and by the sluggishness of the other German princes, notwithstanding the death of the emperor Leopold had placed at their head his son Joseph, an active and enterprising monarch. Disappointed in his expectation of being joined by the German troops, the duke de camped in the night, passed without molestation the dangerous defile of Tavareu, directed his march towards Liege, and, joining the Dutch under Auverquerque, induced the enemy to retire behind their lines. Except the occurrence of a few subordinate operations, the rest of the campaign was comparatively inactive.

The recovery of Gibralter having become one of the first objects of the Spanish monarchy, the marquis of Villadurias was sent with a large army to retake it. The Spanish commander, however, was obliged to raise the siege, on the twenty-third of April, after having had occasion to witness, a few days before, the defeat of De Pointis; whose ships, consisting of five men-of-war, were surprised in the bay, and taken or destroyed by an English squadron, under sir John Leak.

To conduct the armament intended to support the cause of the archduke Charles in Spain, and which accompanied that prince from England, the earl of Peterborough offered his assistance. This nobleman was one of the most extraordinary characters of the æra in which he lived. When but fifteen years of age, he fought against the Moors in Africa; at twenty he assisted in effecting the revolution; and he now, from friendship to Charles, carried on the war with Spain almost at his own expence. He was deformed in his person, but of a mind generous, honourable, and active. His first attempt, on landing in Spain, was to besiege Barcelona, a strong city, with a garrison of 5000 men, while his own army amounted to little more than 9000. The operations were begun by a sudden attack on Fort Monjuic, strongly situated on a hill that commanded the city. The outworks were taken by storm, with the loss of the gallant prince of Hesse. The besiegers then directed their fire against the body of the fort; when a shell, chancing to fall into the powder magazine, blew it up, and destroyed the governor, with several subordinate officers. This accident struck the garrison with such consternation, that they surrendered without further resistance. The town still remained unconquered; but batteries were now erected against it, and in a few days the governor capitulated. After the surrender of this important fortress, Valentia and all Catalonia submitted to the new king. His partisans occupied Madrid, and the land forces of the allies took up their quarters in the heart of the kingdom.

On the 25th of October, the parliament met, and after a violent contest between the Whigs and Tories, the former supporting Mr. Smith, and the latter Mr. Bromley, Smith was elected by a majority of 43 votes. On the fifteenth of November, lord Haversham, after having in a set speech addressed the house of peers, and inveighed against the conduct of the allies and of the duke of Marlborough, concluded with a motion, that her majesty should be solicited to invite the princess Sophia, presumptive heir to the crown, (according to the act of settlement) into England. A proposal of the same kind, when urged by the Whigs, had been rejected by the Tories themselves when possessed of power: but the motion was obnoxious to the court; the advocates of the measure were now compelled to become the most strenuous of its opponents; and it was superseded by a bill, for the eventual formation of a regency, which effectually secured the kingdom, by providing a continuation of legal government, till the successor should arrive and assert his own authority.

During these disputes between the parties, with regard to the internal affairs of England, the two houses proceeded almost without debate, in the business of the union with Scotland. The act declaring the Scots aliens, by a certain day, was reversed; and an offensive act, relating to the manufacture and trade of Scotland was repealed.

Sir Rowland Gwynne, a busy, selfish, and intriguing man, had repaired to the court of Hanover, to gain the favour of the electoral family, by alarming their fears concerning the succession to the British throne. Upon the subject of the invitation to the princess Sophia, Gwynne wrote a letter to the earl of Stamford, which found its way to the press. The commons, on the 8th of March, voted this letter to be a scandalous, false, and malicious libel. The lords concurred with them in an address to the queen, who returned for answer, that she would comply with their request, and give orders to prosecute the printer and author.

On the 6th of December, a debate was held in the house of lords concerning the danger of the church. The act of security in Scotland, the loss of a bill of occasional conformity in England, the absence, beyond sea, of Sophia of Hanover the next successor to the crown, the increase of presbyterian academies, and the licentiousness of the press, were adduced by the Tories as proofs of the dangers of the church. On the other side, it was contended that the Scotch act of security regarded only temporal concerns; that the absence of the successor was supplied by the act of regency; that the bill of occasional conformity, having been considered and rejected by the house, the question was now determined; and that the licentiousness of the press had been carried to the greatest extremities, by the pretended friends of the church of England. A vote was passed, with which the commons concurred, That the church was in a safe and flourishing condition; and that whoever should suggest that it was in danger, was an enemy to the queen, the church, and the kingdom.

Progress of the Union—Its Conditions—Victories of Marlborough—The Battle of Ramillies—Rising influence of the Tories—Siege of Barcelona—Campaign in Spain—Capture of Majorca and Ivica—A Quixotic Expedition against France—State of Foreign Politics—Bombardment of Toulon—Intrigues of Godolphin—Suspicious Conduct of Harley—Expedition in favour of the Pretender—Weakness of the Kingdom—Battle of Oudenarde—Arrest of Count Martuof—Return of Marlborough—Ludicrous Address to the Queen—The Distresses and Misfortunes of France—Intrigues of Marlborough to prevent a Pacification—Conclusion of the Conferences—Surrender of Tournay—Battle of Malplaquat.

1706. DURING these transactions, with respect to the affairs of England alone, a measure of the greatest importance to the nation engrossed the attention of the queen, the senate, and the people. The union of the kingdoms of England and Scotland had formerly been projected by Henry VIII., who offered his daughter Mary to James V. of Scotland; and promised to invest him, on the conclusion of the marriage, with the title of duke of York, and to declare him lord-lieutenant, or deputy-governor of England. The influence of the French party, and the Roman catholic clergy, prevented him from acceding to the offer: his refusal excited the anger of Henry, who declared war against him; and at the battle of Solway Moss, James, being deserted by his nobility, was totally defeated, and soon after died of sorrow and vexation. Edward VI. proposed a marriage between himself and Mary of Scotland, but similar results attended this second overture: a new war commenced between the nations, and the Scots were again defeated at Pinky near Musselburgh. James I., soon after his accession to the English throne, recommended the parliament to promote (as far as possible) a union between the two kingdoms. Certain articles were agreed on, by forty-four English and thirty Scotch commissioners; but none of these articles were enacted, except one, which repealed the hostile laws existing between the two nations. The disturbances of the reign of Charles did not leave the power or the opportunity of attending to extensive schemes of legislative policy. The long parliament resumed the consideration of the subject, but were dispersed in the midst of their deliberations, by the violence of Oliver Cromwell. The attempts of Charles II. were ineffectual. The time of James II. was exclusively directed to the restoration of popery, or the attainment of arbitrary power. In the reign of William, the lords passed a bill, authorising his majesty to name commissioners for treating on the subject, but the commons refused to grant their concurrence, and the plan miscarried.

In the beginning of this year, an act of parliament was passed, empowering commissioners, named on the part of both nations, to treat on the preliminary articles of a union, which should afterwards undergo a more deliberate discussion by the legislative bodies of both kingdoms. The commissioners having met in the council-chamber of the Cock-pit, near Whitehall, their commissions being opened, and introductory speeches being pronounced by the lord-keeper of England, and the lord chancellor of Scotland, the conference began. The Scottish commissioners were inclined to a federal union, like that of the United Provinces; but the English strenuously contended for an incorporation, which should destroy the independent existence of the Scottish parliament. The proposals of the Scotch commissioners, however, were rather intended to satisfy the clamours of the populace, than advanced with any expectation of their success. The conference was twice visited by the queen, who exhorted the commissioners to promote the happiness of the two kingdoms, by the immediate conclusion of the treaty. It was accordingly finished, signed, and sealed on the 22nd day of July, and next day presented to her majesty at St. James's, by the lord-keeper in the name of the English commissioners, and by the lord chancellor of Scotland in the name of the commissioners for that kingdom. It was stipulated in this treaty, That the succession to the united kingdom should be vested in the house of Hanover. That the united kingdoms should be represented by one and the same parliament; that all the subjects of Great Britain should enjoy a communication of privileges and advantages; that the laws concerning public right, civil government, and policy should be the same throughout the united kingdoms; but that no alterations should be made concerning private right, except for the evident benefit of the subjects of Scotland: that the courts of Session, and all other courts of judicature in Scotland, should remain as constituted by the laws of that kingdom, with the same authority and privileges as before the union; that Scotland should be represented in the parliament of Great Britain, by sixteen peers and forty-five commoners, to be elected in such a manner as should be decided by the present parliament of Scotland; that all peers of Scotland should be considered as peers of Great Britain, and rank immediately after the English peers of the like degrees at the time of the union, and before such as should be created after it; that they should enjoy all the privileges of English peers, except that of sitting and voting in parliament, or sitting upon the trial of peers; that all the insignia of royalty and government should remain as they were; and that all laws and statutes, in either kingdom, so far as they might be inconsistent with the terms of these articles, should be declared void by the respective parliaments of the two kingdoms.

These were the principle articles of the union, and it only remained to obtain the sanction of the legislature of both countries, to give them the authority of law. In the Scottish parliament, a letter was read from her majesty to the parliament, in which she expatiated on the advantages of the proposed union to both parts of the empire, and exhorted them to ratify the treaty with as little delay as might be consistent with sound deliberation. The duke of Queensbury delivered two speeches, enforcing the contents of the latter, and then prorogued the parliament. At their next meeting it appeared, that a strong party was formed against the union, composed of the secret friends of James, convinced that the union between the two kingdoms would preclude every future hope of his restoration; and the presbyterians, who concluded that their church would be in danger, from the little influence which the Scots were expected to possess in the English parliament. To induce the Scottish parliament to adopt the measure, it was alleged by the ministers, that a union of the two kingdoms would be the solid foundation of a lasting peace; it would secure their religion, liberty, and property; remove the animosities that prevailed among themselves and the jealousies that subsisted between the two nations. It would increase their strength, riches, and commerce, and entirely free both nations from all apprehensions of different interests. It was urged that the taxes, which, in consequence of this union, they were to pay, were by no means so great proportionably as their share in the legislature. That their taxes did not amount to a seventieth part of those supplied by the English, and yet their share in the legislature was not a tenth part less. Such were the arguments in favour of the union, addressed to the Scottish parliament. In the English parliament it was observed, that a powerful and dangerous nation would thus for ever be prevented from giving them any disturbance; that in case of any future rupture, England had every thing to lose, and nothing to gain, in her contests with a nation signalized for courage, and which had not attained such a degree of riches as to invite depredation. It was contended, on the other hand, that the union of a rich with a poor nation, was only beneficial to the latter, that the Scots yielded with reluctance to this coalition, that it might be likened to a woman married without her consent and that the land-tax paid by the Scots was disproportioned to their share in the legislature.

While these contentions raged in the houses of parliament, the resentments of the people were exasperated to the most outrageous transports of fury and revenge. Edinburgh and Glasgow were filled with tumults. A multitude of rigid presbyterians, under the title of Cameronians, formed themselves into regiments, provided horses, arms, and ammunition, and marching to Dumfries, burnt the articles of union at the market-cross, justifying their conduct in a public declaration. The firmness, however, of the ministry, and the justice of their cause, were finally victorious. The Scottish parliament approved and ratified all the articles of the union, among which a stipulation was now inserted, from regard to the wishes of the honest but alarmed presbyterians, declaring the presbyterian doctrine to be the only government of the church of Scotland, unalterable in all succeeding times, and a fundamental article of the union.

While the English and Scottish legislatures were thus contributing to augment the power and happiness of the nation at home, the exploits of her generals abroad were not less conducive to her own glory, and to the benefit of Europe. The French king had determined to reinforce his army in Flanders, so as to be in a condition to act offensively against the duke of Marlborough. That nobleman assembled his army between Gross-Waren and Borschleon; in addition to which force, consisting of 8000 men, he expected reinforcements from Denmark and Prussia. Lewis ordered the elector of Bavaria, and the marshal de Villeroy, to attack the grand army before the junction could be effected. The duke, however, was joined by the Danes; and on Whit-sunday, early in the morning, advanced with his army, in eight columns, towards the village of Ramillies, where he learnt that the enemy were on their march to give him battle. Villeroy had posted his army in a strong camp, his right was flanked by the river Mehaigne, his left was defended by a marsh, and the village of Ramillies lay in the centre. Marlborough, with his usual prudence, accommodated his plan to this disposition. Knowing that the left wing of the enemy could not pass the marsh to attack him, but at a great disadvantage, he weakened his troops in that quarter, and greatly increased his numbers in the centre, with which he made a furious attack. The enemy's centre was obliged to yield, and soon gave way on all sides. Their cavalry was so closely pursued, that nearly the whole of it was cut to pieces. The elector of Bavaria and the marshal de Villeroy saved themselves with the utmost difficulty. Several waggons of the French vanguard, breaking down in a narrow pass, obstructed the way in such a manner, that the baggage and artillery could not proceed, nor could their troops defile in order. The victorious horse, being informed of this accident, pressed upon them so vigorously, that great numbers threw down their arms, and submitted. The pursuit was followed through Judoigne, till two o'clock in the morning, five leagues from the field of battle, and within two of Louvaine. The enemy lost their baggage and artillery, about one hundred and twenty colours and standards, six hundred officers, six thousand prisoners, and eight thousand killed or wounded. Prince Maximilian and prince Montbason were killed; De la Beaume, the son of the marshal Tallard, the marquises de Bar and de Nonant, monsieur de Montmorency, nephew to the duke of Luxemburgh, and many other persons of distinction were taken prisoners. The loss of the allies amounted to three thousand men, among whom Lewis of Hesse and Mr. Bentinck were killed. The French general retired with precipitation to Brussels, while the allies took possession of all Brabant. The city of Paris was thrown into the utmost consternation. Lewis, who had long been accustomed to triumph in the rapidity and extent of his conquests, humbled and dispirited, entreated for peace, but in vain. Even his capital began to dread the approach of the conquerors. France was beginning to totter on the brink of ruin, when an unexpected change in the politics of England proved her deliverance. The councils of the queen had hitherto been governed by a Whig ministry, who pursued the policy of the late king, and impressed with a republican spirit of liberty, strove to humble despotism in every part of Europe. But a series of prosperous events; the personal virtues of the queen; and the influence of the clergy, who returned her attachment to that body, by zealous and sometimes indecorous loyalty; all coincided to depress the spirit of independence, to render every measure and every opinion unpopular, that did not coincide with the views, or flatter the prepossessions of the court. The spirit and tenets of the high church party, and of the advocates of passive obedience, began extensively to prevail; and the court was surrounded by the avowed opponents of those liberal principles, by which the nation was influenced in the establishment of William on the throne.

The Tories converted the ascendancy they were gradually gaining in the public opinion, to the purpose of undermining the influence over the court and the people, of the duke of Marlborough. They represented him, not entirely without justice, as a self-interested man, who sacrificed the real interests of the nation, by protracting a ruinous war for his own glory and emolument. They attributed the weight of taxes to his boundless ambition and avarice; and prophesied the most distressing calamities from the continuance of the war.

The campaign in Catalonia was favourable, at the outset, to the cause of France; but Charles, having thrown himself into Barcelona, was there besieged by Philip, and with difficulty effected his escape. The earl of Peterborough, who had hastened to his relief with 2000 men, finding it impossible to enter the city, kept post upon the hills, and alarmed the besiegers with repeated skirmishes. At length, sir John Leake sailed from Lisbon, with thirty sail of the line; and on the eighth of May arrived in sight of Barcelona. The French admiral had scarcely heard of his arrival, before he quitted the harbour in affright, and returned to Toulon. In three days after his departure, Philip abandoned the siege, and retired in disorder, leaving behind his tents with the sick and wounded.

In Portugal, the numerical superiority of the allies enabled the earl of Galway, with 20,000 men, to lay siege to Alcantara; and in three days the garrison, consisting of three thousand men, surrendered themselves prisoners of war. He afterwards marched to Placentia, and advanced to the bridge of Almaras; but the Portuguese would penetrate no further, until they should know the fate of Barcelona. Informed at last that the siege was raised, they consented to march to Madrid Philip, suspecting their intention, hastened to that capital; but, conscious that he could not retain its possession, and despairing that it would ever be possible for him to return, he sent, with his queen, all his valuable effects to Burgos, whither he followed her in person, after destroying all that he could not carry away. The capital being thus abandoned, it was entered by the earl of Galway, in the latter end of June; but an army of Portuguese, with a heretic at their head, was a very disagreeable sight to the Spaniards, who retained all the pride, though they wanted the courage of their ancestors. The presence of Charles at Madrid would have decided the contest for the succession of Spain; but he continued to loiter away his time at Barcelona, till the end of July. Philip, encouraged by the indolence of his rival, recovered his spirits; and having received from France a powerful augmentation of his army, returned to Madrid. Charles, having at length proceeded to Saragossa, where he was acknowledged as sovereign of Arragon and Valencia, arrived in the beginning of August in the Portuguese camp, with a small body of troops, and was followed, at the head of 500 dragoons, by the earl of Peterborough. Disappointed in his expectation of the chief command; influenced by jealousy of the prince of Lichenstein, the favourite of Charles; and precluded from the object of his ambition, by the seniority of the earl of Galway and the count de Noyelles, Peterborough embarked on board of an English ship of war, and set sail for Genoa. The English fleet took the town of Alicant by assault, and its castle by capitulation, protected Carthagena, and was afterwards detached, in different portions, to England, Lisbon, and the West Indies. Carthagena at length surrendered; a loss which was more than counterbalanced by the capture of the islands of Majorca and Ivica, which the English fleet subjected to the dominion of the archduke. The fortunes of France, on the side of Germany, were less unfortunate than during the three last campaigns, owing to the declining health of the prince of Baden, and the inactivity of the court of Vienna. The French, under Villars, compelled the Imperialists to raise the blockade of Fort Lewis. Drusenheim was abandoned by the prince of Baden, and occupied by the enemy; and had the disasters in Flanders and Italy permitted the court of France to display its usual vigour, marshal Villars might have penetrated to the heart of Germany.

At the persuasion of a Frenchman, who assumed the title of the marquis de Guiscard, and who, by his bold and plausible address, had obtained the confidence of the English ministry, land forces to the number of 10,000 men were placed in transports, under the protection of the fleet commanded by sir Cloudesley Shovel. The avowed and quixotic scheme of the supposed marquis, was to restore the liberty of France; but a contrary wind confined the ships and transports to the Channel till the time for action was past, and, in the mean time, De Guiscard conducted himself with so much insolence and folly, that, in pursuance of the earnest request of the admiral, he was recalled from the fleet.

The king of France, humiliated by a long and unexpected series of misfortunes, having privately endeavoured to open a negotiation for peace with the states-general, commanded the elector of Bavaria to propose to the duke of Marlborough, and the field-deputies of the states, the opening of a general congress; promising at the same time, as a proof of his sincerity, the guarantee of the Spanish dominions in Italy to the archduke Charles, a barrier in the Netherlands to the states, and a compensation to the duke of Savoy, for the devastation of his territories. He demanded, in return, that the territories of Bavaria should be restored to their native prince, and that his grandson Philip V. should ascend the throne of Spain and the Indies. The temper of the court, the feelings of the people, and the interests of Marlborough, all conspired to render these overtures ineffectual. The Whigs extended their injustice so far, as to assert, that the terms offered by France were too good to be the foundation of lasting tranquillity, and therefore ought not to be admitted. These proposals of the French king, however, contributed, by the demonstration of his weakness, to augment the strength of ministers, and the popularity of the war. The two houses congratulated the queen on the late successes, and thanked the duke of Marlborough for his important services. They passed a bill to perpetuate his title to posterity, in the female line as well as the male; and they continued to his family for ever, the £5000 a-year which the queen had granted, during her own life.

The English parliament was prorogued on the twenty-eighth of April, 1707. and a few days after, the queen announced by proclamation, that the first parliament of Great Britain should meet on the twenty-third of October. On the first of May, her majesty went in state to St. Paul's, to offer up a public thanksgiving.

Majorca was retaken by the count de Villars on the fifth of January, but the French and Spanish troops were soon afterwards obliged to evacuate Lombardy; and in the course of the campaign, all the principal fortresses in the dominion of the duke of Savoy, or the Milanese, were wrested from the hands of the French. On the side of Germany, the margrave of Bareith, deficient in numbers and badly supplied with stores and provisions, was unable to prevent De Villars from laying the dutchy of Wirtemburgh under contribution, and penetrating to the Danube. Towards the end of the campaign, the elector of Hanover took the command of the army of the empire, and De Villars, compelled to hasten to the defence of France itself, (which was now attacked within its limits,) passed the Rhine, and abandoned his plans for the vigorous prosecution of hostilities.

The reduction of the Spanish dominions in Italy, and the capitulation signed at Milan in March, by which the French army abandoned that country, left the duke of Savoy and prince Eugene at liberty to carry the war into the enemy's country. A project was formed, in concert with England and Holland, to destroy or take Toulon or Marseilles. The two commanders, having amused the French with marches and counter-marches, suddenly directed their course towards the shore of the Mediterranean, forced the passage of the river Var, advanced along the coast of Provence, and after a long march through a hot, rugged, and inhospitable country, arrived before Toulon, which was blockaded by sir Cloudesley Shovel, who supplied the army with stores and provisions. Prince Eugene had just approached the town, when it was entered by an addition to the garrison of 8000 men, and troops were advantageously posted on the adjacent hills. On the fourteenth of August, the allies were driven from the heights of St. Catherine. Harrassed by the want of iron for shoes, an inconvenience which in that rocky country was severely felt; and understanding that the duke of Burgandy, with a considerable force, was on his march to cut off their retreat from Nice, they retired, after bombarding the place, in the night between the twenty-first and twenty-second of August. Sir Cloudesley Shovel proceeded from Toulon to Gibralter, with a fleet of fifteen ships of the line and some frigates. Having arrived in the mouth of the Channel on the night of the 22nd of October, by a mistake in his course, he steered directly westward of the islands of Scilly. The Association, the ship in which the admiral sailed, struck and foundered at once, not one of the crew being saved. The same melancholy fate attended the Eagle and Romney; and of the sailors on board the Firebrand, another ship driven on the rocks, only twenty-four and the captain were saved. The fate of Shovel was lamented by all. His intrepidity and coolness, as a naval commander, were only equalled by the vigilance, intrepidity, and circumspection of his public conduct, and the modesty and honesty of his private demeanour.

The precarious nature of Lewis's means of defence, prevented him from taking that vigorous and decided advantage of the discontents in Scotland, which might have tended to harrass or debilitate the English government. The court of France, therefore, contented itself with sending colonel Hooke into that kingdom, with instructions to make a secret progress through the northern counties. He was received with eagerness by the dukes of Gordon and Athol, and by nearly all the nobility to the north of the Forth. They solemnly assured the most Christian king, that the whole kingdom was inimical to the union; and expressed an enthusiasm, which, under more propitious circumstances, Lewis might have improved to great advantage. But the representations of Hooke, and the solicitations of the Scots, were equally ineffectual; the ministers of England were saved from the consequences of their own unobserving security and supineness, by the weakness and incapacity of their enemies.

The Whigs themselves were preparing to attack the measures of Godolphin, and strong suspicions were entertained of that intimate communication between him and Marlborough, and the court of St. Germains, which has since been disclosed to the world, and which possibly secured rather than alienated the favour of the queen. But the influence of an aspiring courtier was gradually rising to preeminent ascendancy, through the intrigues of Mrs. Masham, whose interest he found it prudent to secure. The enormous power of the duke of Marlborough, and the insolence of his wife, had alarmed the jealousy and awakened the resentment of the queen, who listened to the suggestions of Harley, with a condescension that emboldened him to proceed with vigour and openness in his career of ambition.

The parliament met on the 23rd of October; and after some disputes respecting the legality of electing a speaker, as the parliament had not been dissolved, but had expired and been renewed by proclamation, Mr. Smith was placed in the chair. The speech of the queen, which was devoted to the usual topics, was answered on the part of the house of commons by an address of thanks, and in the house of lords by the same indication of respect, accompanied by a motion for considering the state of the nation. A petition was presented in the name of more than two hundred merchants of London, complaining of losses at sea, for want of cruizers and convoys. Several abuses being discovered in the department of the admiralty, by a committee appointed for the purpose, their report was transmitted to the prince of Denmark, who returned an answer, reflecting with singular severity on the management of naval affairs during the reign of William. A complaint from Charles, the claimant of the crown of Spain, against the earl of Peterborough, who had been recalled, and was now attacked by the Whigs, was laid before the two houses; but the vouchers and witnesses adduced by Peterborough were so numerous and decisive, as to render the parliament ashamed of the proceedings, and they dismissed the subject. Having granted with eagerness the required supplies, the commons proceeded to enact several beneficial statutes, for the relief of grievances in England, and the regulation of justice in Scotland. In reply to an address from the two houses, the queen returned for answer, that she, like the parliament, was convinced that no peace could be either safe or honourable, till the monarchy of Spain should be restored to the house of Austria, an intimation which was far from unacceptable to the duke of Marlborough and the earl of Godolphin. Though the intrigues of Harley had already counteracted their influence in the cabinet, an accident occurred, which rendered him, for a time, the object of senatorial calumny and popular suspicion. A correspondence had been opened between marshal de Tallard, still a prisoner in England, and Chamillart, one of the ministers of France. Greg, a clerk in the secretary's office, through whose hands the correspondence passed, inclosed, in a letter from the marshal, an offer of his own services, promising, for an adequate compensation, to transmit to Paris the most important information, and enclosing specimens of his ability to perform his engagements. The letter was intercepted in Flanders, and the criminal tried and condemned. The circumstance was employed by the enemies of Harley, who was evidently ignorant of his servant's treachery, to render him obnoxious to the legislature, and suspected by the multitude; an intention, but too successful during the first alarm. But the triumph of delusion, respecting his personal character, was short, and the principles of Harley's party were daily obtaining increased ascendancy in the houses of parliament. On the third of February, the commons addressed the queen, demanding to be informed, why a greater number of English forces had not been in Spain and Portugal, at the time of the battle of Almanza, and the lords presented a long address against the mismanagement in that department.

In compliance with the importunities of the chevalier de St. George, better known by the title of the Pretender; a fleet of men of war, consisting of five ships ready for action, with several transports containing 8000 troops, were prepared at Dunkirk. From the smallness of the force thus intended for the invasion of an extensive kingdom, the Dutch were in alarm for the fate of Zealand. The Squadron on board of which was the Pretender, was commanded by M. Fourbin, who is supposed to have received instructions from the French king, on no account to land in Scotland. After much hesitation, and many mistakes, they found themselves to the north of the Firth of Edinburgh. Sir George Byng, whose squadron in the moment of alarm had been increased to eighty ships, came in sight of the enemy with his van, on the morning of the 13th of March. M. de Fourbin immediately put to sea; but the Auguste, a French man of war, was overtaken, and a running fight was immediately commenced. During this engagement, the chevalier de St. George entreated Fourbin to put him ashore, being resolved, even attended only by his domestics, to remain in Scotland. Fourbin, after much equivocation, gave a peremptory refusal to his request. In the mean time, the French were dispersed; the Salisbury, formerly taken from the English, was re-captured, and the rest returned to Dunkirk, after many distresses, and the loss of many of their men by sickness.

So defenceless was the kingdom at this period, and so favourable to the Pretender were the views of the queen, that Marlborough in his correspondence with the court of St Germains, expressed his dissatisfaction that he had not been acquainted with the project of descent, that he might have facilitated its success. The alarm of the people was general, and the bank of England compelled to satisfy the immediate demands of the public, by calling in twenty per cent. from each proprietor. After assuring the queen, in several addresses, that they would exert themselves in defeating the bold attempt of the enemy; and passing a bill, which empowered her majesty to imprison such persons as she had cause to suspect were conspiring against her government, the two houses were prorogued on the first of April, and on the sixteenth of that month the parliament was dissolved by proclamation. Lord Griffin, having been committed to the Tower, was brought on the fifteenth of May to the bar of the queen's bench, and, upon the former outlawry against him, received sentence of death, which was postponed from time to time, till he died in the Tower.

About the end of May, the duke of Marlborough placed himself at the head of the confederates near Ghent, where he expected reinforcements from the Rhine, under prince Eugene. The elector of Bavaria, by his love of pleasure and his prodigality, vices which, contrasted with the avarice of Marlborough, were admired as virtues, had ingratiated himself into favour with the inhabitants of Ghent, Bruges, and Antwerp; and persuaded them to betray those cities to the French. On the 5th of July, a body of French troops were received into the city of Ghent, under pretence of a surprise. After capturing Bruges, and refusing to fight with Marlborough, who offered them battle, the French generals passed the Dender in the night, and returning from that river, directed their march to the Scheldt, which, contrary to their hopes and belief, Marlborough had already passed, taking a position between the French and their lines. At three in the afternoon of the eleventh of July, commenced the battle of Oudenarde. The left of the enemy was covered by the Scheldt, their front was protected by a morass, and their cavalry, intermixed with bodies of foot, occupied an eminence on their right. At seven in the evening the battle became furious on all sides. The British cavalry, in crossing the morass, defeated the cavalry and infantry of the French at the first onset; and the infantry, remaining behind the morass, after an obstinate resistance sheltered themselves in the inclosures behind the banks of the Scheldt, to avoid being flanked by the British horse. Though the successes of the confederates in the course of the day had been partial and inconsiderable, and their baggage and ammunition were untouched; the French retreated with precipitation during the night, leaving, in consequence of their panic, 10,000 men, killed and prisoners, while the loss on the side of the confederates amounted to 824 killed, and 2146 wounded. The reinforcement of Germans from the Moselle having joined the army of prince Eugene, that general formed the siege of Lisle, while the French retired from Ghent under Tournay and Ypres. The marshal de Boufflers, governor of the province of which that celebrated fortress is the capital, was compelled to evacuate the town, after a siege of three months, and to surrender the citadel on the eighth of December. Such, however, was the obstinacy of the contest, that the army of the allies sustained a loss of 20,000 men; and it was only by one of those bold and decisive enterprises, of which the rashness is justified by the success, that the duke of Marlborough passed the Scheldt without resistance, in sight of the French army, now superior, in consequence of the late events to that of the confederates. The cities which had admitted the French within their walls, were again surrendered to the allies. The siege of Brussels, conducted by the elector of Bavaria, was immediately raised, and the minor events of the campaign were equally unpropitious to the cause of France. Vendome, who had been the real commander of the French army during the campaign, though the nominal commander was the duke of Burgundy, retired in disgrace and obscurity to his estates, being the fifth French marshal whom Marlborough's success had driven from the service.

After the recapture of the cities of Ghent and Bruges, Marlborough reinstated the traitors, who had betrayed those cities to the French, in their honours and emoluments; and received, in return for his magnanimity, two hundred thousand guelders. In Germany, no event of importance occurred during the campaign; and in Spain the three armies of the house of Bourbon distinguished themselves by no more memorable exploits than the capture of Tortosa, Denia, and Alicant. The operations of the English fleet were unexpectedly successful; and Sardinia and Mindrea were taken without loss, and almost without resistance. In the West Indies, a privateer ship, commanded by captain Coleby, with 100 men, falling in with a fleet of the enemy's brigantines richly laden, captured the guard-ship and six of the vessels, for which 180,000 dollars were offered as ransom. Commodore Wager, hearing that the galleons were preparing to sail from Portobello to Carthagena, set sail in search of them, and on the 28th of May observed seventeen sail of them to leeward. The Spanish Admiral, who mounted 64 brass guns, the Vice-admiral of 50, the Rear-admiral of 44, and a French ship of 36 guns, all engaged him. He fought them for four hours, when the Admiral blew up, the Vice-admiral terribly shattered, bore away, and the Rear-admiral was taken. The commodore's share of this latter prize alone was estimated at £100,000. The Vice-admiral escaped through the negligence or disaffection of captain Bridges of the Kingston, and captain Windsor of the Portland, who were both tried by a court-martial at Jamaica, and deprived of their commands.

A circumstance, which was productive of much uneasiness and mortification to the court, occurred in the arrest of count Martuof, the Russian ambassador, at the suit of a laceman. He was mal-treated by the bailiffs, who dragged him to a spunging-house, where he continued until he was bailed by the earl of Feversham and a merchant. He complained to the secretary of state, and was liberated; but, resenting the indignity, the queen commanded a prosecution, and Mr. Secretary Boyle assured him, that he should receive ample satisfaction. Notwithstanding this assurance, he demanded a passport for himself and his family, refused the presents that are usually made to ambassadors at their departure, and retired in disgust to Holland, from whence he transmitted a letter of the Czar to the queen, insisting, with singular ignorance of the English law, that all the individuals, concerned in thus insulting the person of his ambassador, should be punished with death!

On the 28th of October, prince George of Denmark, the husband of Anne, died in the 56th year of his age. He had long been afflicted with a violent asthma, with a dropsy, by which he had been affected from his infancy, and a coma, or propensity to sleep. He was a man of the most amiable temper, but incapable of business, indolent, and feeble. His personal character corresponded, in many important features, with that of the queen herself; and she watched his declining health, and lamented his decease, with a tenderness at once earnest and unsuspicious.

The new parliament, of which the majority were elected by the partisans of the Whigs, assembled on the sixteenth of November. After sir Richard Onslow had been elected speaker, seven millions were voted for the service of the campaign, and in concert with the states, ten thousand men were added to the establishment of the preceding year. The earl of Pembroke, lord president of the council, and lord lieutenant of Ireland, was created lord high admiral, vacant by the death of the prince of Denmark; a place of which he had fulfilled the duties towards the close of the reign of William. Lord Somers was raised to the head of the council, and the profligate Wharton appointed to the lieutenancy of Ireland. For this elevation he was indebted to the possession of an intercepted letter, from the earl of Godolphin to the court of St. Germains, which he had purchased of the marquis of Annandale. Godolphin, aware that further use would be made of the discovery of his clandestine correspondence, hastened by artifice the departure of Wharton for Dublin, and immediately forwarded through both houses an act of grace, pardoning all correspondence with the court of St. Germains, and thus securing himself, the duke of Marlborough, and the rest of the persons implicated from the violence of the opposite party.

The return of the duke of Marlborough from the continent exposed him, notwithstanding the splendor of his late campaigns, to all the secret artifice, and open hostility of the opposite party. The secretary of Marlborough, aware of the partiality entertained by the duke towards general Cadogan, attributed to him the whole honour of the battle of Winnendal; while general Webb, to whom the reputation of the victory was chiefly due, was passed by in silence. Marlborough was accused by the Tory party of partiality and injustice, and a vote of thanks to the latter was introduced and passed, from motives of aversion to Marlborough, rather than of regard or respect for the injured officer. 1709.

The public was amused to an unusual degree, by the next proceedings of the two houses. An order had been made by the privy-council, that in the form of prayer used on the accession of the queen, the following words should be omitted, "and that these blessings may be continued to after ages, make the queen, we pray thee, a happy mother of children, who, being educated in thy faith and fear, may happily succeed in the government of these kingdoms." Mr. Watson, son to lord Rockingham, moved in the house of commons on the twenty-fifth of January, that an address should be presented to her majesty, imploring her to moderate her griefs, and to entertain thoughts of a second marriage. Though the motion, considering her time of life, seemed to convey a degree of ridicule, it was strongly supported by all the young members, and presented to her majesty. The queen replied, that the provision she had made for the protestant succession, would always be a proof of her hearty concern for the happiness of the nation; but that the subject of their address was of such a nature, that she was sure they did not expect a particular answer.

The commons granted a land-tax of 4*s.* in the pound, a malt tax, and £2,500,000 in exchequer bills, intended to amount collectively to £6,457,830, an estimate, however, to which they were much inadequate. The parliament was prorogued on the 21st of April.

A long and severe frost, which was partially felt in England, contributed to prolong, by its destructive intensity, the distresses to which France had been reduced, by a continuance of unsuccessful war. The revenues of Lewis were exhausted; the bankers who transmitted his foreign payments dishonoured their bills; and the creditors, whose money was confided to Barnard, one of the principal of the money brokers, were losers to the amount of a million sterling. Influenced by these calamities, and by the impossibility of farther contention with safety or honour, Lewis solicited permission, through the medium of Petkum, envoy from the duke of Holstein, to send the president De Rouillé to lay his proposals before the deputies Buys and Vander-Dussen. The states transmitted immediate intelligence to the emperor and to the queen of England, of the nature and extent of De Rouillé's overture. The superintendence of the treaty, and the terms on which a pacification could be acceded to, were committed by their respective sovereigns to the prince of Savoy and the duke of Marlborough. The pensionary of Holland, who directed the councils of the states, prince Eugene, and Marlborough, were equally influenced by the love of glory, and by a natural desire for the continuance of a system, which had enabled them to gratify their passions for wealth, honour, and authority; to obstruct as far as possible every step towards the conclusion of peace. The demands of the allies were exhorbitant in proportion to the humiliating conditions offered by France; and Marlborough had the address to render the sincerity of Lewis suspected, by diffusing a belief, that the only object of Rouillé's mission was to deceive and amuse the confederates. The reports of the conferences afterwards removed to the Hague, were received by the French court with despair, and the marquis de Torcy, secretary for foreign affairs, offered to the king his services, as a last resort. France agreed to yield the whole Spanish monarchy to the house of Austria, without any equivalent; to acknowledge the title of queen Anne; to cede her conquests on the empire upon the Upper Rhine; to give Furnes, Ypres, Menin, Tournay, Condé, and Maubege, for a barrier to Holland; to remove the Pretender from the dominions of France, to restore the possessions of the duke of Savoy; and to meet the wishes of the allies on minor subjects of contention. Terms so honourable to the confederates, and so destructive to the influence of France, might well have satisfied the demands of reasonable ambition, and would have amply repaid the expenditure of life and treasure, on the part of the hostile powers. But interests, glory, and avarice, prevailed over every consideration of justice and general policy; it was demanded, that Lewis should surrender the strongest towns in his territories, as pledges for the entire evacuation, by his grandson, of the dominions of Spain; a condition, which it was not within the power of Lewis to guarantee. De Torcy returned to Paris, and the whole negotiation being made public, the national pride of France, awakened to a sense of the indignities to which it had been subjected, reanimated the court and the people to renewed exertions.

In a private conference between Marlborough and De Torcy, the former advised the renewal of the Pretender from France, as necessary to the success of his attempts to ascend the British throne, and intimated, that should he obtain an asylum in any other country than France, it would be the duty of Townsend and himself to support him in a state of dignified affluence. To this proposal the Pretender refused his assent, alleging that it was made with no other intention than to persuade the world, that he had renounced his pretensions for a pension.

The termination of the conferences was immediately succeeded by vigorous preparations for the continuance of the war. The prince Eugene remained in Flanders, to second the duke of Marlborough in his military operations. The army of the allies amounted to one hundred and ten thousand combatants. The enemy's army, augmented by thousands whom the late famine had driven to the ranks, was commanded by the marshal de Villars. He occupied a strong post between Couriere and Bethune, which covered both his wings. The villages of La Bassée and Pont Avendin defended his front. By this position of his army he covered the cities of Doway and Arras, of which the capture had opened a passage into the heart of France. The generals of the allies perceived that this position was too strong to be easily forced; and understanding that Villars, fearing an attack, had weakened the garrison of Tournay to 5000 men, decamped in the night, and laid siege to that fortress. Notwithstanding the favourable position of the town, and the strength of the citadel, constructed by Vauban, the former surrendered at the end of three weeks, and the latter a few days afterwards. Eugene and Marlborough resolved to pursue the important advantage they had gained, and passed the Scheldt on the third day of September, with the intention of laying siege to Mons. The prince of Hesse was detached, to attack the French lines, from the Haisne to the Sambre, which were abandoned at his approach; but the prince being threatened by a body of the enemy, the duke of Marlborough hastened to support him. On the ninth, the allies made a motion to the left, by which the two armies approached so near, that they instantly began to cannonade each other. Villars had passed the Scarpe, and encamped between that river and the Scheldt. He entrenched himself at the village of Malplaquat, about a league distance from Mons. His right extended to the village itself, which lay behind the extensive and impenetrable wood of Sart. Another wood of equal depth covered his left. Along a very narrow plain, opposed to his centre, he drew trenches behind trenches, and covered the whole with a row of trees, with all their branches, which he had cut down and carried from the adjacent woods. Notwithstanding these obstructions, the allies resolved to give battle to the enemy. The British troops were opposed to the left, the Dutch to the right, and the Germans to the centre of the French. The marshal de Villars placed himself at the head of his left wing, committing the charge of the right to the marshal de Boufflers, who consented to act a second part. About eight o'clock the attack began. Eighty-six battalions on the right, commanded by general Schuylenburg, the duke of Argyle, and other generals, and supported by twenty-two battalions, under count Lottum, attacked the left of the enemy with such vigour, that in less than an hour they were driven from their intrenchments into the woods of Sart and Taniere. Villars, as had been foreseen, weakened his centre, to support his left wing against the fierce assault of the British infantry. The enemy were driven into the plain behind, where they sustained the conflict with unabating firmness. In the mean time, the Dutch, under count Tilly, were engaged with the enemy's right. Advancing to the intrenchments in three lines, they made and sustained a terrible fire for the space of an hour. The resistance of the French was so obstinate and successful, that the confederates consulted on desisting from the attack. At this moment, general Cadogan perceived the void left in the centre of the enemy, by the troops removed to the assistance of the left. Prince Eugene immediately attacked the intrenchments at that place, entered the enemy's line, flanked a regiment of French guards, and forced them to fly. Villars, hastening to support his centre, was wounded and carried from the field. The marshal de Boufflers, however, sustained the fight with obstinacy, notwithstanding the cavalry of the allies had already entered his lines. He ordered the Pretender, who served in this campaign, to advance at the head of twelve hundred of the horse-guards; and in one desperate shock the German cavalry were broken and dissipated; but the generals of the allies rallied their cavalry, forced the enemy back on their lines, and advancing slowly, but firmly, under the fire of thirty pieces of cannon, gained the field.

Boufflers retired deliberately and unmolested, with all his cannon, except fourteen dismounted pieces. The loss of the contending parties was nearly equal, and amounted to more than thirty thousand men. Though the field of battle remained with the allies, the French redeemed their national glory by the skill and calmness of their retreat. The necessity of attacking them when so advantageously posted, and when Mons might have been taken without a battle, has long been the subject of severe scrutiny and animadversion. The campaign was ended on the twentieth of October by the surrender of that fortress.

On the fifteenth of November the parliament met at Westminster; and in her opening speech, the queen complained, that France had employed every stratagem to amuse the allies, with false and deceitful insinuations of her desire for peace. The commons coincided in the views of her majesty, and voted grants to the amount of six millions. While the senate, however, testified its loyalty and unanimity, the people were excited to the expression of open discontent. They began loudly to complain of the continuance of the war, and the pressure of taxes. The clergy, whose principles accorded with those of the Jacobites, became themselves the instruments of faction and sedition. The court and the ministers of justice had hitherto endeavoured to discourage the violence of these obnoxious persons, by leaving them unnoticed, in the hope of reducing them to silence by the return of plenty and contentment, on the conclusion of the expected peace. A deviation from this prudent conduct, excited the nation to a flame, destroyed the unanimity of the parliament, and effected an important revolution in the policy of England and the state of Europe.

Commotions excited by Sacheveral's Sermon—His Trial and Popularity—Alienation of the Queen from her Ministers—Misfortunes of Stanhope in Spain—Progress of Mrs. Masham in the favour of the Queen—Attempt to assassinate Harley—Marlborough's successful Campaign—On his return he is accused of Peculation—Negotiations for Peace—Debates in Parliament—Fatal Duel between the Duke of Hamilton and Lord Mohun—Private Sentiments of the Queen with respect to the Succession—Conclusion of the Treaty of Utrecht—State of Parties—Disputes respecting the Articles of Peace—Turbulence of the Duke of Argyle—Decline of the Earl of Oxford's Influence—Intrigues and Ascendancy of Bolingbroke—Conduct of the Elector of Hanover—Dismissal of Harley—Death of the Queen—Her Character.

SACHEVERAL was the son of a clergyman, and was educated at Oxford, under the patronage of several benefactors, among whom the bishop of Sarum, Burnet, was the most active and liberal. At the university, he was regarded as a person of turbulent and litigious spirit, unworthy of respect or confidence. His talents were above mediocrity, but the vanity and presumption which marked his conduct in the general intercourse of life, precluded the deference and esteem that were due to his mental powers and his scholastic acquisitions. In the latter end of the summer of 1709, when the discontent of the people had been excited by the termination of the conferences at the Hague, he was invited by his namesake, Sacheveral, high sheriff of Derbyshire, to preach at the assizes. The sermon was afterwards printed with a dedication to the sheriff, which contained many arguments and observations inconsistent with the established order of society, and obnoxious to the government. He was rewarded for his boldness by his popular election to a church in Southwark; and on the 5th of November, having obtained the pulpit at St. Paul's, he delivered a sermon before the lord mayor and the court of aldermen, replete with those expressions of complaint and jealousy, which were common to him with his whole party. His text was taken from St. Paul, 2 Corinthians, chapter xi. verse 26. In perils among false brethren. Instead of commemorating the fortunate events which preserved his country from slavery and ruin, by the discovery of the gunpowder plot, and the landing of the prince of Orange, he delivered a vehement oration, in defence of passive 1709.

obedience and non-resistance, and stigmatized the advocates of the revolution as enemies to their country.

Notwithstanding the opposition of the court of aldermen, who, attached to the principles of the low church, refused to thank Sacheverel, according to custom; the lord mayor, sir Samuel Gerrard, encouraged the doctor to publish his discourse, and to present it in a dedication, corresponding with the sermon in outrageous assertion, and paradoxical argument. The Tories extolled the production, as a master-piece of composition, and the opposition of the Whigs was proportionably vehement.

Mr. Dolben, son to the archbishop of York, presented to the house of commons a complaint against these rhapsodies, and by this conduct gave them an importance, which otherwise they would not have obtained. The most violent paragraphs were read, and the sermons voted scandalous and seditious libels. Sacheverel was ordered to attend on the fourteenth of December. He was taken into custody and instantly impeached. On the ninth of January, the commons exhibited four articles against him, affirming that the doctor suggested and maintained, That the necessary means for effecting the late revolution were odious and unjustifiable; that the toleration to dissenters was unwarrantable and unreasonable; that the church of England was in danger under the queen's administration; that there were persons in office who endeavoured to overturn the constitution; and that, throughout the whole management of affairs, there was a general mal-administration and corruption. It was resolved to impeach him at the bar of the house of lords, of high crimes and misdemeanors, and Mr. Dolben was appointed to conduct the prosecution, in the name of the commons of all England. The Tories, to whom Sacheverel's principles were highly acceptable, exerted themselves to the utmost in his defence. They affirmed that the Whigs had formed a conspiracy for the destruction of the church, and that the prosecution was intended as a trial of their strength, before they should proceed openly to the prosecution of their object. The clergy made use of all their influence to alarm and enflame their hearers, while emissaries were employed to work on the minds of the populace, who were already prone to discontent from a scarcity of provisions, which was at that time felt in almost every country of Europe. It was urged, that the church was exposed to the most imminent perils from dissenters, Whigs, and luke-warm prelates; a set of men, whom they represented as the authors of the ruinous war, and ultimately of the terrible famine, which threatened to desolate the nation. So powerful a party having espoused the cause of Sacheverel, after the articles were preferred against him, the lords thought it expedient to admit him to bail.

At length, on the twenty-seventh of February, the trial began in the hall of Westminster, which had been prepared at a great expence for the occasion. The queen was every day present as a private spectator, and when the culprit proceeded to Westminster hall, he was attended from his lodgings in the temple by the multitude, who rent the air with shouts of applause, and were animated to such a pitch of fury and enthusiasm, that they effected the destruction of several dissenting meeting-houses, and insulted, or mal-treated the peers and members of the house of commons, whom they suspected to be inimical to the cause of their favourite. Even the clergy testified their approbation of his conduct and doctrines, by surrounding him at the moment of trial, and extolling him as the champion of the church; and the queen herself could not refrain from some indications of partiality towards a man, whose doctrines were so favourable to the royal prerogative.

As the doctor avowed himself the author of the sermon, no witnesses were produced. The managers, who were chiefly men in office, appealed to the principles on which the revolution was accomplished, and to the general tenor of the opinions and measures adopted by the parliament. The council of Sacheverel endeavoured to prove, that his language did not justify the interpretation of his accusers; and he himself concluded by reading a speech, in which, while he vehemently and ably justified his doctrines, he expressed his approbation of the revolution, and his respect for the queen and the established government.

The lords, when they retired to consult upon his sentence, were divided, and continued undetermined for some time. After violent altercation, Sacheverel was found guilty by a majority of seventeen voices, but a protest was entered against this decision by thirty-four peers. He was prohibited from preaching for three years, and his two sermons were ordered to be burnt by the hands of the hangman, in the presence of the lord mayor and sheriffs.

The lenity of this sentence, which was chiefly owing to the dread of popular resentment, was regarded by the Tories as a victory over the opposite faction. They celebrated their triumph by bonfires and illuminations; and Sacheveral was soon after presented to a benefice in North Wales, whither he was conducted with great pomp and magnificence. On his way he was sumptuously entertained by the university of Oxford; and many noblemen, who secretly regarded him with contempt, worshipped him as the idol of their faction. In several towns he was formally received by the magistrates; and, during part of the journey, was attended by a body of one thousand horse: at Bridgenorth he was met by a person named Cresswell at the head of four thousand men on horseback, and as many on foot, wearing white knots edged with gold. The hedges were for two miles dressed with garlands, and the steeples covered with streamers, flags, and flowers. "The church and Dr. Sacheveral" were resounded in every quarter; and a spirit of religious enthusiasm pervaded the whole nation.

1710. When the queen addressed the house in the April following, she expressed her resentment against those who had taken a false impression, that the church was endangered by certain licentious libels, productions which had been the objects of complaint in all ages, and which could not be suppressed by the utmost care and vigilance. She declared her readiness at all times to punish and discourage vice and irreligion; to sanction by her assent every salutary law that might check the progress of licentiousness.

Hitherto the queen had coincided in sentiment with her ministers, though she no longer regarded them with her wonted favour. So early as two years before, immediately subsequent to the death of her husband the prince of Denmark, she betrayed the change of her attachments and opinions. The prince was infirm and inactive; an advocate for strict attachment to the allies; and, himself of a different persuasion from the established church, a friend to the toleration of the belief of others. The queen was, it is true, religiously disposed, but chiefly towards the high church party, who prejudiced her strongly against the dissenters, as a turbulent and factious race, who had chiefly contributed to the calamities of her grandfather Charles I. The queen was to a great degree susceptible of flattery; and the high church party, more expert in its blandishments than their opponents, consulted her feelings and gratified her pride by their earnest protestations of personal duty, and of regard for the prerogative.

During these intrigues the court of France, exhausted and dismayed by the success of the allies, solicited the states-general to admit the arrival of plenipotentiaries at any place in Holland or Flanders they might deem it proper to appoint. Lewis engaged to acknowledge Charles III. as king of Spain, to withdraw all succours from his grandson, to forbear sending him any future assistance, and to consent that no part of the Spanish monarchy should ever be united with France. His offers on every other point of discussion were equally extensive, but did not fulfil the expectations of the allies. Lewis, unwilling to abandon the hope of peace, proposed still further concessions. The duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene, averse to the conclusion of a war so productive of wealth and glory, contrived to induce the queen of Great Britain and the emperor to throw the whole of the negotiation into the hands of the Dutch republic. The deputies from the states-general rose in their demands in proportion as France increased her concessions, and insisted that Lewis XIV. instead of paying a subsidy towards the war against his grandson, should assist the allies with all his forces to expel him from the throne.

In the mean time the duke of Marlborough and the prince of Savoy sat down before Donay, after assembling the army at Tournay, and entering the French lines without resistance. The confederate generals determined on the siege of Donay, as that place covered Lisle and the rest of their conquests in Flanders. The enemy having assembled near Peronne advanced towards Cambray with a force sufficient to relieve Donay; but it was the determination of Villars not to risk the issue of the campaign in a single battle, but to interrupt the siege of Donay, which was resolutely defended by a garrison of eight thousand men under Monsieur Albergoth, who made a number of desperate sallies, in which the besieged lost many soldiers. The garrison, however, surrendered on the 26th of June, and the confederates took successively Bethune, St. Venant, and Aire. The loss of the allies was great, notwithstanding their successes; and a convoy of military stores, conveyed in boats along the Lys under the command of the earl of Athlone, was blown up with an explosion that separated the river into two channels, and interrupted its navigation.

The campaign on the Rhine was entirely inactive. The campaign in Spain was distinguished by the alternate defeat of both the claimants of the throne. Philip V. with an army of Spaniards, took the field in the beginning of May; and, after many marches and counter-marches, proceeded to Almenara, at the moment of the arrival of general Stanhope, who attacked the cavalry of Philip, and slew with his own hand the commander of his guards. The cavalry were dispersed at the first shock; the infantry were driven from the field. Philip retired with his broken army, leaving behind him his artillery and the greatest part of his baggage. The main body of his troops fled with precipitation to Lerida. To cut off the communication between the enemy and Castile, he passed the Sinca, and marched towards Saragossa, whither general Stahremberg pursued him, and obtained over him a victory, in which he lost 12,000 men in killed and prisoners. Charles entered Saragossa in triumph, while Philip retreated to Madrid, and afterward to Valladolid, in order to collect his scattered troops into another army.

The severities of Stanhope, who pursued his route to Madrid, and the enthusiasm of all ranks of society, who regarded Charles as a king imposed upon them by heretics, restored the affairs of Philip. The duke of Vendome, whom the caprice of the duke of Burgundy had rendered useless to France, assumed, at the request of Philip, the chief command in Spain. The nobility flocked around his standard; and, before the end of October his army amounted to 30,000 men. An army of French, assembled in Roussillion, was preparing to enter Catalonia. The allies had divided their armies for the convenience of subsistence; and Stanhope arrived with five thousand men, on the eighth of December, at the small unfortified town of Brihuega. He was surprised by the duke de Vendome, who had swam across the Tagus with his cavalry, and compelled, after a desperate resistance, to surrender at discretion. A result so fatal to the interest of Charles might have been prevented, had the proposal of Stanhope, that a body of troops should occupy the pass of Pampluna, through which alone the French king could have sent forces to Spain, been properly regarded.

The count de Stahremberg immediately hastened to the relief of his friends, but arrived too late to prevent the disaster I have recorded, while he exposed himself to the most imminent danger. A battle was fought in the neighbourhood of Villa Viciosa with Vendome. The contest was long and bloody; and Stahremberg retired, under the protection of night, leaving behind him his cannon, baggage, and ammunition, but inflicting upon the enemy a destruction nearly equal to that which his own army had sustained.

Though the continuance of the war prolonged the power of Marlborough on the continent, his influence at home was gradually declining. The parliament having been dissolved, was succeeded by another, of which the majority were Tories. From every quarter of the kingdom addresses, confirming the doctrine of non-resistance, were presented to the queen, and graciously accepted. The conferences at Guertrugdenburg having been broken off, the designs of the Dutch and English commanders were too obvious not to be perceived. The writers of the Tory faction, who were men of the first eminence in literature, displayed all the vehemence of declaration on the avarice of Marlborough, and the selfish conduct of the Dutch. They insisted that, while England was exhausting her strength in foreign conquests, for the benefit of other nations, she was losing her liberty at home; and that the members of administration, not content with sharing the plunder of an impoverished state, were resolved to control by their influence, even the constitutional exertion of the royal authority.

The great instrument of popular declension in favour of the Whigs, during their late ascendancy, was the cry, that the church was in danger. By the circumstances attending the trial of Sacheverel, that mode of deception was now transferred into the hands of their opponents, and was productive of immediate and irresistable effect: the power of the Tories and the violence of the people were combined, with private reasons, to render the influence of Marlborough no longer decisive and secure.

The duchess, by that arrogance which frequently accompanies unexpected success, and is frequently the reward of unlimited condescension, had lately wounded the pride and provoked the anger of the queen, to whose favour Mrs. Masham had gradually succeeded. The brother of this lady, colonel Hill, had distinguished himself in the battle of Almanza: the influence of his sister recommended him to the notice of the queen, and she intimated to the duke of Marlborough, that she wished him to be appointed to the regiment vacant by the death of the earl of Essex. The duke expostulated on this extraordinary proof of partiality for a woman who had treated him with marked ingratitude. Hitherto he had uninterruptedly possessed the disposal of all military rank; and he represented to the queen the prejudice that would result to the service from the promotion of so young an officer. He retired to the country, and threatened to resign the command of the army. The queen disguised her joy at this menace; and, in order to prevent the earl of Sunderland from introducing a vote into the house of commons to remove Mrs. Masham from her presence and service, dissembled her resentment; and informed him by letter, that she insisted on his retaining the command of the army, and that he might dispose of the regiment as he pleased.

But the resolutions of Anne were not much longer indecisive or equivocal. The post of lord chamberlain was transferred from the duke of Kent to the duke of Shrewsbury; and the earl of Dartmouth succeeded the earl of Sunderland, son-in-law to the duke of Marlborough, as secretary of state. The Whigs, though at first they yielded to despair, determined to support themselves by the people in opposition to the queen; and they influenced the directors of the bank to assure her majesty, that public credit would be annihilated by the change in her councils; and the Dutch alternately appealed to her wisdom, her justice, and her fears, in petitions, menaces, and memorials. Advised, however, and assured by Harley, she was not to be shaken from her purpose: she appointed the latter chancellor of the exchequer and under-treasurer. Lord Godolphin was divested of his office: lord Somers was succeeded as president of the council by lord Rochester: the duke of Devonshire was deprived of the staff of lord steward, which was given to the duke of Buckingham: and Mr. Henry St. John, superseded Mr. Boyle in the office of the secretary of state. The great seal was committed to Sir Simon Harcourt on the resignation of the lord chancellor, an example which was followed by the earl of Wharton, whose commission as lord-lieutenant of Ireland was transferred to the duke of Ormond: and thus was accomplished the expulsion of all the Whig party from office, except the duke of Marlborough, by the appointment of Mr. George Granville as secretary at war in the room of Mr. Robert Walpole.

The passion of the duke of Marlborough overcame his usual coolness of behaviour and deliberate address. When he received intelligence of the intended disgrace of Sunderland, he wrote to the duke of Berwick, and offered his services to the court of St. Germains; which led to a correspondence between the exiled queen and the general, more honourable to the finesse of both parties, than to their wisdom or integrity. At the moment when Marlborough himself was in communication with the family of James, he corresponded also with the elector of Hanover, and accused the new ministry, to that prince, as men fully determined to restore the Pretender. Nor was the charge entirely destitute of foundation, for the duke of Shrewsbury, the lord chamberlain, was even now in correspondence with the court of St. Germains, though he had written, at the same time, a letter professing the most ardent attachment to the elector.

During these intrigues of the two parties, the parliament assembled at Westminster, and elected for their speaker one Bromley, an individual attached to the high church party. The queen declared, in her opening speech, her firm determination to prosecute the war, especially in Spain, with the utmost vigour, and demanded suitable supplies. Whatever might have been known or suspected of the motives which influenced the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene in urging the prolongation of the war, the allied powers were justly convinced, that all the offers of Lewis to abandon his grandson were illusory. They considered the apparent disunion between France and Spain as a mere collusion; they could not be ignorant of the secret promises given by Lewis to support his grandson; they regarded the nomination of the duke of Burgundy to the ducal title of Anjou, the acknowledgment of the prince of Asturias, and the conduct of Philip in general, as decisive proofs of a resolution never to relinquish the Spanish throne. The French monarch had in reality exhorted the dauphin and Philip never to give credit to any appearance of an approaching peace, or of a design to abandon Spain; but, on the contrary, to be assured of his resolution to continue the war.

The triumph of Philip was completed by the licentiousness of the Dutch and English soldiers, who insulted and treated with inhumanity the inhabitants of Madrid; by the avarice of Stanhope, and the propensity to rapine of the earl of Galway. The unfortunate Charles III. was loaded with all the sins of his army, and fled before his victorious enemy. The lords severely censured the conduct of the generals, and passed a vote of censure for injurious advice, and for neglect, on the late ministry. Notwithstanding these and other indications of hostility on the part of the court and the government, the duke of Marlborough, influenced by the wishes of the allies, and by his own propensity to the accumulation of wealth, determined to continue in his command, and on the 18th of February embarked for Holland, to concert with the states the operations of an early campaign.

In reply to a message of the queen, addressed to both houses on the 3rd of January, the lords expressed their unlimited approbation of the conduct of the earl of Peterborough; censured the late ministers for their mismanagement of the Spanish war; and avowed their displeasure at the councils and measures of the earl of Galway, lord Tyrawley, and general Stanhope. In the commons it was voted, that inviting and bringing over poor Palatines, of all religions, at the national expence, was a dangerous and scandalous misapplication of the public money. A law was enacted during this session, that no one should be capable of representing a county in parliament, unless he possessed an estate of £600 a year; and that every burgess should have an annual income of half that sum. The moderation of Harley, during all the contentions of the senate, rendered the sincerity of his attachment to the Tories suspected; and his influence was regarded by the majority of his party with jealousy and distrust. At this moment his credit was restored, by the violence of a desperate and enthusiastic assassin. One Guiscard, a French officer, who had communicated some useful intelligence relative to the affairs of France, had received from the crown a precarious pension of £400 a year, which he considered as a reward extremely disproportioned to his services. He had often endeavoured to procure admittance to the queen, but was always prevented either by Harley or St. John. Provoked at these disappointments, he resolved to make his peace with the court of France, and offered his services to Morean, a banker at Paris. His packet, which he transmitted by the way of Portugal, was intercepted, and a warrant issued to apprehend him for high-treason. Conscious of his guilt, he sought not to avoid his fate, but resolved to satiate his revenge. Being carried before the council convened at a place called the Cockpit, he perceived a penknife lying upon the table, and took it up without being observed by any of the attendants. When pressed by the members of the council, he endeavoured to evade examination, and desired permission to speak in private to Mr. St. John. His request, however, being refused, he said, "That's hard; not one word!" On which, as St. John was out of his reach, he stept towards Mr. Harley, and crying out, "Have at thee, then!" stabbed him in the breast with the penknife he had concealed. By good fortune, the blade of the knife broke upon the rib without entering the cavity of the breast; but he repeated the blow with such violence, that Harley fell to the ground. St. John exclaimed, "The villain has killed Mr. Harley;" and drawing his sword, while others followed his example, Guiscard was wounded in many places. He still however continued to strike and defend himself, until, being overpowered by the messengers and servants who on hearing the noise had rushed in, he was conveyed from the council-chamber, which he had filled with terror and confusion. His wounds, though dangerous, were not mortal; but he died of a gangrene, occasioned by the contusions he had sustained. The attempt upon the life of Harley, by a person who was proved to be an enemy to the state, extinguished the suspicions of those who began to doubt of that minister's integrity. The two houses of parliament expressed their conviction, in an address to the queen, that Mr. Harley's loyalty and zeal in the service of her majesty had subjected him to the hatred of the abettors of faction and popery. When Harley appeared in the house of commons after his recovery, he was congratulated by the speaker, in a formal speech, replete with the most fulsome panegyric. On the death of the earl of Rochester, who died soon after these events, Harley became sole minister, was created baron of Wigmore, and exalted to the rank of earl, by the titles of Oxford and Mortimer.

The commons proceeded to enquire into the debts of the navy, which were combined with many other debts in one stock, amounting to £9,470,321. A fund was established for paying an interest or annuity of 6 per cent. until the principal should be discharged. With this fund was granted the monopoly of a projected trade to the South Sea, vested in the proprietors of navy bills, debentures, and other public securities, who were incorporated for this purpose. Such was the origin of the South Sea Company; an establishment so productive, before many years had elapsed, of individual ruin and national distress.

The duke of Marlborough had arrived in England on the 28th day of December. Having entered London as a private person, he obtained an interview with the queen, in which the alienation of her mind was so evident, as to leave him no hope of further influence. Though he attended the privy-council, therefore, as an indication of respect, he surrendered into her majesty's hands the places and dignities of his wife, which were those of groom of the stole, mistress of the robes, and keeper of the privy purse. The two first were bestowed on the duchess of Somerset, the last on Mrs. Masham. Being continued for the present in the command of the army, the duke set out for Holland on the eighteenth day of February; he repaired to Flanders about the middle of April, and assembled the army at Orchies, between Lisle and Donay. He passed the Scarpe, and encamped between Donay and Bouchain; but was afterwards induced to repass the river, and form his camp in the plain of Lens, from whence he advanced towards Aire, as if it were his intention to besiege St. Omer, or attack the enemies' lines in that quarter: these lines extended from Bouchain to Canche, being continued along the Sanset and the Scarpe to Arras, and thence along the upper Scarpe and Ugy. They were regarded by marshal Villars as impenetrable, and denominated, in confidence of their strength, the Ne plus ultra of Marlborough. Deluded by the manœuvres of the duke, the French commander drew all his forces to the side of Villars-Brulin in the full expectation of an engagement; leaving unprotected the passages on the Sanset and the Scheldt, which were immediately occupied by general Hompseck, who, with general Cadogan, had passed the former of these rivers at Arleux. Marlborough himself, with his vanguard of fifty squadrons, having passed the Scarpe, hastened his march towards Arleux, and before eight o'clock arrived at Baca-Bacheul, where in two hours he was joined by the heads of the columns into which he had divided his army. The rapidity of Villars to counteract these movements, was only equalled by his surprize and dismay. He decamped with his whole army, and at the head of the king's household troops marched with such expedition, that at about eleven in the forenoon, he arrived in sight of the duke of Marlborough, who had just passed through the defile of Marquion, and joined count Hompseck. The French general fell back on the main body of his army, which had reached the high road between Arras and Cambray, while the confederates, having marched ten leagues without halting, encamped upon the Scheldt, between Oisy and Estrum. The confidence expressed by Villars, in the impenetrable construction of his line of defence, was now the source of invidious and mortifying comparison between him and his competitor in arms. He took every precaution, however, that skill and experience could suggest for the defence of Bouchain, which contained a garrison of 6000 men, commanded by able officers. But notwithstanding the strength of the town, the courage of its defenders, a numerous army on one side, and the garrisons of Condé and Vallenciennes on the other, in twenty days the garrison, after offering to capitulate, surrendered themselves prisoners of war.

The capture of Bouchain formed the last enterprise of this celebrated general. Upon his return from the campaign he was accused of having taken a bribe of £6000 a year from a Jew who contracted to supply the army with bread; and the queen thought proper to dismiss him from all his employments. The desire of accumulating money is acknowledged to have been a passion which actuated this general throughout the whole of his conduct, and which tarnished the lustre of his military talents and his personal accomplishments. At the time when he received this gratuity from Medina the Jew, he was allowed ten thousand pounds a year by the queen; and, in addition to his ordinary pay as general of the British forces, he reserved to his private emolument two and a half per cent. from the pay of foreign troops maintained by England.

Previous to these transactions, the emperor Joseph died of the small-pox without male issue, so that the immediate aim of his brother was to succeed him on the Imperial throne. The event was on the 28th of April communicated by a message from the queen to both houses. She informed them, that the states-general had concurred with her in a resolution to support the house of Austria; and that they had already taken such measures as would secure the election of Charles to the head of the empire.

The duke of Argyle, who had been recommended to the command in Spain by his enmity to the duke of Marlborough, landed at Barcelona on the 9th of May, and found the British troops in the utmost distress for want of subsistence Having waited in vain for the promised remittances, he was obliged to borrow money on his own credit before the French troops could take the field. At length Stahremburg advanced towards the enemy, who attacked him at the pass of Prato del Rey, where they were repulsed with considerable loss. After this action, the duke of Argyle was seized with a violent fever, and was conveyed back to Barcelona, from whence he transmitted pressing but unsuccessful complaints of remaining unsupported, to the ministry. The castle of Cardona being invested by Vendome, a detachment for the relief of that fortress defeated the besiegers, killed two thousand on the spot, and took all their artillery, ammunition, and baggage. From the deficiency of supplies, however, Stahremburg was disabled from following up the blow; and the duke of Argyle, mortified at the culpable neglect with which he was treated, returned to England in disgust.

The disputes between Charles and the duke of Savoy having been terminated by an interview between these two princes at Milan, and prince Eugene, at the head of the German forces, protecting the electors at Frankfort from the designs of the enemy, Charles was unanimously called to the empire.

For some time before the dismission of Marlborough, a negotiation for peace had been carried on between the court of France and the new ministry. The latter hoped to obtain for the subjects of Great Britain, such advantages as might silence the clamours of the Whig party. In order, therefore, to terminate the war as soon as possible, the earl of Jersey, who acted in concert with Oxford, transmitted to the court of France a private message, imparting the queen's anxious desire for peace, and a wish for the renewal of the conference. Peace, on almost any terms, being the ardent wish of the minister, Mr. Prior was privately sent to France, and Monsieur Mesnager came to England, and signed some preliminary articles; after which, Prior was succeeded by Bolinbroke, who was commissioned to prosecute what his predecessor had begun.

The opening speech of her majesty to the parliament, on the seventh day of December, announced the appointment of a time and place for the approaching congress. In the house of lords, the earl of Nottingham proposed a clause to be inserted in the address of thanks, representing to her majesty, that, in the opinion of the house, no peace could be safe or honourable to Great Britain or Europe, if Spain and the West Indies should be allotted to any branch of the house of Bourbon. After a violent debate, in which the duke of Marlborough was provoked to defend himself against the attacks of his enemies, by appealing to her majesty whether he had not always informed her of every proposal of peace, and submitted himself to the instructions of her council, the motion of Nottingham was carried by a small majority.

The duke of Hamilton having claimed a seat in the house of lords, under his newly-acquired title of duke of Brandon, it became a subject of dispute, whether Scottish peers, created English peers since the union, had a right to sit in the upper house. After vehement debates, it was determined in the negative, by a majority of five. The bill against occasional conformity was revived by the earl of Nottingham, in more moderate terms than those which had been formerly rejected. The duke of Devonshire obtained leave to bring in a bill for giving precedence of all peers to the elector of Hanover, as duke of Cambridge; and an address was presented to the queen, desiring that she would instruct her plenipotentiaries to consult with the ministers of the allies in Holland, before the opening of the congress, that they might concert the necessary measures for proceeding with unanimity. In order to secure a majority in the house of lords, twelve new peers were created; and the queen, having sent a message desiring the lords to adjourn, it was only by the weight of these newly-created peers, that the legality of causing one house to adjourn before the other was established.

The arrival of prince Eugene, the ardent friend and admirer of Marlborough, was unpleasing to the queen, and alarming to the ministry. He was received with a complacency calculated to lull his suspicion of the real sentiments of the court, while party riots were excited to insult his person, and his family was traduced in the public journals, through the secret influence of the ministry; the court and nobility received him with every external indication of respect; he was adored by the Whigs, and applauded by the people. On her birth day, the queen presented him with a sword worth £5000.; though she regarded him as one of the principal supporters of the war faction, now so hateful to her mind, and was well aware of his intercourse with the heads of the excluded party, and his connection with the baron de Bothmar, the Hanoverian envoy, who had been active in fomenting the discontents of the people.

The earl of Stafford, who had lately been recalled from the Hague, where he resided as ambassador, was sent back to Holland with orders to communicate to the pensionary, Heinsius, the preliminary proposals, and to fix upon a place where the plenipotentiaries should assemble. The Dutch, upon examining the preliminaries, were averse to beginning the conference. They sent over an envoy, to endeavour to dissuade the queen from her resolution; but not succeeding in this attempt, they fixed upon Utrecht as the place of general conference, and accordingly granted passports to the French ministers. Neither the Dutch nor the Germans, however, refrained from any possible expedient to avert the probability of peace. The emperor addressed circular letters to the princes of the empire, exhorting them to persist in their former engagements; and the Whigs continued to disseminate disputes and dissatisfaction, by every mode of appeal to the passions and the interests of the community.

It must be confessed, indeed, that many of the motives which had first incited the confederates to take up arms, no longer existed. Charles of Austria, in whose cause England had expended so much blood and treasure, was now the possessor of the Imperial throne; and every reason conspired to withhold him from supporting his pretensions to the crown of Spain, the acquisition of which was become an object incompatible with the liberties of Europe. The elector of Bavaria, who had been intimately connected with the French, was now detached from them; and the Dutch, who had trembled for their own barrier, were now encroaching on that of the enemy. Though it was the interest of England, therefore, that her allies should be reinstated in their rights, it was inconsistent with good policy that they should be rendered too powerful.

Exasperated by the intrigues and opposition of the Dutch, the house of commons expressed its sentiments of the conduct of the states-general, in terms of severe reprehension. They asserted, that the queen had paid above three millions of crowns in subsidies, above what she was bound to advance by her engagements, and that the states had always been deficient in their proportion of troops, both in Spain and the Netherlands. The house of commons voted, that in the barrier treaty, which had been concluded with the states-general by lord Townsend, after the conferences at Guertrugdenburg, there were several articles destructive to the trade and interest of Great Britain, and therefore highly dishonourable to her majesty. It was represented in a long address, that England, during the war, had been overcharged nineteen millions. The states-general, astonished and alarmed by these resolutions, drew up a respectful letter to the queen, in which they represented the necessity of a barrier for the mutual security of England and of the United Provinces. They published at the same time, in one of the English journals, a memorial in vindication of their proceedings during the war, which was voted a false, scandalous, and malicious libel, reflecting on the resolutions of the house; and the printer and publisher were taken into custody, as guilty of a breach of privilege.

Among the other acts of the commons during the present session, were the repeal of the act of naturalization; the passing of a bill, granting toleration to the episcopal clergy of Scotland, notwithstanding the security of the presbyterian government was a fundamental condition of the treaty of union; a clause was inserted, prohibiting civil magistrates from executing the sentences of the kirk-judicatories. An act was passed for discontinuing the courts of justice during the holidays, notwithstanding they are never kept by persons of that persuasion; and the right of patronage, which had been abolished when the discipline of the kirk was last established, was restored.

1712. In the month of January, the conferences were opened at Utrecht, under the conduct of Robinson, bishop of Bristol, lord privy-seal, and the earl of Stafford, on the side of the English; of Vuys and Vanderdussen on the part of the Dutch; and of the marshal D'Uxelles, cardinal Polignaes, and M. Mesnager, in behalf of France. The ministers of the emperor and Savoy assisted, and the other allies sent their plenipotentiaries, though with the utmost reluctance. England and France being the only powers that were sincerely inclined to peace, the deputies of the other confederates retarded the progress of the negotiation. The emperor persisted in his claim to the Spanish monarchy, while the Dutch adhered to preliminaries which had been formerly rejected.

The ministers, impressed with the conviction, that, in case of the queen's death before the conclusion of the treaty, an event not unlikely, from the declining and uncertain state of her health, they would be subjected to all the revengeful virulence of the opposite party for obeying her commands, commenced a private negotiation with France. They stipulated certain advantages for the subjects of Great Britain, which were privately agreed upon by the two courts; but the peculiarity of the circumstances in which the stipulations were drawn up, and the haste with which the agreement was concluded, prevented that vigilant watchfulness over the interests of England, which would have been justified by the success of her arms, and the commanding attitude in which she had hitherto presided over the affairs of Europe.

The French plenipotentiaries at Utrecht delivered their proposals in writing, under the title of specific offers, which were met on the part of the confederates by the most extravagant demands. The queen, whose sole happiness appeared to depend on the conclusion of peace, finding that the confederates were not inclined to moderate their demands, declared that, as they refused to co-operate with her openly and sincerely, she regarded herself as entirely released from all her engagements, and secretly directed the duke of Ormond not to act on the offensive. Prince Eugene, having been joined by the duke, projected an attack on the French army, and was therefore made acquainted with the instructions received by his coadjutor, who desired permission to return home. Eugene, however, invested the town of Quesnoy, and the duke, at the risk of his own responsibility, assisted him with seven battalions and nine squadrons of foreign troops, in the pay of Great Britain. For the sake of appearances, Ormond afterwards received an order to co-operate with the generals of the allies, and the siege was undertaken under the cover of his forces. But on the 24th of the month, the duke informed Eugene, that he had received the commands of the queen to publish, within three days, a suspension of arms between his army and that of the French for two months. The foreign troops, however, in the pay of England, refused obedience to his orders, alleging that the commands of their officers to act against the French were positive and unconditional. After the capture of Quesnoy, the garrison surrendering prisoners of war, prince Eugene dispatched major-general Grovenstein, with fifteen hundred horse, to penetrate into the heart of France. He advanced so far as to spread terror into the capital, and render it expedient for Lewis to increase the number of his guards at Versailles. After ravaging and burning the country in his progress, he retreated too fast to be pursued by the forces dispatched for that purpose.

In a speech made by lord Halifax, he expatiated on the ill-consequences of the duke of Ormond's refusal to co-operate with prince Eugene, and moved an address to her majesty, imploring her to withdraw the restrictions on the conduct of the English general. The earl of Paulet replied, that though no one could doubt of the duke of Ormond's courage, he did not resemble a certain general, who led his troops to the slaughter, in hopes that a great number of officers might be "knocked on the head," that by disposing of their commissions he might increase his own treasures. The duke of Marlborough, exasperated by a sarcasm uttered in his presence, challenged the earl; but was prevented from proceeding further in the quarrel, by the express commands of the queen.

The other allies having resolved to prosecute the war, without the co-operation of the English troops, were attacked by Villars at Denain, their entrenchments forced, and seventeen battalions destroyed or made prisoners. Among the latter were the earl of Albemarle, the commander, and the surviving officers.

In Holland, the prosecution of the war was the favourite object of every rank and description of society. The elector of Hanover refused to coincide in the views of the queen of England, and the king of Prussia was equally inimical to the conclusion of peace. Portugal rested the solicitations of England, till the siege of Campo-Major by the marquis de Bay, with 20,000 men, taught the court the necessity of acquiescence; and even when the Portuguese minister signed the suspension of arms, he excused his conduct to the allies, as the effect of insurmountable necessity. The English troops in Spain, separated from the army of count Stahremburg, marched to the neighbourhood of Barcelona, where they were embarked on board an English squadron, and transported to Minorca.

The articles of the intended treaty were warmly canvassed in every rank of the metropolis; and the duke of Hamilton having been appointed ambassador extraordinary to the court of France, the Whigs strongly suspected that nobleman of attachment to the Pretender. The duke and lord Mohun, having been for some time at variance on the subject of a lawsuit, the latter, a tame and subservient dependant upon the Whigs, under pretext of their former quarrel, sent a challenge to the duke, by general Macartney. Attended by Macartney and colonel Hamilton, they met by appointment in Hyde Park, and fought with so much fury, that Mohun was killed upon the spot, and the duke expired as they were conveying him to his house. Macartney escaped in disguise to the continent. Colonel Hamilton declared upon oath, before the privy-council, that when the principals engaged, he and Macartney followed their example; that Macartney was immediately disarmed; that seeing the duke fall upon his antagonist, he (Hamilton) threw away the swords, and ran to lift him up; and that while he was employed in that office, Macartney, having taken up one of the swords, stabbed the duke over colonel Hamilton's shoulder, and immediately fled. Macartney was treated by the Tories as a cowardly assassin, in the service of his party; the Whigs affirmed, that the duel was entirely the result of a private quarrel. Macartney afterwards submitted to a trial, in which the prevarication of Hamilton, and the testimony of several persons who witnessed the combat at a distance, were the grounds of his acquittal. The duke of Marlborough, hearing himself accused as the author of these party-mischiefs, retired to the continent, whither he was followed by his duchess.

The plenipotentiaries of Great Britain and France, together with those of the states, met in form on the 18th of January; but their progress to an adjustment of the affairs of Europe, was retarded by the unexpected death of the only son of Lewis XIV. at the age of fifty. He was succeeded, in the title of heir of France, by his son the duke of Burgundy, a prince not less remarkable for animation and the love of business, than his father for the opposite qualities. But he also died on the 18th of February, having survived only six days his wife the dauphiness, Marie-Adelaide of Savoy. These events, so fatal to the royal family of France, were followed in a few days more by the death of the duke of Britany, the duke of Burgundy's eldest son. They were all buried in the same grave. Out of three sons, born to the duke of Burgundy, the duke of Anjou, a sickly infant, alone remained. The misfortunes of France raised the courage of such of the confederates as were eager for continuing the war, and England concurred with the other powers, in demanding new securities for the stability of the peace, and for preventing the crowns of France and Spain from devolving to the same possessor. After many expedients and contre-projets, Philip resolved to renounce his precarious prospect of the crown of France, for the certain possession of the throne of Spain. The treaty afterwards proceeded without obstruction or delay. In the beginning of August, the secretary St. John, accompanied by the abbé Gualtier and Mr. Prior, visited incognito the court of Versailles, and adjusted the interests of the duke of Savoy and the elector of Bavaria. A suspension of arms, by sea and land, of which a principal condition was the surrender of Dunkirk to the British troops, and which extended to four months, was concluded between England and France. On the 6th of June, the queen came to the house of lords, and made a speech from the throne. She observed, that though the making of peace or war was the undoubted prerogative of the crown, she was resolved, in consequence of her promise, to communicate to her parliament the terms of the treaty, before it should be concluded. In the house of commons, an address of thanks was voted, without one dissentient voice; but the address of the lords was not passed till after violent debates.

The wishes of Anne, respecting the succession, were decidedly hostile to the claims of the elector of Hanover. The bias of family connection, the morbid conviction of the queen, that she was enjoying that dignity which ought to have been the possession of a near relative, and her affection for her brother, conspired to render her averse to the popular and expected mode of succession. The principles she had now imbibed from the Tories, were not inconsistent with the restoration of the family of James; and she had learned by experience, that both in England and Scotland, the majority of those who were distinguished by the title of Jacobites, or of the low church party, were in secret communication with the court of St. Germains: and the most powerful motive by which she was influenced, in her conclusion of peace with France, was the hope that it might ultimately lead to such arrangements, as would enable her to exclude the Hanoverian family from the throne. The elector himself had already become indifferent to his claim on the crown of England. He was harrassed by the intrigues and overtures of contending parties, and, unacquainted with the bigotry of the Pretender's character, concluded that his restoration would be the immediate result of the death of the queen. The excluded party in vain endeavoured to obtain, from his gratitude or generosity, the pecuniary means of prosecuting their schemes against the existing government; and having suggested the idea of invading England with a body of troops, conveyed in Danish vessels, the elector discouraged the project, as equally improper and unattainable.

The death of the duke of Hamilton made way for the duke of Shrewsbury, as ambassador to the court of Versailles. Lord Lexington having been appointed ambassador extraordinary to Philip V. had arrived at Madrid in the middle of October. He was present at the king of Spain's solemn renunciation of the crown of France, for himself and his posterity; a ceremony, which was performed in the presence of the council of Castile and Arragon. The English parliament continued to be prorogued, as the tedious negotiations at Utrecht had not yet been brought to a close. The duke of Shrewsbury and the marquis de Torcy settled the plan of a general peace at Paris, which a courier carried to Utrecht in the middle of March. On the 27th of March, the lord privy-seal and the earl of Strafford acquainted the ministers of the allies, that they had appointed the 31st of that month for signing a treaty of peace, and another of commerce between Great Britain and France; and they requested, therefore, the plenipotentiaries of the confederates to be prepared, at the same time, to sign their respective treaties. The conditions of peace to be allowed to the emperor, or the empire, had been prepared by the queen of Great Britain and the French king. These were delivered in form to count Zinzendorf, his Imperial majesty's minister. The emperor, exasperated to resentment, resolved to continue the war. The British and French plenipotentiaries were the first who signed for their respective sovereigns. Their example was followed, in the space of a few hours, by the minister of the duke of Savoy, and by those of Portugal and Prussia. The states were the last who signed the treaty; the French plenipotentiaries having insisted, that the ministers of such princes, as their master had acknowledged as kings, should take place of the ambassadors of a republic.

Thus was concluded a treaty, which, after the lapse of many years, and the profuse expenditure of blood and treasure, neither stipulated any adequate indemnification for the past, nor promised any substantial security for the future. The chief advantages gained in the treaty were such as the queen and her ministers would willingly have evaded, and which Lewis acceded to king William, whose title he acknowledged in the treaty of Ryswick, but soon after permitted the Pretender to be proclaimed king of Great Britain at St. Germains. The French king acknowledged the succession in the protestant line of Hanover. It was agreed, that the fortifications of the city of Dunkirk should be razed, the harbour filled up, and the sluices, which served to cleanse the harbours, be levelled at the expence of the French king, within the space of five months, with the express condition, that they should never be repaired; but the stipulated demolition was not to be begun, till Lewis was placed in possession of the equivalents granted by England. By the treaty of Ryswick, restitution had been made of all the places in Hudson's Bay and the island Newfoundland, which had been taken on either side during the war. But by this treaty, Hudson's Bay and Hudson's Straits, with all the lands, forts, seas, coasts, rivers, &c. were to be ceded for ever to Great Britain, with the cannon, and a quantity of ammunition proportionable to the cannon-ball that should be found in the forts. Commissaries were to be appointed on both sides, to regulate the limits between Hudson's Bay and the places belonging to France, and Lewis was to satisfy the Hudson's Bay Company, for the damages they had sustained since the cessation of hostilities was proclaimed. On the other hand, the queen was to cause satisfaction to be given for the damages the French had sustained at Montserrat, and some other grievances relating to the island of Nevis, and the castle of Gambia. Great Britain was to have possession of Nova Scotia and its antient boundaries; and Newfoundland, with the adjacent islands: but the French were to have the liberty of erecting huts, and stages, and other conveniences for drying fish on that part which stretched along from the northern point of the island, and extended by the west side as far as Point Riche. The island of Cape Breton, and all others in the bay and river of St. Laurence, were hereafter to belong to the French, with full liberty to erect fortifications in any of the ceded forts, places, and islands.

Though the advantages which England obtained by the treaty of Utrecht, were neither adequate to the importance of her victories, nor to the profusion of her expence, they extended the glory and the commerce of the kingdom. She secured the dominion of the Mediterranean, by obtaining Gibralter and Minorca; she strengthened and extended her dominions in America, and in addition to the triumph obtained by the relinquishment of Newfoundland, the cession of Hudson's Bay and St. Christopher's, and the other articles of the treaty, she intimidated Lewis into the greatest concessions to the duke of Savoy, whom of all the confederates he hated most. The majority of the confederates had reason to be highly satisfied. The duke of Savoy had obtained the cession of his duchy, the district of Nice, and all he had received in Italy from the emperor Leopold. He was raised to the throne of Sicily, and was declared the successor to the crown of Spain, in default of the issue-male of Philip V. The demands of the king of Portugal were few, and easily satisfied. The states received, as a barrier, Luxemburg, Namur, Charleroy, and the other cities already in their possession. Their commerce with France was placed on the foundation established by the Tariff of 1664. The Rhine was to form the limits of the empire on the side of France, and the fortifications raised or possessed by the French, beyond that river, to be restored to the emperor, or destroyed. The dominions of Italy were to revert to their former sovereigns, and Naples and the duchy of Milan were ceded to his Imperial majesty.

The situation of Harley, earl of Oxford, at this period, was in the highest degree responsible and precarious. He had offended the Whigs, by his open attachment to the friends of the Pretender, without exciting the unreserved confidence of the opposite party. His mysterious and reserved conduct provoked the personal animosity, and repressed the attachment of his political opponents and his private friends. His only security for the continuance of power was the support of the queen, whom he had alarmed, by rumours and insinuations, into a state of the most absolute dependence. To secure himself against the suspicions of the populace, who accused him of influencing the mind of the queen in favour of the Pretender, he secretly advised her majesty to assure parliament, in her speech from the throne, that the utmost harmony subsisted between her and the heirs of the crown. She accordingly declared, in her speech to parliament on the ninth of April, that the most perfect friendship subsisted between her and the house of Hanover. She alluded to the conclusion of peace, and the licentiousness of the press; complained of the prevalence of duelling; recommended unanimity in the great councils of the nation; and reprobated the violence and continuance of party rage.

The first measures of the house of commons were in conformity with the wishes of the queen. Some instances of mismanagement, in the accounts of the army, were examined and punished. But their attention was now diverted to an object of greater importance. The treaty which related to the territorial possessions of England and France was accompanied by a treaty of commerce. On the fourteenth of May, a motion was made to bring in a bill to make good the eighth and ninth articles of the treaty of commerce. By the eighth article it was provided, that the subjects of both nations should trade on an equal footing, and by the ninth article, that the Tariff of 1664 should not take place, till two months after a law should be passed in Great Britain, to reduce the duty on all French commodities to an equality, for what was usually paid for goods of the like nature, imported from any other country of Europe. It was the opinion of eminent merchants, that such an arrangement would have destroyed the trade to Spain and Portugal, because neither of these two countries could receive the commodities of Britain, but in exchange for their wines, and the duties payable in France on the British commodities, especially for fish, sugar, and woollen manufactures of all sorts, which generally found a market in Spain, Portugal, and Italy, were to continue so high, that there was no probability of vending them in France but at considerable loss: while no prohibition had been laid on English wool, dying drugs, or other articles that might enable France to rival our manufactures.

The fish which the British merchants bring annually in great quantities from Newfoundland, and other parts of North America, could not have found a market in Spain and Portugal for the same reason. Britain could not, according to the Tariff, take any of their wines in exchange; nor could they have been sold in France, not only because of the high duties laid upon fish imported into France, but because the French had now the liberty of catching as many fish as they pleased, and of curing them in the most commodious parts of the British plantations. This branch, therefore, of a productive and extensive trade must have been quite lost to Britain, since the exchange of these commodities, and of the native manufactures of the kingdom for wines, was the greatest encouragement, not only to the Spaniards and Portuguese, to deal with Britain in those articles, but to the Italians, and other nations which supplied us with wines, fruits, oils, and raw silks. Notwithstanding these considerations, the bill was ordered to be introduced by a great majority. But the triumph of the ministers was of short duration. A society of forty members, denominated the October Club, dissatisfied with the conduct of Oxford, and willing to terrify him into decisive measures in favour of the Pretender, leagued themselves on this question with the Whigs, and by their accession to the party, gave it a majority of nine votes against the commitment of the bill.

The malt-tax having been extended to Scotland, the Scottish members in both houses of parliament met at a tavern, and having appointed two lords and two commoners to wait in their name upon the queen, they requested permission to bring in a bill for the dissolution of the union. The individual who chiefly animated the opposition was the duke of Argyle, a man of careless, frank, and enthusiastic disposition, who neither concealed his resentments nor disguised his designs. With a commanding manner, which stamped his forwardness with an appearance of authority; he was feared by many, loved by none; In his public exhibitions in parliament, he was rather spirited than eloquent; and all his better qualities were obscured by the love of money. The earl of Oxford, aware of his influence over the multitude, endeavoured to gain him over to his views; but the opportunity of opposing the minister, presented by the imposition of the malt-tax, was too propitious to be neglected, and he therefore flattered the prejudices, and fomented the resentment of the Scottish members. When the question for bringing in the bill was put, it was carried by a majority of four voices; a disappointment occasioned by the indiscretion of the duke himself, who offended, among other lords, two bishops, who possessed between them three proxies, by mentioning the Pretender with contempt. The Scots, exasperated by their want of success, and by the speech of Argyle, returned to the support of the court; and the exclusion of the Whigs from power was thus prolonged, by the indiscreet enthusiasm of one of their own number. Oxford took immediate advantage of the change. A palliative address was presented to the queen, approving of the treaties of peace and commerce. In opposition to the Whigs, a bill was passed, empowering the queen to raise five hundred and ten thousand pounds, for the payment of the debts of the civil list: and the Whigs, having introduced a motion that "the duke of Lorraine should be solicited to remove the Pretender from his dominions," with the purpose of throwing upon the Tories the odium of opposing it, the latter, aware of the stratagem, suffered it to pass through both houses without resisting its progress, the only dissentient voice being that of lord North. On the third of June, the commons addressed the queen, desiring to know what was the equivalent to be granted to the French king, for the demolition of Dunkirk; and received for answer that the equivalent was already in the hands of the king of France. Soon afterwards a person deputed by the magistrates of Dunkirk, arrived to solicit the queen to spare the harbour and port of that town, a request which was necessarily refused; and on the 26th of September, the demolition of that fortress was begun, under the inspection of colonel Armstrong and colonel Clayton. On the 16th of July the queen prorogued the parliament, in a speech expressive of her gratitude for the affection, zeal, and duty of the commons; her satisfaction at obtaining an advantageous and honourable peace; her hope that the affair of commerce, in the next session, would be so well understood, that the advantageous conditions obtained from France might be rendered available by law; and her assurance, that her faithful parliament would exert themselves in preventing the divisions and animosities which too generally prevailed. This speech, which, from its silence with respect to the Hanoverian succession, and its implied censure of the proceedings of the house respecting the commercial treaty, became the object of much animadversion, was in all probability the composition of Bolingbroke, who at this time began to supersede lord Oxford in the favour of the queen. During the intrigues of this nobleman in the cabinet, the Whigs continued their correspondence with the elector of Hanover, and demanded, at various times, considerable sums for the support of party writers and indigent noblemen, attached to his cause. He refused to comply with their requests, on the ground of poverty. The Pretender lived, in the mean time, in great security at Bar-le-duc, devoting his time to the duties of religion, and indifferent, if not regardless, to the intrigues of his enemies and the efforts of his friends.

The new parliament had scarcely assembled, before the commons resolved, that a book entitled, "Memoirs of the chevalier de St. George," was a scandalous and seditious libel. The motion was brought forward with the design of assailing lord chancellor Phipps, who was unwilling to exercise the rigor of the law against writers who favoured his own principles. It was likewise resolved, that an address should be presented, to remove sir Constantine Phipps from his place of lord high chancellor, he having prejudiced a cause depending in a court of law, by declaring his opinion in a speech to the lord-mayor and aldermen of Dublin. The votes of the lords, on the contrary, imported that sir Constantine Phipps had, in the several stations wherein he had served her majesty, acquitted himself with honour and integrity; and the commons replied to the resolutions of the lords, by attacking the conduct of Phipps with still more active and decided asperity.

The earl of Oxford, finding his power usurped and his influence counteracted by the intrigues of Bolingbroke, long hesitated between the love of place and the obvious dictates of prudence. Her majesty's dread of the Whigs had gradually subsided, and conscious that her state of health was such as to render her existence precarious, she became anxious, from motives of religion, for the succession of her brother to the throne.

Bolingbroke, by sympathizing in feelings so natural, and so unequivocally expressed, gradually supplanted the earl of Oxford; and willing to secure, beyond the probability of change, the advantages he had gained, determined to obtain, if possible, the recal to England of the duke of Marlborough. That nobleman himself performed every act of conciliation and respect that could be expected, to reinstate him in the good graces of the queen. He wrote to all the branches of the family, and to the court of France, assuring them of his sincerity and zeal. Finding that the queen was obdurate, and that the Pretender himself treated his proposals with distrust, he resumed his correspondence with the elector of Hanover, who was still importuned by the Whigs for supplies of money, and who continued to listen to their demands with coldness and reluctance. A proposal, made by the baron de Bernstorf, president of the elector's council, was received by Marlborough and Cadogan with eagerness and joy. He insinuated that his electoral highness might be induced to borrow, to the extent of £20,000, from his friends in Britain. This sum was to be laid out on the poor lords, and on the common-council of the city of London. The first would be thus enabled to vote according to their principles; the latter might harass the government by remonstrances in favour of civil liberty and the protestant succession. Marlborough and Cadogan undertook to furnish the money, on the obligation of his electoral highness, provided the interest of 5*l.* per cent. should be regularly paid. But the elector refused to give any obligation for principal or interest, and merely intimated to his friends that they should advance the money, as they would be certain of reimbursement when he, or the electress his mother, should come to the throne.

At the end of December, the queen, who had been long declining, fell into a dangerous illness; nor could the tumults excited by the report be removed, till the queen herself wrote a letter, on the first of February, to the lord mayor, announcing her recovery. The parliament met on the fifteenth of February, and on the twenty-seventh of that month the queen returned to London, amidst the acclamations of the populace. On the 2nd of March, to which day the parliament had adjourned, she went to the house of lords, and addressed them in terms suitable to the state of the times. She reprobated the conduct of those who insinuated, that the succession to the house of Hanover was in danger, and recommended them to unite the difference of parties, and follow her example by improving the benefits of peace. A motion was soon afterwards made, in the house of commons, against a pamphlet, written in reality by a Mr. Moore, but generally attributed to Mr. Richard Steele. The latter acknowledged himself to be the author of the obnoxious publication, and after various and long debates he was expelled the house. The Whigs, endeavouring to retaliate for the severity against Steele, extended their animadversions to a pamphlet, written in reply to his, which was generally ascribed to the pen of Dr. Swift. They were outvoted by the Tories, and the whole affair was finally removed into a court of common law.

The domestic history of the reign of Anne contains little more than a continued series of such political hostilities; many of them deservedly forgotten, with the trivial occasions that called them forth, and more consistent with the minuteness of biography, than with the selection and compression of historical narrative. Nor was the violence of the opposing parties, or their intrigues with the court of Hanover, more frequent or remarkable than the indecision of the queen; who, insulted by a proposal in the house of commons, to solicit that she would put a price on her brother the Pretender's head, and still wavering between her dread of Harley, and her attachment to Bolingbroke, was gradually sinking to the grave. Her affliction was augmented by the conduct of the elector of Hanover, who, at the earnest request of the Whigs, permitted Schutz, his envoy, to demand in the name of the electress a writ for the electoral prince, as duke of Cambridge. On the delivery of this proposal at the cabinet council, the queen exhibited every symptom of violence and passion. She declared, in the most peremptory manner, that she would rather suffer the last extremities, than permit any prince of the electoral family to come to Britain during her life. She ordered the master of the ceremonies to forbid Schutz admission to her court, and immediately solicited his recal. In the mean time, the cousin of lord Oxford arrived at the court of Hanover, with the earl's assurances of regard. He was received with coldness, and returned with no more satisfactory answer, than a repetition of the elector's request. In order to divert him from his purpose, the queen took advantage of a discovery made by the earl of Wharton, that several Irish officers were employed in enlisting men for the Pretender, to issue a proclamation, promising a reward of five thousand pounds for apprehending the Pretender, whenever he should land, or attempt to land, in Great Britain. The two houses voted an address of thanks, and extended the reward to one hundred thousand pounds. While she was thus endeavouring to disguise her real sentiments, the electress Sophia died suddenly at Hanover, in the 84th year of her age.

The war had for some time been resumed, on the continent, between France and the emperor; but the loss of the two fortresses of Landau and Fribourg inclined the latter once more to listen to proposals of peace. A conference was therefore held at Rastadt, between prince Eugene and marshal Villars, and the terms of a peace were agreed upon, which were to be explained and concluded in a solemn treaty, to be signed at Baden in Switzerland. About the middle of April, the French began to fill up the harbour of Dunkirk; but at the same time they began to form a canal at Mardike, which would have answered all the purposes of the harbour. The work was nearly finished, notwithstanding the remonstrance of the English court, before the death of Lewis XIV., and was not discontinued, till after many protests and much negotiation in the ensuing reign.

The supplies being granted, the queen came in person to the house of lords, and informed the parliament, that anxious as she was to preserve the religion and the liberty of her subjects, and to secure the present and future tranquillity of the kingdom, her parliament ought to pay the same regard to the just prerogatives of her crown, and the honour of her government. She made no mention, however, of the house of Hanover, or of the protestant succession. The parliament was now prorogued by the lord chancellor to the 10th of August, a measure which was attributed, by the Whigs, to the anxiety of the ministers, that parliament might not be sitting on the death of the queen, an event of which the probability was more and more observable. Her decline was accelerated, by the quarrels of the two individuals nearest her person, Oxford and Bolingbroke. The former perceiving how little interest he retained in her good opinion, excited her open resentment and that of Bolingbroke, by encouraging an address, requesting her majesty to apply to the use of the public her share of the profits of the Assiento contract. This was a contract for negroes, of which the queen had reserved to herself a fifth share, which share was to be divided into sixteen others. Five were designed for the lord treasurer, five for Bolingbroke, four for lady Masham, and two for Arthur Moore, the agent. The resentment of the queen was still further exasperated, by the insinuations of Bolingbroke, that Oxford had influenced the elector of Hanover to demand the writ, which had so powerfully excited her displeasure; and she therefore resolved to dismiss from her presence and her confidence a servant, whose mysterious temper and repulsive manners had long excited her suspicion and disgust, and of whose fidelity she could not be assured. Bolingbroke, unwearied in the prosecution of his ambitious views, alarmed her fears, and flattered her prepossessions. Through his influence, when the treasurer came to court on the 27th day of July, he was deprived of his staff, but suffered to retain his other offices.

The earl of Oxford has been characterized by a writer, whose peculiar facilities of information respecting this period of English history entitle his opinions to peculiar respect, as a man whose talents were neither extensive nor obvious. Though he was regarded as a patron of learning, and of literary men, his progress in literature was confined to that slight knowledge of the dead languages, which men intended for public life generally bring from school. In the disposition of his mind, he was reserved, distrustful, and cold; a lover of secrecy to such a degree, that he assumed its appearance in mere trifles; fond of importance, without any dignity of manner; so full of professions, that he was always deemed insincere. With a facility of temper that could deny no request, but with a defect of mind that could bestow nothing with grace, he offended the disappointed, and even lost those whom he served. Though his intellectual powers were not of the highest order, in, his dexterous management of two parties, by which he was equally hated; in his tempering the fury of the advocates of the Pretender; in his amusing the vehemence of the Whigs; and in his advancing the interests of the house of Hanover, when most distrusted by its members and adherents; he displayed a considerable degree of address and political knowledge. The importance of his services, and the extent of his influence, were the most strikingly testified by the sensation excited by his dismissal. During three days of confusion in the cabinet, the minds of men were agitated by the vicissitudes of hope and fear. The queen having assisted at a select council, in the night of the twenty-eighth of July, she was distressed and perplexed by their indecision and difference of opinion. Her agitation occasioned the cessation of the usual discharge from her leg, and she fell into a state of insensibility, which terminated in her death at Kensington, on the morning of Sunday, the 1st of August, in the 50th year of her age.

The person of Anne was of the middle size, her complexion sanguine, her hair dark, her features more regular than pleasing. Her virtues were of the negative kind; she was neither violent in temper, profuse in expence, nor bigotted in religion. Her good-nature, degenerated into timidity, and her gentleness and inactivity of mind, were better adapted to the virtues of domestic privacy, than to the important and arduous functions of a powerful sovereign. The splendor of those military triumphs, which rescued Europe and England from the encroachments of French ambition, have cast around her portrait an incidental and extrinsic lustre, and contributed, during her reign, to confirm and extend her popularity with the great body of the nation. She was an amiable woman, rather than a great princess; in all her actions she was guided by the dictates of her honest conscience, and her errors were the errors of understanding, and not of principle.

CHAPTER VII.

GEORGE I.

Accession of George I.—Appointment of the Ministry—Impeachment of the Earl of Oxford—Banishment of the Duke of Ormond—Discontents of the People—Exile of Bolingbroke—Rebellion in Scotland—Change of Ministry—The Septennial Act—Affairs of the Continent—Naval Exploits—Financial Measures—Discharge of the Earl of Oxford—The Bishop of Bangor's Pamphlet—Misunderstanding between the King and the Prince of Wales—Modification of the Test Act—The South Sea Bubble—Administration of Walpole.

GEORGE-LOUIS, elector of Hanover, ascended the throne of Great Britain, with the unanimous approbation of the great body of the people, and with the silent acquiescence of the most powerful and active friends of the house of Stuart. The advancement of Shrewsbury to the head of the treasury; the consequent failure of Bolingbroke's intrigues; and the apparent indifference of the queen to the question of succession; all contributed to repress the confidence, and cloud the expectations of the Tories. Previous to the departure of the king from Hanover, he had transmitted orders to the regency, consisting of the seven great officers of state, and certain other persons appointed by virtue of an act, passed in the late reign, to remove lord Bolingbroke from his post of secretary of state, and to seal up the doors of his office; a measure, not less justified by the conduct and character of that extraordinary individual, than conducive to the patient and prudent submission of his partizans. At the period of his accession, George had attained the 55th year of his age. He derived his descent from the blood-royal of England, by his mother Sophia, daughter of Frederic, elector-palatine and king of Bohemia, who married Elizabeth, only daughter of James I. of England. The right of the male line of the house of Stuart, having been extinguished in the person of James II. it rested in the house of Savoy, which was descended from Henrietta, duchess of Orleans, daughter of Charles I. The princess Sophia being the youngest daughter of the palatine, whose family was numerous, more than fifty descendants of that prince were passed over in the act of William, which declared the succession to the crown to be vested in the house of Hanover. The title, therefore, of George I. was not claimed as an hereditary right, but received as the gift of the king and the people; and the family on the throne is an elected family.

So well assured was the new monarch of the attachment of his subjects, and of the weakness of the Pretender's friends, that he did not set out from Heren-Hausen till the 16th of September. His arrival in London was welcomed by M. D'Iberville, the envoy of Lewis, and by count Koningseg, the Imperial ambassador: the former assured him of the determination of his master, to cultivate the most perfect understanding with the English cabinet; and the latter proposed, in the name of the emperor, to supply any number of troops that might be required to support the authority of government. The change of ministry, which immediately succeeded the assumption of the regal power, was absolute and decisive. The earl of Nottingham, the only Tory entrusted with office, was declared president of the council; the command of the army was restored to the duke of Marlborough; lord Townsend and general Stanhope were nominated secretaries of state; the privy-seal was entrusted to the earl of Wharton, and the government of Ireland was transferred to lord Sunderland; lord Cowper was reinstated in the office of chancellor. The earl of Halifax was made first commissioner of the treasury; the king refusing to create a lord high treasurer, unwilling (as he declared) that there should be a greater man in the kingdom than himself.

THE evident partiality to the Whigs, displayed in these appointments, excited the alarm, and destroyed the influence of their opponents. Bolingbroke, too conscious that his presence at the court of his sovereign was no longer acceptable, still continued to appear in public, to justify his conduct in the late negotiations, and to speak in parliament with a boldness and enthusiasm that might have been mistaken for the ardour and intrepidity of fearless innocence. But learning that Prior, who had long been admitted to his confidence, had promised to disclose his correspondence with the enemies of England, he determined to consult his personal safety, and fled to the continent. The conduct of Oxford was less indecent; but not more creditable to his courage, or favourable to his popularity. After being received with indifference by the king, he contented himself with protesting his innocence, and complaining of his wrongs in domestic society; but his own conduct, and the public opinion respecting the treaty of peace, rendered him the object of universal distrust, and even the simple disposal of his stock in the South Sea Company was attributed to his consciousness of guilt, and his dread of punishment.

THE new parliament met on the fourteenth of March, in pursuance of a proclamation, of which the following expressions were afterwards selected, as the subjects of violent animadversion: "It having pleased Almighty God, by most remarkable steps of his providence, to bring us safe to the crown of this kingdom, notwithstanding the designs of evil men; we do not doubt, that our loving subjects will, in the ensuing elections, have a particular regard to such as shewed a firmness to the protestant succession, when it was in danger." This part of the proclamation was stigmatized by sir William Wyndham, as not only unprecedented and unwarrantable, but 1715.

of dangerous consequence, to the very being of parliaments. After being answered by lord Finch, and twice refusing to make good his assertion, he was reprimanded by the speaker. He addressed the commons, acknowledging that as he was a member of their house, he must acquiesce in their determination: but as he was not conscious of having offered any indignity to his majesty, or of having been guilty of any breach of privilege, he had no thanks to return to those gentlemen, who, under pretence of lenity, had subjected him to this censure.

In the beginning of April, general Stanhope laid before the house of commons all the papers relating to the negotiations of the late ministry with France, which were referred to a select committee of twenty-one persons. On the ninth of June, the committee delivered their report, and Mr. Walpole, as chairman, moved, that a warrant might be issued for apprehending several persons, particularly Mr. Prior and Mr. Thomas Harley, who, being in the house, were taken into custody. He then read the report, in which the secret preliminaries signed with M. Mesnager, the suspension of arms, the seizure of Ghent and Bruges by the duke of Ormond, lord Bolingbroke's journey to Paris, and separate conference with the French ministry, the precipitate conclusion of the treaty of Utrecht, and every measure relating to that event, were adduced as proofs of treachery or imbecility. After the report had been read, Mr. Walpole impeached Henry lord viscount Bolingbroke of high treason, and of other high crimes and misdemeanors; lord Coningsby immediately standing up, exclaimed, "The worthy chairman has impeached the hand; but I impeach the head: he has impeached the clerk; and I the justice: he has impeached the scholar; and I the master. I impeach Robert earl of Oxford and earl of Mortimer of high treason, and other high crimes and misdemeanors. On the twenty-first of June, Mr. Secretary Stanhope impeached James duke of Ormond of high treason; and on the next day Mr. Aislabie impeached the earl of Strafford of high crimes and misdemeanors. These impeachments were passed by a large majority. The duke of Ormond, who had merely acted in compliance with the orders he had received, and enforced measures which had been sanctioned by the legislature, but whose haughty and offensive conduct, since his return to England, had rendered him the object of universal disgust, followed the example of Bolingbroke, and, irritated by persecution, entered into the service of the court of St. Germains, now removed to Commerci in Lorraine, in which he continued, obscure and contracted, as were the situation and establishment of the Pretender, during the remainder of his life. The earl of Oxford, conscious of his services to the family of Hanover, and of his own integrity, resolved to sustain and to repel the fury of his enemies, and on the impeachment preferred by the commons, being followed by a motion in the house of peers for his commitment, he rose to speak in his defence. He observed that the whole charge might be reduced to the negotiation and conclusion of the peace; that the nation wanted a peace no one would deny; that the conditions of this peace were as good as could be expected, considering the backwardness and reluctance which some of the allies shewed to come into the queen's measures; that the peace was approved by two successive parliaments; that he had no share in the affair of Tournay, which was wholly transacted by the duke of Ormond, and if the charge could be proved, it would not amount to treason; that he had always acted by the immediate commands of the late queen, without offending against any known law; and being justified in his conscience, was unconcerned for the life of an insignificant old man. In his way to the Tower, the earl was accompanied by a great number of the populace, exclaiming, "High church, Ormond, and Oxford for ever." The discontent and turbulence of the metropolis extended to the distant counties, and, in order to quell these commotions, the commons presented an address to the king, desiring that the laws might be rigorously executed against the rioters. With the same view they prepared the riot act, declaring that if any persons to the number of twelve, when unlawfully assembled, should continue together an hour after having been required to disperse, by a justice of the peace or other officer, and heard the proclamation against riots read in public, they should be deemed guilty of felony, without benefit of clergy.

When the articles of impeachment were preferred against the earl of Strafford, that nobleman complained of the arbitrary and illegal seizure of his papers; and, after much disgraceful opposition, obtained the recovery of such as were necessary to his defence. The names of Ormond and Bolingbroke, with their armorial bearings, were erased from the rolls of the peerage, and in the address of the speaker to the king, at the close of the session, their characters treated with extreme severity. These proceedings, apparently so inconsistent with policy or justice, inflamed the resentment of their partizans, and excited the dissatisfaction of the nation. The friends of the Pretender took advantage of the general discontent, and the rebellion was actually begun in Scotland, under the direction of the earl of Mar, who proclaimed the Pretender, under the title of James III. at the head of a force amounting to 10,000 men. These circumstances were no sooner known in the southern provinces, than the earls of Hume, Winton, and Kinnoul; lords Deskford, Lockhart of Karnwarth, Hume of Whitfield, and other suspected persons were committed prisoners to Edinburgh, and major-general Whitham marched, with the regular troops which were in that kingdom, to secure the bridge of Stirling. Several ships of war had been sent to watch the preparations making at Havre; but, notwithstanding the utmost vigilance of these cruisers, two vessels arrived on the coast of Scotland with arms, ammunition, and a number of officers, who assured the earl of Mar, that the Pretender would soon arrive in person. The latter assumed the title of lieutenant-general of the Pretender's forces, issued a declaration, exhorting the people to take up arms, and assured them, by proclamation, that the national grievances should be speedily redressed.

The English ministry were immediate and decisive in their precautions. The habeas corpus act was suspended, and lord Lansdowne and the earl of Jersey, with several other noblemen, committed to the Tower. The king requested permission, through the medium of Mr. Secretary Stanhope, to seize and detain sir William Wyndham and others, who were suspected of favouring the invasion. The duke of Somerset, uncle of sir William, was dismissed from his office of master of the horse.

Notwithstanding these indications of vigour on the part of government, the earl of Derwentwater and Mr. Forster appeared at the head of an armed force in Northumberland, and proclaimed the Pretender at Warkworth, Penrith, and Lancaster. They had advanced to Preston, when they were overtaken by the king's forces under generals Willes and Carpenter. Forster presently began to raise barricadoes, and make preparations for a vigorous defence. On the 12th of November, the town was briskly attacked on all sides; and, after a determined resistance on the part of the garrison, surrendered at discretion.

The surrender at Preston occurred on the same day which was distinguished by the battle of Dumblain. The earl of Mar had returned to his camp at Forth, where he heard that the duke of Argyle was returned from Lothian to Stirling; and being now reinforced by the northern clans, under the earl of Seaforth, and those of the west, commanded by general Gordon, determined immediately to pass the Forth, in order to join his southern friends, that they might march together into England.

The duke, apprised of his intention, hastened to secure the passes of the Forth, which he himself had crossed at Stirling; and immediately took possession, with a force not exceeding 4000 men, of the heights of Dumblain. The rebels approached within two miles of his camp, and remained till day-break in order of battle; their army amounting to nine thousand effective men, cavalry and infantry. In the morning, the clans which composed the centre and right wing of the enemy, with their chiefs Clanronald and Glengary at their head, charged the left wing of the king's army, sword in hand, with such impetuosity, that in a few minutes both horse and foot were totally routed; and general Witham, who commanded them, fled at full gallop to Stirling, declaring the defeat of the whole body to be inevitable. The duke of Argyle, however, who commanded in person on the right, attacked the left of the enemy, and drove them two miles before him, as far as the water of Allan, though they attempted repeatedly to rally. The right wing of the rebels having pursued Witham to a considerable distance, had returned to the field of battle at the moment the duke was returning from the pursuit, so that each army found that it had changed its place for that occupied by the enemy previous to the conflict. In this posture they remained till the approach of night, when the rebels retired to Ardock and the duke to Dumblain; the latter returning in the morning to the field of battle, and carrying off his own wounded, and four pieces of the enemy's cannon.

So gallant and successful a defence, against superior numbers, dispirited the enthusiastic hopes of the rebellious invaders. The Pretender landed in person at Peterhead on the 26th of December, and issued various proclamations for ordering all fencible men to resort to his standard, for summoning a convention of the states, and for fixing the day of his coronation. His private conviction, however, little accorded with his public demonstrations of hope and confidence. He observed to his friends convened in council, "That it was no new thing for him to be unfortunate; his whole life, from his cradle, had been a constant series of misfortunes; and he was prepared, if it so pleased God, to suffer the threats of his enemies and their own." His despair was augmented by various successes of the royalists in the northern parts of Scotland, by the loss of Inverness, and by the junction of large reinforcements under the duke of Argyle. On the twenty-ninth day of January, the duke began his march towards Tullibardine, where he received advice that the Pretender and his forces had, on the preceding day, retired to Dundee. He took possession of Perth, and then began his march to Aberbrothwick in pursuit of the enemy. Being thus closely pursued, the Pretender embarked on board of a small French ship, which lay in the harbour of Montrose. In company with the earl of Mar, and several others of his friends, he steered his course for Norway, and, coasting along the German and Dutch shores, arrived in five days at Gravelines in France; leaving behind him, in the country he had attempted to invade, no other impression than that of wretched imbecility. The slave of abject superstition, and the victim of constitutional cowardice; he was the meek and obedient tool of his religious advisers, and resisted every effort of his rational partisans, to obtain his assent to any declaration that might guarantee the security of the established church, and dissipate the alarms of the protestant community: when pressed for the motives of his conduct, he replied, That he was told such declarations were in violation of his conscience; and asked, with warmth, "Why the Tories were so desirous to have him, if they expected those things which his religion would not allow?'

The principal noblemen, who had been concerned in the rebellion, were immediately impeached; on the tenth of January were brought from the Tower; and a day was appointed for the reception of their answers. They all pleaded guilty, except the earl of Winton, (who prayed for a longer time to prepare for his defence) and, on the demand of the commons, sentence of death was pronounced upon them, by William earl Cowper, the lord chancellor, who on this occasion was appointed lord high steward. Orders were dispatched for the immediate execution of the earls of Derwentwater and Nithsdale, and the viscount of Kenmuir: the others were respited to the seventh day of March. Nithsdale made his escape in female attire, brought him by his mother; Derwentwater and Kenmuir were beheaded on Tower-hill. Their death was the result of party violence, which equally resisted the humanity of the king, and the dictates of just policy. The countesses of Derwentwater and Nithsdale, and lady Nairne, threw themselves at the feet of the king, and vainly implored his mercy; they then repaired to the lobby of the house of peers, attended by the ladies of the other condemned lords, and begged the intercession of the house, but no regard was paid to their petition. On the next day they returned to Westminster, with a still more numerous train, and petitioned both houses of parliament. The commons rejected the suit by a small majority; in the upper house they agreed to an address, praying his majesty would reprieve such of the condemned lords as should deserve his mercy. To this petition the king answered, That on this and all other occasions, he would do what he thought most consistent with the dignity of his crown and the safety of his people. The earl of Nottingham, the chief promoter of this address, his brother the earl of Aylesbury, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, his son lord Finch, one of the lords of the treasury, and his cousin lord Guernsey, master of the jewel office, were all of them dismissed from his majesty's service. 1716.

The inflexibility of the king, whose natural goodness of heart had been counteracted by the intemperance of his Whig advisers, and the consequent execution of many subordinate individuals, who had been seduced into direct or collateral connection with the Pretender, inflamed the discontents of the people, who eagerly looked forward to the opportunity which would be soon afforded them, by the triennial act, of re-electing their constituents. In order to prevent so evident and so unwelcome a result, the ministers resolved to obtain a repeal of the triennial act, and to extend the duration of parliament to seven years; a measure by which the parliament not only assumed the power of prolonging the duration of other parliaments, but of extending its own. On the 10th of April a discussion took place; in which the duke of Devonshire contended, that triennial elections served to keep up party divisions, to raise and foment feuds in private families, to produce ruinous expences, and give occasion to the intrigues and cabals of foreign princes; that it became the wisdom of the house of lords to apply a remedy to an evil, which might be attended with the most dangerous consequences. His arguments were opposed by the earl of Nottingham, who observed, that frequent parliaments were of the essence of the English constitution, and were sanctioned by the practice of ages; that the members of the lower house were delegated by the body of the nation for a certain term of years, at the expiration of which they were no longer the representatives of the people; that by thus lengthening, at their own pleasure, the duration of their own authority, they deprived the people of the only remedy which the wisdom of our ancestors had provided, against the ignorance and corruption of those who might be tempted to betray the trust reposed in them; that as to the pretence of adding energy or stability to the foreign transactions or projected alliances of government, what prince or state could rationally entrust us with the care of their interests, when we appeared so ready to abandon our own. After alluding to the confession of weakness on the part of the government, he affirmed, that a long parliament would encourage every species of corruption in every class of the community; that the value of a seat would bear a determinate proportion to the legal duration of parliaments, and the purchase would rise accordingly; that a long parliament would enhance the temptations, and multiply the opportunities of a vicious ministry, to undermine the independence and integrity of parliaments, far beyond what could occur; that the reasons urged, for prolonging the duration of parliaments for seven years, would probably be as strong, and by perseverance in the same politic conduct might be made much stronger, before the end of that term, for continuing and even perpetuating their legislative power. Notwithstanding the arguments, however, of the earl and of several other peers, the bill was passed by a large majority. On its being announced by two judges from the lords, to the house of commons, that their lordships had enlarged the time for the continuance of parliaments, lord Guernsey moved, that they reject the bill without reading it. It was determined, however, to receive it, and after long and vehement debates, the question of commitment was carried by a majority of 284 against 162 voices. Notwithstanding the number of petitions presented against it, the general question, that this bill do now pass, was carried in the affirmative by a majority of 264 votes against 121, and on the 26th of June 1716, it received the royal assent.

The attention of the king had been, in the mean time, diverted from domestic contentions to the critical situation of affairs on the continent. Lewis XIV., king of France, terminated his long and chequered career on the first of September, 1715. He was succeeded by Lewis XV., an infant only five years of age; the government of the kingdom being vested in the hands of the duke of Orleans. That nobleman cherished the ambition of ascending the throne of France, in case the young king, whose health was precarious, should die without issue. Philip of Spain was probably determined to dispute that succession, notwithstanding his renunciation, and was therefore equally the object of jealousy to the king of England and the regent. A treaty of friendship and alliance, for their mutual assistance and support, was therefore concluded between Great Britain and France, to which the states-general readily acceded. Another affair, of more importance in its consequences, induced his majesty to visit the continent. He had purchased the duchies of Bremen and Verden from Denmark, who had conquered them from Sweden, and, under the cover of a pretended equivalent in money, undertook, as elector of Hanover, to guarantee to Denmark the duchy of Sleswick, conquered by that power from the duke of Holstein, the ally of Sweden; his Danish majesty parting with one half of his conquests in order to secure the other. The king of Sweden, exasperated at a conduct which he regarded as insulting and injurious, secretly assisted the views of the Pretender, and projected a regular plan for his restoration to the throne of Great Britain. With the view of counteracting this design, the king had hastened to the continent; and, in his treaty with the regent, obtained a stipulation, that the Pretender should be removed to the other side of the Alps, and never be permitted to revisit Lorraine or France. Immediately after his return, his majesty caused count Gyllenburgh to be apprehended; and baron Goertz, the Swedish resident in Holland, was arrested by the order of the states, at his requisition. In their papers was found the evidence of their intrigues. The Spanish ambassador remonstrated on the injustice and violation of the law of nations, displayed in the seizure of their persons; and the states of Holland having prudently released the baron, who boldly avowed and justified his machinations, he resumed his intrigues with recruited zeal and application.

1717. On the twentieth of February, the king, in a speech to both houses, informed them, that he had intended to open the session with an act of grace, but that the obstinate and inveterate rancour of the Jacobite faction had again endeavoured to animate and stir up foreign powers to disturb the peace of their native country; he descanted on the danger to be apprehended from the designs of Sweden, and promised himself from the known attachment of parliament to the government, that they would come to such resolutions, as would enable him to meet all the designs of his and their enemies. The lords returned an address of congratulation to the king, on having, by his late treaty with France and the states-general, recovered in a great measure those advantages which might have been expected from a glorious and successful war, but were basely given up by a treacherous and dishonourable peace; and expressed their horror and indignation at the malice and ingratitude of those, who had again endeavoured to embroil their country in blood and confusion. The address of the commons was to the same effect. They proceeded also to pass a bill, prohibiting all commerce with Sweden, and to grant the necessary supplies; but the sums voted being found inadequate to the expences of the year, a message from the king was delivered by general Stanhope, requesting an extraordinary supply, that he might be enabled, by fulfilling his engagements with other powers, to counteract the designs of Sweden. The proposition was received with surprise and dissatisfaction; and the different members of the cabinet, having already begun to regard each other with enmity or distrust, a supply of £250,000 was voted, by no greater a majority than four. The opponents of the grant observed, with a severity justified by the history of many subsequent years, that whenever foreigners should begin to taste the sweets of English money, they would adhere to the interests of Great Britain, no longer than we should continue to supply their necessities. The motion was supported by Mr. Boscawen, Mr. Horace Walpole, and sir Gilbert Heathcote, but it was opposed by many of the Whigs, and Mr. Robert Walpole refrained from delivering his sentiments. These indications of disunion among the ministry were succeeded by the dismissal of lord Townsend from the office of lord-lieutenant of Ireland; Mr. Walpole, Mr. Methuen, secretary of state, and Mr. Pulteney delivered in their resignations; lord Cowper relinquished the great seal, and was succeeded by the earl of Macclesfield. That the principle indeed of the late negotiation should excite the alarm, and demand the remonstrance of his majesty's advisers, was to be expected even by the most partial friend to the virtues of the monarch. It was justly observed, on the commitment of the bill, that we had an army and fleet superior to any force that Sweden could bring against us; that we were in actual alliance with France, whose connection with Sweden might otherwise have been dreaded; and that to call upon the English to support, with their blood and treasure, every act of policy or ambition in which the king, as elector of Hanover, might think proper to engage, was equally injurious and insulting to the British people. The force of these arguments was increased by the conduct of the Czar of Russia, who, resenting the opposition of George to his project of a settlement in Germany, as prince of the empire, and opposing the views of the king respecting the duchy of Mecklenburgh, acceded to the preliminaries of a convention, with his enemy the king of Sweden, through the dexterous machinations of count Goerlitz. From the probable consequences of this alliance, however, the king of England was secured, by the death of the king of Sweden, who was killed by a cannon-ball in the trenches before the fortress of Frederickshal, on the thirtieth of November 1718; Bremen and Verden were therefore left in the possession of Hanover, and nothing was wanting to the completion of the purpose, but the investiture of these duchies by the emperor; and it became the first object of the English monarch, to overcome his reluctance to grant him that security. The court of Spain had witnessed with dissatisfaction the cession, by the treaty of Utrecht, of Naples, Sardinia, Milan, and the Low Countries to Austria; and of the island of Sicily, with the title of king, to the duke of Savoy. Cardinal Alberoni, therefore, the celebrated minister of Philip V., took advantage of the emperor's absence, in the prosecution of a war with Turkey, to equip a formidable armament, which speedily accomplished the conquest of Sardinia. The emperor complained bitterly of this outrage, committed by a Christian monarch, at the moment when he was waging war with the enemies of Christianity. After much recrimination, Philip engaged to suspend all further operations, that the powers of Europe might have time to adjust their differences, and to make such arrangements as should secure the peace and balance of power in Italy; agreeing to refer the decision of the quarrel to the king of Great Britain and the states-general. Conferences were begun between the ministers of the emperor and those of France and Holland; which produced, in the course of the following year, 1718, the famous quadruple alliance; by which it was agreed, that the French should renounce all pretensions to the crown of Spain, and the emperor exchange Sardinia for Sicily with the duke of Savoy; and that the succession to the duchies of Parma, Placentia, and Tuscany, should be settled upon the queen of Spain's eldest son, in case the present possessors should die without male issue. The latter of these stipulations was introduced into the treaty, to soothe the disappointment of Spain at the proposed exchange of Sicily for Sardinia. The court of Philip, however, resented with spirit the injustice so visible in the whole arrangement. Cardinal Alberoni informed colonel Stanhope, with some warmth, that his master would run all hazards, and even suffer himself to be driven out of Spain, rather than recal his troops, or consent to a further suspension of arms. An armament, containing 30,000 land forces, was immediately fitted out for the invasion of Sicily, whose monarch had concluded, as his only defence, a separate treaty with the emperor. But, in the mean time, the king of England had directed sir George Byng to sail from Spithead, with 20 ships of the line, to the defence of Naples, where he arrived on the first day of August, and was received as a deliverer. Here he obtained intelligence, that the Spanish army, amounting to 30,000 men, commanded by the marquis de Leda, had reduced Palermo and Messina, and was then employed in the siege of the latter city. On the 9th of August, the admiral came within sight of the Faro of Messina, and perceiving two small vessels, pursued them closely. They led him to their main fleet, which before noon he discovered in line of battle, amounting to 27 sail. They were commanded by Don Antonio de Castaneta; and one of his rear-admirals, an Irishman, of the name of Cammock, proposed that the fleet should remain in the road of Paradise, with the broadsides of the vessels to the sea, in order of battle; a position which would have permitted the operation of the batteries stationed on shore. This suggestion, however, was disregarded; and the Spanish fleet, notwithstanding its superiority of number, attempted, on the approach of the English, to sail away, and acted with much confusion. They were, however, obliged to maintain a running fight, in which they were all taken except three, which were preserved by the conduct of Cammock. Captain Walton, having been detached by sir George Byng, with five ships of the line, in pursuit of a division of the Spaniards much superior in force, transmitted to the admiral a singular specimen of naval eloquence, in the following record of his exploit:

"Sir,

We have taken and destroyed all the Spanish ships and vessels which were upon the coast, the number as per margin.

I am, &c.

G. Walton."

In the margin of this laconic epistle, thirteen vessels were specified. Notwithstanding this victory, the Spanish army prosecuted the siege of Messina with such vigour, that the governor surrendered the citadel by capitulation, and the garrison was transported to Syracuse and Reggio. A treaty was afterwards concluded at Vienna, between the emperor and the duke of Savoy; they agreed to form an army for the conquest of Sardinia, in behalf of the duke, who, in the mean time, engaged to evacuate Sicily; but, until his troops could be conveyed from that island, he consented that they should co-operate with the Germans against the common enemy.

The court of Madrid protested with vehemence against the conduct of England, as a flagrant violation of the law of nations; orders of reprisal were transmitted to all the ports of Spain and the Indies; and in consequence of this hostile demonstration, the king of England, on the seventeenth of December, sent a message to both houses, intimating that all his endeavours to procure redress, for the injuries done to his subjects by the king of Spain, having proved ineffectual, he had found it necessary to declare war against that monarch. The example of the cabinet of St. James's was followed by the regent of France.

During this succession of negotiations and hostilities, the ministry at home underwent a total revolution. The earl of Sunderland and Mr. Addison were appointed secretaries of state; Mr. Stanhope became first commissioner of the treasury, and chancellor of the exchequer; Mr. Craggs was declared secretary at war; the earl of Berkeley was constituted first commissioner of the admiralty, in the room of the earl of Oxford, who resigned; the duke of Bolton obtained the government of Ireland, and was succeeded in the post of lord chamberlain by the duke of Newcastle; the duke of Devonshire resigned his place of president of the council.

Some steps had already been taken towards the reduction of the national debt, which was comprehended under the two heads of redeemable and irredeemable incumbrances. The first had been contracted with a redeemable interest, and these the public was bound to discharge; the others consisted of long and short annuities, granted for various periods, which could not be altered without the consent of the proprietors. Mr. Robert Walpole, when at the head of the treasury, had projected a scheme for lessening the interest, and paying the capital of these national debts. He proposed in the house of commons, to reduce the interest of redeemable funds, and offer an alternative to the proprietors of annuities. His plan was received with approbation; but when he resigned his places, the new ministers thought proper to alter it, in a manner with which he was by no means satisfied. His remonstrances gave occasion to warm altercation between him and Mr. Stanhope, in which they inadvertently disclosed, that they had both been guilty of selling places and reversions. They were interrupted by Mr. Hungerford; and Mr. Boscawen moved, that the house would lay their commands upon them, that no further notice should be taken of what had passed. The house approved of the motion, and they pledged their word and honour to the speaker, that they would not prosecute their resentment.

The bank and South Sea Company having agreed to provide money for such creditors as should be willing to receive their principal and interest, the house came to the following resolutions: That all the public funds redeemable by law, which do not exceed 5*l.* per cent. per annum, shall be redeemed according to their respective provisoes or clauses of redemption, contained in the acts of parliament for that purpose; or, with the consent of the proprietor, shall be converted into an interest or annuity, not exceeding 5*l.* per cent. per annum, redeemable by parliament; that his majesty should be enabled to borrow of any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, such sum or sums of money as should be requisite to redeem the said redeemable funds, at any rate not exceeding 5*l.* per cent. per annum, or to secure the same upon the funds so to be redeemed; that the annuity of £106,501 13*s.* 5*d.* payable to the governor and company of the bank, out of the window-tax, should be redeemed, or by consent of the said governor and company, be converted into an interest or annuity not exceeding 5*l.* per cent. redeemable by parliament; that so much of the fund, commonly called the aggregate fund, settled by an act of parliament in the first year of his present majesty, as is applicable to the interest, circulation, exchanging, or cancelling the present exchequer bills, should also be redeemed; that his majesty should be enabled to authorise the high treasurer, or the commissioners of the treasury for the time being, to treat and agree with any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, for circulating such a number of exchequer bills, at a rate exceeding £1. 10*s.* per cent. for interest, exchange, and circulation, as might be charged and secured on that part of the aggregate fund so to be redeemed; that the annuities of £600,000 and £8000, payable to the governor and company of the merchants of England trading to the South Sea, should likewise be redeemed; that the annuities, payable by an act of parliament of the twelfth year of the reign of William III. to certain patentees therein named, their heirs and assignees, out of the weekly sum of £3700, charged on the excise, should also be redeemed; that the several terms of years, remaining on the duties appropriated by two lottery acts, passed in the ninth year of the reign of queen Anne, and by the two lottery acts, passed in the tenth year of her said majesty, should be made perpetual; that the duties comprehended in the said lottery acts should be made one fund for the future; that the proprietors of the orders, grounded on the said lottery acts, should within a limited time make their election, either to accept annuities after the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum, redeemable by parliament out of such general fund, or be paid so much as remained due to them upon their orders respectively; that in all cases where the proprietors should choose to have their principal, the 5*l.* per cent. per annum thereby saved should be established as another fund, towards answering such sums of money as should be advanced for discharging the principal by loans, or such other securities as should be thought proper; that his majesty should be enabled to give power for receiving voluntary subscriptions from any person or persons entitled to any of the annuities issuing out of the public funds, for the residue of the respective terms of 99, 96, 89, or 32 years, formerly purchased therein (not being subject to redemption) who should be willing to accept, in lieu thereof, perpetual annuities redeemable by parliament, and to agree to some other regulations mentioned in the resolution of the house; that all savings, which should arise upon any of the present funds by the proposed redemption and reduction, should, after all deficiencies that might happen upon any of the said funds were made good, be reserved and applied towards discharging and reducing the national debt; and that all the said duties now in being, or to be continued, should immediately cease and determine, after the said national debt should be discharged and paid off! On these resolutions were founded three bills that passed into laws entitled, the South Sea act, the bank act, and the general fund act.

The original stock of the South Sea Company did not exceed £9,471,325; but as the funds granted were sufficient to answer the interest of ten millions at 6*l.* per cent. the company made up that sum to government, for which it received an annuity of £600,000 per annum, and £8000 a-year for management. By this act they declared themselves willing to receive an annuity of £500,000 and eight thousand pounds a year for management. It was enacted, that the company should continue a corporation until the redemption of their annuity, towards which not less than a million should be paid at a time. They were likewise required to advance a sum, not exceeding two millions, towards discharging the principal and interest of the four lottery funds of the ninth and tenth years of queen Anne.

By the bank act, the governor and company declared themselves willing to accept an annuity of £88,751 7*s.* 10½*d.* or the principal of £1,775,027 13*s.* 10½*d.* in the lieu of the present annuity, amounting to £106,501 13*s.* 5*d.* They likewise declared themselves willing to discharge, and deliver up to be cancelled, as many exchequer bills as amounted to two millions, and to accept of an annuity of one hundred thousand pounds, being after the rate of 5*l.* per cent. redeemable after one year's notice; and to circulate the remaining exchequer bills, at 3*l.* per cent. and 1*d.* per day. It was enacted, that the former allowances should be continued to the ensuing Christmas; after which the bank should have, for circulating the £2,561,025, remaining in exchequer bills, an annuity of £76,830 15*s.* 0*d.* at the rate of 3*l.* per cent. till redeemed over and above the 1*d.* per day for interest. By the same act the bank was required to advance a sum not exceeding £2,500,000 towards discharging the national debt, if wanted, on condition that they should have 5*l.* per cent. for as much as they should advance, redeemable by parliament.

The general fund act recited the several acts of parliament, for establishing the four lotteries, in the ninth and tenth years of the late queen, mentioned the terms of years for which these revenues had been granted, and stated the annual produce of the several funds, amounting in all to £724,849 6*s*. 10½*d*. This was the general fund; the deficiency of which was to be made good annually, out of the first aids granted by parliament. For the regular payment of all such annuities as should be made payable by this act, it was ordained, that all the duties and revenues mentioned therein should continue for ever; with the proviso, that the revenues rendered perpetual by this act should be subject to redemption. The act contained a clause, by which the sinking fund was established. The reduction of interest to 5*l*. per cent. producing a surplus or excess upon the appropriated funds, it was enacted, that all the monies arising from time to time, as well from the surplus, by virtue of the acts for redeeming the funds of the bank and of the South Sea Company, as also from the surplus of the duties and revenues, by this act appropriated to make good the general fund, and the overplus monies of the said general fund should be appropriated and employed for discharging the principal and interest of such national debts, as were incurred before the 25th of December in the preceding year, in such manner as should be ordered and appointed by any future act of parliament, to be discharged out of them, and for no other use, intent, and purpose whatsoever.

Had this plan, the invention of Mr. Walpole, been as steadily prosecuted as it was wisely concerted, the nation would soon have been relieved from its pecuniary difficulties; but we shall hereafter have occasion to observe, that antipathy to its author, and the improvidence of those who weakly sacrificed the certainty of future gain to the possibility of immediate advantage, circumscribed its utility, and counteracted its intention.

The declaration of war on the part of England and France against Spain, was the source of much national surprise and dissatisfaction. In the session of 1717, Mr. Shippen asserted, that the parliament was at liberty to controvert any propositions advanced in his majesty's speech, that speech being the composition of ministers, especially those which seem calculated rather for the meridian of Germany than of Great Britain; and that it was the infelicity of his majesty's reign, that he was unacquainted with our language and constitution. It was immediately moved by Mr. Lechmere, that the member who had spoken these words be committed to the Tower. The motion was seconded by Mr. Spencer Cowper; on which Mr. Walpole desired that the member might be permitted to explain his last words; but Mr. Shippen declared that he desired no such indulgence, and that the words needed neither explanation nor apology. The motion was therefore carried in the affirmative, by a majority of 175 against 81, and Mr. Shippen was committed to the Tower.

On the return of the king from the continent, the university of Cambridge presented an address of loyal congratulation; and at a meeting of the vice-chancellor and heads of colleges at Oxford, a motion was made for a similar demonstration of respect and gratitude. The motion was strenuously opposed by Dr. Smalridge, bishop of Bristol, and dean of Christchurch, who had in the preceding year been removed from his post of lord almoner, for refusing, with Atterbury, bishop of Rochester, to sign a protestation of the episcopal bench, against the claims of the Pretender; he declared that the rebellion had been long suppressed, and that there would be no end of addresses, should one be presented every time his majesty returned from Hanover; that the late favour they had received, in omitting at their request the late ceremony of burning in effigy the devil, the pope, the Pretender, the duke of Ormond and the earl of Mar, on the anniversary of his majesty's accession, was counterbalanced by a regiment of dragoons quartered on them; and that there was no precedent for addressing the king on his return from his German dominions. The motion was therefore lost; and the same spirit of resistance to the avowed sentiments of the monarch seemed to pervade every class of society, and every province of the kingdom. The dwelling-houses and meeting-houses of the dissenters were burnt and destroyed by the violence of the populace. The commons presented an address to his majesty, expressing their abhorrence of all such traitorous proceedings, and beseeching him, that the laws now in force may be put in speedy and vigorous execution against them; they also requested, that his majesty would be pleased to direct an account to be taken of the losses and damages sustained by the sufferers, in order that full compensation might be made out of the first aids granted by parliament. This address was answered by a satisfactory declaration from the king, and succeeded by a loyal and sensible address from the dissenters themselves.

The earl of Oxford, who had now remained nearly two years in the Tower, presented a petition to the house of lords, praying that he might be brought to his trial; a measure to which he was probably encouraged, by the defection of his most formidable adversary, Mr. Walpole. A day therefore was appointed, and the commons were ordered to prepare for their charge. At the appointed time the peers repaired to the court in Westminster-hall, where lord Cowper presided as lord high steward. The king and the rest of the royal family, with the foreign ministers, were present at the solemnity. The earl being brought from the Tower, the articles of impeachment were read, with his answers, and the reply of the commons. Sir Joseph Jekyl standing up to substantiate the first article of the charge, which amounted only to a misdemeanor, lord Harcourt represented to the lords, that it would be tedious and unnecessary to go through all the articles against the earl; but that if the commons would make good the two articles for high treason, the earl of Oxford would forfeit both life and estate, and there would be an end of the matter. He therefore moved, that the commons should not be allowed to proceed upon the less important part of the accusation, until judgment should be given on the articles of high treason. The lords acceding to this opinion, the commons declared that it was their undoubted privilege to impeach a peer, either for treason or for a misdemeanor, or to mix the accusation as they thought proper. The lords asserted, that it was a right inherent in every court of justice, to prescribe the methods of proceeding in their respective courts. The commons demanded a free conference; but this was refused. The dispute grew warm. The lords sent a message to the lower house, importing, that they intended to proceed upon the trial. The commons disregarded the information, and refused to attend. The lords, repairing soon after to Westminster-hall, ordered the earl to be brought to the bar, and made proclamation for his accusers to appear. But finding the commons resolute, and having waited a quarter of an hour, it was voted, that the prisoner should be set at liberty, with the secret approbation and concurrence of the crown. The commons, exasperated at his acquittal, presented an address to the king, desiring he might be excepted from the act of grace; and on the passing of that act, there were excepted from the indemnity, the earl of Oxford, Mr. Prior, Mr. Thomas Harley, Mr. Arthur Moore, Crisp, Nodes, Obrien, Redmayn, a printer, and Thomson; the assassins in Newgate, confined since the reign of William, and the clan of Mr. Gregory in Scotland. By virtue of this act, the earl of Carnwarth, and lords Widdrington and Nairn were immediately discharged; and the individuals who lay under sentence of death in the various prisons were released.

The attention of the public, towards the close of the present year, was strongly excited by two compositions of Hoadly, bishop of Bangor. One was entitled, "Preservatives against the principles and practices of the nonjurors;" the other was a sermon, preached before the king, under the title of "The kingdom of Christ." An answer to the latter discourse was published, by Dr. Snape, master of Eton college, and the convocation appointed a committee to examine the bishop's two performances. A representation was immediately drawn up, in which they were vehemently reprobated, as tending to subvert all discipline in the church of Christ, to reduce his kingdom to a state of anarchy and confusion, and to impugn and impeach the royal supremacy in causes ecclesiastical, as well as the authority of the legislature, to enforce obedience in matters of religion by civil sanctions. 1718.

The bishop had selected, as the foundation of his discourse, the declaration of Christ to Pilate, that his kingdom was not of this world; and its object was to prove, that the kingdom of Christ, and the sanctions by which it was supported, were wholly intellectual and spiritual; that the CHURCH, taking the term in its utmost latitude of signification, did not and could not possess the slightest degree of authority, under any commission, or pretended commission, derived from him; that the church of England, and all other national churches, were merely civil or human institutions, established for the purposes of diffusing and perpetuating the knowledge and belief of Christianity, which contained a system of truths, not in their nature differing from other truths, excepting in their superior weight and importance; and which were to be inculcated in a manner analagous to other truths, demanding only, from their more interesting import, proportionably higher degree of care, attention, and assidnity in their promulgation.

To the representation of the committee the bishop replied, That if his doctrine was rejected, certain other propositions must be admitted, and these were so absurd and contradictory, as to expose his antagonists in the most ridiculous light. A termination, however, was put to this disgraceful controversy, by a royal prorogation: from this period, the convocation has never been convened, but as a matter of form, and for the purpose of being again prorogued.

On the third day of November, the princess of Wales was delivered of a prince, who died in a short time after his birth. It was the custom, that when the child was a boy, the king assumed the duties of godfather, and the place of second godfather was supplied by one of the principal lords of the court. The prince, being ignorant of the custom, intended that his uncle, the duke of York, should be present as godfather. The king, apprised of the prince's intention, which he attributed to perverseness, rather than to ignorance, appointed the duke of Newcastle, the lord-chamberlain, to be present, not as representing the duke of York, but in his own person. The prince, unaware that the duke acted in obedience to his majesty's command, was exasperated at the supposed insult, and expressed his resentment in terms of the utmost violence. The king, to testify his displeasure at his son's intemperance, commanded him to quit the palace of St. James's. He retired with the princess to a house belonging to the earl of Grantham, but the children were detained at the palace. Notice was given to all peers and peeresses, and to all privy-counsellors and their wives, that in case they visited the prince and princess, they should forbear approaching his majesty's presence; and all who enjoyed offices or situations under both king and prince, were obliged to choose in which service they would exclusively continue.

The liberality and good sense of the king, on the question of religious tolerance, were honourably exemplified by the introduction into the house of lords, under his immediate auspices, of a bill to repeal the acts against occasional conformity and the growth of schism, and certain clauses in the corporation and test acts. The bill was violently opposed by lord Cowper, on the plea of danger to the church; a plea which the bishop of Peterborough justly characterized, as adapted only to the mouths of silly women and children. Notwithstanding the violence of the high-church party, the house agreed to repeal many of the clauses, which excluded dissenters from civil offices; and the bill, being sent down to the other house, was passed, after violent debates, by a small majority.

A bill for limiting the creation of peers having been rejected, after much discussion, a bill was brought in, for better securing the dependency of Ireland on the crown of Great Britain. One Maurice Annesley having appealed to the house of peers in England, from a decree of the house of peers in Ireland, the former reversed the sentence of the Irish lords, and ordered the barons of the exchequer to put Mr. Annesley in possession of the lands he had lost by the decree passed in that kingdom. The barons having obeyed this order, the Irish house of peers passed a vote against them, importing that they had acted in derogation of the king's prerogative, in the high court of parliament in Ireland, as also of the rights and privileges of that kingdom and its parliament. They ordered them to be taken into the custody of the usher of the black rod; transmitted a long representation to the king, asserting their right to the final judicature of causes in that kingdom. The English house of peers, however, passed several resolutions, approving of the conduct of the barons, and a bill was introduced declaratory of the supreme jurisdiction of the house in cases of appeal, and of the right of the English parliament to make laws, to bind the kingdom of Ireland in all cases whatsoever.

During the absence of the king, and the negotiation of the quadruple alliance, the South Sea scheme was occupying the minds of his English subjects, with a 1720.

species of delusion more fatal and extraordinary than any they had before experienced. Blunt, the projector of the scheme, had taken the hint from the Mississippi project, formed by Law, a Scotsman, who had in the preceding year raised such a ferment in France, and involved in distress many thousand families of that kingdom. Since the revolution in 1688, the government not receiving from parliament sufficient supplies, or what was granted requiring time to be collected, they were obliged to borrow money from several different companies of merchants, and among others from that which traded to the South Sea. In the year 1716, the government was indebted to this company alone about nine millions and a half, at the rate of 6*l.* per cent. interest, and, as I have before related, Mr. Walpole suggested a plan of giving the several companies an alternative of accepting a lower interest, or of being paid the principal; the companies preferring the former at an interest of 5*l.* per cent.

In this state of things, Blunt, who had been bred a scrivener, and had all the art and plausibility necessary for such an undertaking, made an offer to the ministry, in the name of the South Sea Company, to buy up all the debts of the different companies, and thus to become the sole creditor of the state. The terms proposed to the government were extremely advantageous. The South Sea Company was to redeem the public debts out of the hands of the creditors, upon whatever terms could be arranged between them; and for the interest of the money so redeemed, they would be satisfied with receiving from government, for six years, 5*l.* per cent.; after which the interest should be reduced to 4*l.* per cent. and should at any time be redeemable by parliament. For these purposes, a bill passed both houses of parliament, and, during its progress, the stock of the South Sea Company rose from one hundred and thirty to near four hundred. As the directors could not be expected to possess money sufficient to buy up the debts of the nation, they were empowered to raise it, by opening a subscription to a scheme for trading in the South Seas. The company took advantage of this permission to propagate a report, that Gibralter and Port Mahon would be exchanged for some place in Peru, by which means the English trade to the South Sea would be protected and enlarged. This rumour, diffused with great industry, inspired the people with the most sanguine and extravagant hopes. In five days after the passing of the bill, the directors opened their books for a subscription of one milllion, at the rate of three hundred pounds for every hundred pounds of capital. Persons of all ranks crowded to the house in such numbers, that the first subscription amounted to more than two millions of original stock. In a few days the subscriptions were sold for double the price of the first payments. The delusion was continued by every variety of artifice; the stock at length was raised to one thousand per cent. and the whole nation infected with a propensity to gaming in the funds. Every profession, and every rank, was equally absorbed by the prevailing spirit of speculation; every business and employment of common life was neglected for the pursuit of imaginary riches; and the example of the South Sea Company was imitated by the self-created managers of similar establishments, under the titles of the Welsh Copper Company, the York Building Company, and the London and Westminster Building Company; three institutions, which attracted the notice of the public, under the respectable sanction of the prince of Wales, the duke of Chandos, and the duke of Bridgewater.

In a few months, however, the people began to awaken from their dream of riches. The number of sellers daily increased. On the 29th of September, the stock sunk to 150, several eminent goldsmiths and bankers were obliged to abscond, and the Sword-blade Company, who had hitherto been the principal cash-keepers of the South Sea stock were compelled to stop payment. In this emergency, the bank was prevailed upon to subscribe into the stock of the South Sea Company, valued at four hundred per cent., £3,700,000, which the company was to repay to the bank on Lady-day and Michaelmas of the succeeding year. Books were opened at the bank to receive subscriptions for the support of public credit, and considerable sums of money were obtained. But the relief was temporary, and the run upon the bank so considerable, that the money was paid away faster than it could be received from the subscription. The stock again declined, therefore, to one hundred and fifty, and the bonds of the company were negotiated at the discount of 25*l.* per cent. The directors of the bank renounced their agreement, and thus completed the ruin of the company. By this event the nation was involved in deep and extensive distress. Thousands of families were reduced to ruin; and nothing was heard but the lamentations of poverty, misfortune, and despair. Many of the directors, by whose arts the people were taught to expect unbounded and immediate wealth, amassed considerable fortunes by the public credulity; but the parliament resolved to strip these plunderers of their infamously-acquired possessions. Orders were issued to remove all the directors of the South Sea Company from their seats in parliament, and from their places under government; and the principal delinquents were punished by a forfeiture of all such possessions and estates, as they had acquired during the continuance of the popular frenzy. The next care of the parliament was to redress the sufferers, as far as that purpose could be effected by the authority of the legislature. Of the profits arising from the South Sea scheme, the sum of seven millions was restored to the original proprietors. Several additions were made to their dividends, out of what was possessed by the company in its own right; and the remaining capital stock was divided among the old proprietors, at the rate of 33*l.* per cent.

Sir John Blunt, the projector of the scheme, refusing in the house of lords to answer the interrogatories of the duke of Wharton, and being vehemently justified in his refusal by lord Stanhope, the duke sarcastically observed, that the government of the best princes was sometimes rendered intolerable by bad ministers; adducing the example of Sejanus, who had rendered the reign of Claudius hateful to the Romans. The reproach excited the warm indignation of lord Stanhope, who replied with so much vehemence, that he was seized with a sudden illness, of which he expired in the evening of the following day. The king received intelligence of this respectable nobleman's death when at supper, and, not being able to suppress the emotions of his grief, rose from table and retired, his eyes suffused with tears. On the decease of this nobleman a new change occurred in the formation of the ministry. Mr. Walpole, lord Townsend, lord Cowper, and Mr. Methuen, being reconciled to the court, were reinstated in their former, or other offices.

The influence of Walpole was great and decided, now that he was no longer opposed by the predominance of lord Stanhope over the councils of the king; and lord Townsend, finding his ascendancy irresistible, resigned his office, rather than submit to be regarded as his inferior, and retired to his estate.

The appointment of Mr. Robert Walpole was preceded by the resignation of lord Sunderland. It having been proved, in a committee of the house of commons, that £50,000 had been taken for his use, without either payment or security, he vacated his place of commissioner of the treasury. The commons having resolved that Mr. Aislabie, the chancellor of the exchequer, had combined, in the pursuit of his own profit, with the directors in pernicious practices, to the ruin of the public, he was expelled the house and committed to the Tower.

Knight, the treasurer of the South Sea Company, being seized at Tirlemont, was committed prisoner to the citadel of Antwerp. Application was made to the cabinet of Vienna, that he should be delivered up to such persons as might be appointed to receive him; but answer was unexpectedly made by the Imperial court, that such a proceeding would interfere with the privileges of the states of Brabant, by which no person, against whom a criminal accusation is brought, can be removed for trial out of the province. While this reply was the subject of discussion, he effected a second escape from the citadel of Antwerp, and was subsequently pardoned; a circumstance which excited strong suspicion, that Sunderland, though resigned, still retained his influence in the closet, and had obtained the escape of a criminal, whose disclosures might have been so unpropitious to himself and to his late coadjutors in office.

CHAPTER VIII.

GEORGE I.

Proceedings in Parliament—Alliance with Sweden—Banishment of Bishop Atterbury—Return of Bolingbroke—Abdication of Philip of Spain—Expedition to the Baltic—Impeachment of the Earl of Macclesfield—Siege of Gibralter—Departure of the King for Hanover—His Death, and Character.

1721. THE spirit of the high church party, and the moderation, good-sense, and independence of their opponents, were strikingly exemplified on the introduction into the house of peers of a bill for the suppression of blasphemy and profaneness, which enacted, that if any one spoke or wrote against the being of a God, the divinity of Jesus Christ, or of the Holy Ghost, the doctrine of the Trinity, the truth of the Christian religion, or the divine inspiration of the Scriptures, he should suffer imprisonment for an indefinite term, unless, in a form prescribed, he renounce his errors. To the bill itself many persecuting clauses were added, which were justly represented as tending to the establishment of a protestant inquisition. On the motion, however, that the bill be committed, it was rejected by a majority of 60 to 31.

SCARCELY had the new ministry entered on the fulfilment of their respective offices, before a subsidy was voted to Sweden, with whom an alliance, offensive and defensive, had been just concluded; in which it was stipulated, that his Britannic majesty should send a fleet into the Baltic, to act against the Czar of Russia. The Czar loudly complained of this interposition, alleging that he had failed in his engagements, both as elector of Hanover, and as king of Great Britain. The mutual recriminations of the two cabinets tended only to exasperate their mutual resentments, and the Czar at length concluded a peace with Sweden, without the intervention of a mediator. On the 16th of June, the king acquainted the commons, that he had agreed to pay a subsidy to the crown of Sweden, and hoped they would enabled him to make good his engagements. This intimation produced a violent debate. Lord Molesworth observed, that he would go as far as any man in supporting the dignity of the crown of Great Britain; but, on the other hand, he was not for squandering away unnecessarily the small remainder of the wealth of the nation: that by our late conduct we were become the allies of the whole world, and the bubbles of all our allies; for we were obliged to pay them well for our assistance. He affirmed, that the treaties which had been made with Sweden, at different times, were partly inconsistent and contradictory; that our late engagements with that crown were contrary to existing treaties with other powers; that in order to engage the Czar to yield what he had gained in the course of the war, the king of Prussia ought to give up Stettin, and the elector of Hanover restore Bremen and Verden; that the distressed condition to which the Swedes were reduced was indeed worthy of compassion; but it must be considered, that they had in a great measure been the cause of their own misfortunes, by tame submission to a despotic prince, by sacrificing their whole substance to enable him to prosecute his rash, ambitions, and unjust projects, and that any nation who followed their example deserved most richly to share the same fate; that England had no right to interfere with the affairs of the empire, that we reaped little or no advantage by our trade to the Baltic, but that of procuring naval stores; that hemp was certainly a very necessary commodity, particularly at the present juncture, but that if proper encouragement were given to some of the American plantations, we might be supplied from them at a much cheaper rate than from Sweden and Norway.—Notwithstanding the cogency of these arguments, the votes of supply were passed, after much clamorous debate, by a large majority. Having passed, after a determined opposition from the spiritual lords, a bill for permitting the omission of the words, "in the presence of Almighty God" in the affirmation of the quakers, but providing, at the same time, for the infliction, on a false affirmation, of the penalties of perjury; the parliament was dissolved in March; and early in the ensuing month of October, the king opened the new parliament with a speech from the throne, in which he observed, that he was extremely sorry to inform them, at the opening of the session, that a dangerous conspiracy had been for some time maturing, and was still carrying on against his person and government, in favour of a popish Pretender; that the discoveries made at home, the declarations of his ministers abroad, and the intelligence received from the various powers of Europe, had afforded him ample and concurrent proofs of this wicked design. "Had I," he proceeded, "since my accession to the throne, ever attempted any innovation in our established religion; had I, in any one instance, invaded the liberty of my subjects; I should less have wondered at any endeavour to alienate the affections of my people, and draw them into measures that can only terminate in their own destruction. But to hope to persuade a free people, in full enjoyment of all that is dear and valuable to them, to exchange freedom for slavery, the protestant religion for popery, and to sacrifice at once the price of so much blood and treasure, as have been spent in defence of our present establishment, seems an infatuation not to be accounted for." In reply to this speech, both houses of parliament presented addresses expressive of their indignation against the authors and abettors of the conspiracy, and containing assurances that they would cheerfully hazard their lives and fortunes in defence of his majesty's person and government. The regent of France was the first who communicated to the king information of the conspiracy, in which many persons of the first distinction were concerned. In consequence of the discovery, a camp was formed in Hyde Park, and all military officers were ordered to repair to their respective stations. Lieutenant-general Macartney was dispatched to Ireland, to bring over troops from that kingdom, and the states of Holland were called upon to have in readiness their stipulated number of troops.

In this general alarm, the first person arrested was Atterbury, bishop of Rochester, a prelate of great abilities, who had long been obnoxious to the government. He was confined in the Tower, and soon after the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Orrery, lords North and Grey, with several others of inferior rank, were arrested and imprisoned. Of all these, however, only the bishop and Mr. Layer, a barrister, experienced the severity of government, the proofs against the rest not amounting to evidence sufficient for conviction. A bill was brought into the house of commons, impeaching bishop Atterbury, though he pleaded privilege as a peer. This measure met with opposition from several of the members; but it was resolved, by a majority of the house, that he should be deprived of his dignity and clerical appointments, and should be banished the kingdom for ever. The bishop made no defence in the lower house, reserving all his force till he should have occasion to exert it in the house of peers. When his cause came before the lords, there ensued a warm debate, in which the innocence of the bishop was ardently contested. There appeared against him little or no proof, except what arose from intercepted letters, written in cypher, which earl Paulet insisted did not contain any thing that could be construed into treason. The duke of Wharton animadverted on the weakness, insufficiency, and contradiction of the evidence against the bishop, and added, that such proceedings, like the stone of Sysyphus, frequently rolled back on their promoters. Lord Bathurst observed, that if such extraordinary proceedings were countenanced, he saw nothing remaining for him and others, but to retire to their country-houses, and there, if possible, quietly enjoy their estates within their own families, since the most trifling correspondence might be made criminal; and turning to the bishops, he said, he could with difficulty account for the inveterate hatred and malice, which some people bore against the ingenious bishop of Rochester, unless it was that, infatuated like the wild Americans, they fondly hoped to inherit, not only the spoils, but the abilities of the man they should destroy. In defiance of all that was advanced in the bishop's favour, the bill against him was carried by the force of ministerial influence. His sentence being confirmed, in two days after he embarked for the continent, attended by his daughter. On the same day that he landed at Calais, lord Bolingbroke arrived there on his return to England, having obtained his majesty's pardon. Atterbury, being informed of this circumstance, could not help observing, with a smile, that they were exchanged. The bishop continued in exile and poverty until he died.

Mr. Layer being brought to his trial in the king's bench, he was convicted of having enlisted men for the Pretender's service, and of having endeavoured to excite a rebellion, and was sentenced to death. The circumstances of the conspiracy are but imperfectly known; it is understood, however, that the intention of the conspirators was, by privately introducing into England a number of foreign officers, to prepare for a junction with the duke of Ormond, who was to land in the river with a quantity of arms provided for the purpose. Mr. Layer was reprieved from time to time, and many endeavours were employed to obtain from him a discovery of his accomplices; but continuing firm in his refusal, he was executed at Tyburn, and his head fixed on Temple Bar.

Bolingbroke, though restored to his paternal honours and estate, was still excluded from the house of peers. Stimulated by a lofty confidence in his own powers, by an ambition too ardent to be scrupulous, and by rivalry of his former colleagues in office, lords Oxford and Harcourt, who had been restored to all their privileges, he so far forgot the recent good offices of sir Robert Walpole, in advising his recal, as to arrange the plan, and collect the members of a systematic opposition.

During this session, a bill was passed for levying the sum of £100,000 upon the estates of all Roman catholics, on pretext of the constant endeavours of the papists to subvert the establishment. As the principles of toleration, and the important distinction between bigoted persecution and prudent restraint, have been, in common with many other subjects of debate, connected with and affecting the happiness of nations, more fully discussed, and more satisfactorily developed, in later periods of English history, I shall on this, as on many other important topics, defer the full consideration of such questions, in their various bearings, till many historical circumstances respecting them have past before review: a plan which will preclude the danger of superficial observation and prolix repetition. On the 27th of May, an end was put to the session, by a speech from the throne, in which his majesty expressed his satisfaction at the proceedings of parliament, and in particular at those exertions of legislative authority, which were necessary in this crisis of danger, for the punishment of offenders whose guilt there was no room to doubt; but whose wicked arts and practices had been brought to such perfection, that they confidently carried on their dangerous projects in defiance of the law, from an assurance of being able to elude it. His majesty added, that some extraordinary affairs calling him abroad this summer, he doubted not the wisdom and vigilance of his good subjects would prevent their common enemies from taking advantage of his absence; and that they will at length cease to flatter themselves with the vain imagination of being able to subvert our religious and political establishment.

Philip V. of Spain, influenced by constitutional melancholy and habitual bigotry, retired to the monastery of St. Ildefonzo, and made a solemn renunciation of the crowns of Castile and Arragon to his eldest son, Don Louis, prince of Asturias. The young prince dying soon after his elevation to the rank of king, Philip was prevailed upon to resume his abdicated throne, but devoting his time to the duties of religion, he committed the exercise of power to the queen. The enmity between Russia and Sweden had, in the mean time, terminated by a treaty concluded at Nystad in 1721, which contained stipulations unfavourable to the views of his Britannic majesty, inasmuch as they affected the security of Bremen and Verden. A marked reserve had for some time existed between the king of England and the emperor, who refused to grant the investiture of Bremen and Verden, but on condition of an enormous pecuniary consideration. At this moment the king was also chagrined by the death of the duke of Orleans, regent of France, whose system of policy had for some time corresponded with the views of the English court. If this cordiality was as singular as sincere, the termination of the long and inveterate enmity of the emperor and king of Spain, by a treaty concluded at Vienna was still more strange and unexpected. According to this treaty, which was denominated the PRAGMATIC SANCTION, Spain was pledged to the guarantee of the Austrian succession. To this treaty the court of St. Petersburgh acceded; and a confederacy, which changed the aspect of affairs in Europe, owed its origin to the dismissal, by the court of Versailles, of the young infanta of Spain, affianced to the king of France, but to whom that monarch had conceived a determined aversion. In order to counterbalance the preponderance of this coalition, a similar treaty of alliance was signed at Hanover, between England, France, Denmark, and Prussia, to which Holland and Sweden afterwards acceded. This treaty was communicated to the British parliament which met in January 1726; and an address, in approbation of its conclusion, was carried in the house of commons by a majority of 285 against 107.

THE duke de Ripperda, the favourite of the queen, and therefore the director of every measure at the court of Madrid, was the chief projector and negotiator of the treaty between the emperor and Spain. Having incurred the displeasure of the court by the insolence of his demeanour, and provoked the jealousy of the grandees by his evident influence over every department of the state, he was ostensibly dismissed from the confidence of the queen, and confuting his own abuse of the English nation, by confiding in its generosity, he fled to the house of the British ambassador for shelter. A guard was commanded by the queen to secure the avenues leading to his place of refuge, and to seize the duke's person; a proceeding which excited the remonstrance of the English court, as contrary to the privileges of ambassadors, as established by the law of nations, and as executed with brutal and unexampled severity.

REPEATED advices having been received, that preparations were making in Russia for the equipment of a numerous fleet, it was deemed expedient to send a squadron of ships into the Baltic. The command devolved upon sir Charles Wager, who received instructions not to permit the Russian fleets to leave their ports, till the empress had obviated all ground of suspicion by an explicit declaration of her intentions. The empress protested, that nothing was further from her thoughts than any design to disturb the peace of the north, expressing at the same time her astonishment that she had not received his majesty's letter, until his fleet was at anchor before Revel; a procedure totally inconsistent with the amity so long maintained, between her kingdoms and those of Great Britain. The task of pacification with Russia was indeed by no means complicated or difficult. All her objections to an amicable treaty were concentrated in the simple demand, that Sleswick should be restored to the duke of Holstein, or that he should be satisfied by an equivalent. The only equivalent, however, that was proper, easy, or convenient, were Bremen and Verden, which the king of England estimated at a value more consistent with his prejudices, as elector of Hanover, than with the interests of Great Britain. The Czarina, therefore, acceded to the coalition formed by the emperor, while the government of Sweden, influenced by secret service-money, became a party on the opposite side, by agreeing to the treaty of Hanover.

AT the beginning of the session of parliament, articles of impeachment, for high crimes and misdemeanours, were lodged by the commons in the house of peers, against the earl of Macclesfield. He was accused of receiving, during his possession of the exalted office of lord high chancellor, several exorbitant sums of money, as a consideration for the admission of certain persons to the offices of masters of chancery, and of abusing his trust as general guardian of the persons of orphans and lunatics. The house of peers, after a long and candid hearing, being satisfied with the proof of these crimes, sentenced him to pay a fine of £30,000, and be imprisoned till the fine be paid. Sir Peter King, who succeeded him, finding his talents unequal to the office, resigned in favour of lord Talbot, a nobleman, whom untimely death cut off in the prime of life, and the flower of his virtues. His place was supplied by sir Philip York, lord chief justice, created baron Hardwick, who fulfilled the duties of his station for nineteen years, with virtue, circumspection, and ability.

1727. The parliament met on the 17th of January, and his majesty observed, in his opening speech, that the sudden and unaccountable conjunction between the emperor and the king of Spain, and the secret and offensive alliances concluded between them, had laid the foundations of a most exhorbitant and insatiable power; and were so directly levelled against the most valuable interests and privileges of the English nation, that we must determine, either patiently to submit to the peremptory and unjust demands of the king of Spain, by giving up Gibralter, and patiently acquiescing in the emperor's usurped and extended exercise of trade and commerce, or must resolve to be in a condition to do ourselves justice, and to defend our undoubted rights against these reciprocal engagements, entered into, in defiance and violation of all national faith, and of the most solemn treaties. He assured them, that it was a secret article of the alliance between the emperor and Spain, that the Pretender should be placed on the throne of Great Britain; that Russia was actuated by the same views; that two squadrons had been equipped, besides that sent to the Baltic; and that the king of Spain had ordered his ambassador to quit the kingdom, leaving a memorial, containing a formal demand for the restitution of Gibralter. The apprehension of an attempt, on the part of the other powers, to place the Pretender on the throne of Britain, was regarded by many members of the house as utterly chimerical: M. de Palm, the Imperial resident at London, was instructed to declare, that the assertion relating to the Pretender was absolutely nullity, and that the restitution of Gibralter formed no part of the treaty lately concluded; and it appeared, on investigation, that the first suggestion of the restoration of Gibralter had proceeded from George himself, in a letter to the king of Spain. Notwithstanding these circumstances, an address was voted by a majority of 251 against 81. Another formal address was likewise presented, in which the two houses expressed their indignation at the insolence of de Palm's memorial, which they characterized as an insult on his majesty, and a presumptuous and vain attempt to instil into the minds of his faithful subjects a distrust of his royal word.

As a consequence of the mutual jealousies between the contending powers, Gibralter was besieged; but the bravery of the troops, and the number of reinforcements, rendered all the efforts of the assailants ineffectual; and a successful resistance was continued, till the relief of the fortress by treaty in the subsequent reign.

The land-forces were now augmented, and 30,000 Danes, Swedes, and Hessians, engaged in the service of Great Britain. Notwithstanding the vigorous opposition of a minority in parliament, the king was vested with the appropriation of such sums as should be necessary for making good his expences and engagements, and £370,000 issued in exchequer bills was charged, notwithstanding the evident tendency of the measure to destroy the efficacy of that important resource, upon the sinking fund.

At this important crisis, the politics of Russia underwent a new and propitious revolution, in consequence of the death of the Czarina; and the influence of the court of Versailles co-operating with that event, and with the secret inclinations of all the courts of Europe, preliminary articles of reconciliation were concluded in May, 1727, on the part of all the hostile powers. The policy of assisting, by his presence, at the final conclusion of the treaty, induced his Britannic majesty to pay another visit to the continent. He landed in Holland on the 7th of June, and proceeded on his journey to Hanover. He arrived at Delden between eleven and twelve at night, and ate a hearty supper. The next morning he continued his journey, was afflicted on the road with a severe cholic, and finding, on his arrival at Linden, that his appetite had left him, submitted to the operation of phlebotomy. Proceeding on his journey, contrary to the advice of his attendants, he fell into a lethargy as he passed along; and resting on the arms of a gentleman in the carriage, faintly ejaculated, "C'est fait de moi;" I am a dead man. He was extremely anxious to reach the capital of the electorate; but on his arrival at the palace of his brother, the bishop of Osnaburgh, all hope of recovery disappeared, and on Sunday the 11th of June he expired, in the thirteenth year of his reign and the sixty-seventh of his age.

The character of George I. was chiefly distinguished by those humble but valuable qualities, which form the respectable friend and the useful citizen. His talents were less brilliant than solid; his views were limited, but accurate as far as they extended; and his manners were more conciliating than dignified. While his domestic policy was regulated, as far as the prevalence of corruption and of faction would permit, by the purest principles of benevolence, his foreign negotiations were more fortunate in their result, than comprehensive in their object, or rational in their design. As the elector of Hanover he was popular, able, and judicious; as the king of England his policy was too frequently directed by the influence of a party, and circumscribed by local partialities; but all his intentions were on the side of virtue, and the talents he actually possessed, devoted with sincerity to the furtherance of the happiness of his people.

CHAPTER IX.

GEORGE II.

State of Parties—Examination of the Jails—Congress at Soissons—Affairs of the East India Company—Cruelties and Injustice of the Spaniards—Debates on a standing Army—Excise Bill—Extraordinary Suicide—Marriage of the Princess of Wales—Affairs of Poland—Campaign and Intrigues on the Continent—Murder of Porteus, and unexampled Outrage at Edinburgh—Appeal in favour of the Prince of Wales—Corrupt Practices of the Minister—Progress of the Act for licensing the Drama.

GEORGE II. was born on the 30th of October 1683, and on August 22nd 1705, married Wilhelmina Carolina, daughter of John Frederic, marquis of Brandenburgh Anspach. On his accession to the throne, as well as throughout the whole progress of his reign, he was strongly influenced by partiality to his possessions on the continent. His prejudices and political views corresponded with those of the late king; the prime minister, sir Robert Walpole, received the most decisive testimonies of his regard and confidence; and the other principal officers of state were continued in their places. Sir Robert Walpole had raised himself from low beginnings to the head of the treasury. He was well acquainted with the nature of the public funds, and the mysteries of stock-jobbing; a perfect master of all the arts of bribery and intrigue; fluent in discourse, but destitute of dignity of manner. His address was artful and insinuating, conveying the impression of good-nature and sincerity, and his mode of argumentation displayed the cool, dispassionate, and unaffected equability of a disputant willing to acknowledge his own errors, and to allow their just weight to the arguments of his opponents. His associates were the duke of Newcastle, a man of plausible address and imposing habits, but of a capacity unequal to the duties of his station; Mr. Pelham, his brother, secretary at war, a man of virtue and talents; the earl of Chesterfield, a courtier by profession, graceful in his manners, fluent in his delivery, and distinguished by the delicacy of his wit, and the variety of his attainments. The duke of Argyle, whose haughtiness of address, vehemence of speech, and military skill, have already been noticed in the history of the reign of Anne; and lord Cateret, an individual endowed with great extent and sagacity of comprehension, and an intimate knowledge of the general politics of Europe, dictatorial in his opinions, and reserved in his deportment.

In the house of commons, the members had for several years been distinguished by the titles of Hanoverians and Jacobites; but they now changed their appellations with their principles, and the opposing parties were characterized by the names of the town and country. Both sides had been equally active in promoting the accession of the house of Hanover, and were therefore alike secure from the reproach of disaffection. The former, arranged under the banners of the ministry, were favourable to all the measures of the crown; they were accustomed to regard foreign alliances and continental connections as conducive to internal security and prosperity. The latter were utterly averse to continental connections. They complained that immense sums were lavished on fruitless subsidies, and that alliances were bought with money, from nations that should rather repay Great Britain for her protection. These persons were joined by the most enthusiastic of the Tories, who began to perceive that their own cause was desperate; and as they were leagued with men who did not fear the imputation of Jacobitism, they gave and acquired greater confidence. As the court party generally endeavoured to stimulate the loyalty of the house of commons, by intimations of secret conspiracies and imaginary dangers, their opponents continually declaimed on the encroachments of the prerogative, and the increasing power of the crown. During the whole of the reign of George II. two principal objects of controversy appear to have agitated the contending parties: the national debt, and the number of forces to be retained in pay. The government, at the accession of the king, was indebted to the amount of forty millions, and, notwithstanding many years of profound peace, the debt was regularly accumulating. The country party was usually engaged, during the whole of the session, in investigating so singular a phenomenon; and the court party in tracing it to causes, which should not implicate their prudence or integrity. Demands for new supplies were brought forward every session, under the pretext of securing and rewarding friends upon the continent, or of guarding the kingdom from internal conspiracies. It was vainly contended, that these expences were entirely unnecessary, as well as prejudicial to the nation. The court party was constantly victorious, and every demand was granted with cheerfulness and profusion.

The produce of the civil list revenues, estimated at £800,000, was, on the motion of sir Robert Walpole, granted to the king for life, instead of the annual revenue of £700,000 granted to the late monarch; and in compliance with a message to the house of commons, £100,000 per annum was settled as a jointure on the queen. The parliament being dissolved in August, and a new one convened in January, the sum of £280,000 1728. was voted for the maintenance of the Hessian and Swedish auxiliaries; a subsidy of £100,000 was granted to the duke of Wolfembuttle, who agreed to keep in readiness for the king's service, a corps of 5000 men, and, with a singular estimation of his own power and importance, to guarantee the possession of his majesty's dominions! The supplies were raised by a continuation of the malt-tax, the duties upon malt, cyder, and perry, an additional imposition on unmalted corn used in distilling, and the sale of annuities not exceeding £50,000 per annum to the bank.

Mr. Oglethorpe, having been informed of cruelties and oppressions exercised by gaolers upon their prisoners, moved for an examination into those practices, and was chosen chairman of a committee, appointed to enquire into the state of the gaols, throughout the kingdom. They began with the Fleet Prison, which they visited in a body, where they found sir William Rich, loaded with irons, by order of Bambridge the warden, to whom he had given some slight and involuntary offence. They made a discovery of many inhuman barbarities committed by the same individual, and detected the most shameful and hardened plans of fraud, villainy, and extortion. The house presented an address to the king, desiring that he would direct his attorney-general to prosecute Bambridge, his predecessor Huggins, and their accomplices. They were all committed prisoners to Newgate. A bill was brought in, disabling Bambridge from executing the office of warden, another for the better regulation of the Fleet Prison, and for more effectually preventing and punishing the mal-practices of the warden.

His majesty, having appointed the queen regent of the kingdom, set out for Hanover on the 17th of May, in order to remove a trivial misunderstanding between himself, as elector, and the court of Berlin. In the same month, lord Townsend resigned the seals, which were given to colonel Stanhope, now created earl of Harrington; James, earl of Waldegrave, was appointed ambassador to the court of France. In September, Victor Amadeus, king of Sardinia, resigned his crown to his son Charles Emanuel, prince of Piedmont. The father reserved to himself a revenue of one hundred thousand pistoles per annum, retired to the castle of Chamberry, and espoused the countess dowager of St. Sebastian, who declined the title of queen, but assumed that of marchioness de Somerive.

Soissons was the place finally appointed for the discussion of the separate and collective interests of all the belligerent powers. The congress made little progress towards a general pacification; France and Spain had returned to their former amity, and the court of Madrid became less anxious for an accommodation with England. Conferences, however, were begun at Seville, and a treaty was concluded on the ninth of November, 1729. not only without the knowledge of the emperor, but in direct violation of his rights. On this subject, he communicated an Imperial commissorial decree to the states of the empire, assembled at the diet of Ratisbon, which was answered by the French minister, De Chevigny.

In the succeeding session, the term of exclusive commerce, granted to the East India Company, being about to expire, many individuals of extensive trade and princely capital, presented a petition for the privilege of trading to those countries, proposing to lay open that branch of commerce to all the subjects of Great Britain, on certain conditions. In consideration of an act of parliament for this purpose, they offered to advance £3,200,000 for the redemption of the fund and trade of the existing East India Company. Their proposal was rejected, and the exclusive privilege vested in the company, protracted to the year 1766, on the following conditions: That they should pay into the exchequer the sum of £200,000 towards the supplies of the year, without interest, or addition to their capital stock; that the annuity, or yearly fund, of £140,000 payable to them from the public, should be reduced to £128,000; that after the year 1766, their right to the exclusive trade should be prolonged or refused on repayment of their capital, and after three years' notice, at the pleasure of parliament.

The parliament assembling in January, the king, in his speech from the throne, expressed his joy, that notwithstanding all the clamours which had been raised, the parliament had approved of his negotiations with the continental powers; he declared the peace of Europe to be firmly established by the treaty of Seville, concluded on the foundation of the quadruple alliance; he affirmed, that Spain had agreed to an ample restitution, and reparations for all unlawful seizures and depredations; that the free and uninterrupted exercise of commerce was fully secured, and the privileges and possessions of himself and his allies solemnly guaranteed. The emperor, however, was so much incensed at the conditions of the treaty, which prohibited the subjects of Great Britain from trading in his dominions, guaranteed the duchies of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia to Don Carlos and his successors, and pledged the king of England to transport a body of Spanish troops to Italy, without waiting for the Imperial investiture; that he began with a vigour and rapidity unusual to the court of Austria, to make preparations for war, and to detach numerous bodies of troops to Italy. 1730.

In the course of the session, a bill was brought in and passed, to prevent any subject of Great Britain from advancing money to foreign princes or states, without the consent of his majesty under the privy-seal; a measure which was intended to defeat the purpose of the emperor, who was now negotiating a loan in the English metropolis. A bill, for making more effectual the laws in being, for disabling persons from being chosen members of parliament who enjoyed any pension for any number of years or during pleasure, was passed by the commons, but rejected by the lords: and on the 15th of May, the king went to the house of peers, and closed the session with a speech, in which (alluding to the journals published under the auspices of the opposition) he expressed his indignation at those incendiaries, who, by scandalous libels, laboured to alienate the affections of his people, to fill their minds with groundless jealousies and unjust complaints, in dishonour of him and of his government, and in defiance of the sense of both houses of parliament.

In the speech with which the king opened the session of parliament on the first day of January, he told them, that the present critical juncture seemed in a most particular manner to deserve their attention; that as the transactions then depending, in the several courts of Europe, were upon the point of being decided, the great event of peace or war might be very much determined, by their first resolutions, which were expected by the different powers with much impatience. He said, that the plan of operations, for the execution of the treaty of Seville by force, was now under consideration; that their just concern for the interest of their country would, he doubted not, induce them to grant the supplies necessary to make good his engagements, with that cheerfulness and affection which became a British house of commons, tender of the honour of the crown, careful and solicitous for the glory and prosperity of the kingdom. Notwithstanding the evident determination of the king, to sacrifice the peace of Britain to the interests of Hanover, and the injustice of transferring, by hostile means, the legitimate possessions of the emperor to a rival power, the two houses of parliament promised to support his majesty in all his engagements. When the supply fell under consideration, the debates were renewed upon the subsidies to the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, and the duke of Wolfenbuttle; which, however, were continued, and every article was granted, according to the estimates delivered in, for the expences of the ensuing year. Two petitions being presented to the commons, representing the delays of justice, occasioned by the use of the Latin tongue in proceedings at law, a bill was brought in for changing this practice, and enacting that all processes and pleadings should be entered in the English language. The bill met with warm opposition, on pretence that it would render useless the antient records, which were written in that language, and introduce confusion and delay of justice, by altering the established form and method of pleading. Notwithstanding these objections, it passed through both houses, and received the royal assent. A great number of merchants, from different parts of the country, having repeated their complaints of depredations and cruelties, committed by the Spaniards in the West Indies, their petitions were referred to the consideration of a grand committee. Their complaints, upon examination, appeared to be well founded. The extreme avidity of our merchants, and the natural jealousy of that people were every day productive of mutual encroachments and acts of violence. The inhabitants of our West India islands had long carried on an illicit trade with the subjects of Spain upon the continent; but, when detected, were rigorously punished, and their cargoes confiscated to the crown. Between the temerity of adventure on one hand, and the vigilance of pursuit and punishment on the other, it must frequently have happened that the innocent suffered with the guilty; and many complaints were made, perhaps not without just foundation, that the English merchants were plundered by the vessels of the Spanish king on the southern coast of America.

The English ministry, judging it improper to credit every report which might be urged by avarice, or inflamed by resentment, expected to prevent any rupture, by an amicable representation to the court of Spain, and in the mean time, promised the merchants that they should obtain redress. The complaints, however, becoming more loud and general, and the committee of the house of commons having delivered their opinion, an address was presented to the king, imploring his majesty to continue his endeavours to prevent such depredations for the future, to procure full satisfaction for the damage already sustained, and to secure the British subjects the full and uninterrupted exercise of their trade and navigation to and from the British colonies in America.

The committee examined several persons, who had been seized by the Spaniards, and treated with great cruelty. One man, the master of a trading vessel, had been treated with the utmost barbarity; after beating and plundering him, the Spaniards cut off his ears, and prepared to put him to death, but were accidentally prevented. The indignation of the people was universally excited by this instance of brutality; but the minister judged it prudent to avoid, if possible, an open rupture with the court of Spain. New negotiations were therefore set on foot, and new mediators offered their interposition. On the prorogation of parliament in May, the king was enabled to state, that all apprehensions of war were at length removed, by a treaty signed at Vienna between him and the emperor; it had been communicated to the courts of France and Spain, as parties to the treaty of Seville, and to the states-general; the conditions and engagements into which he had entered were conformable to that necessary interest, which the British nation must always take in the security and preservation of the balance of power in Europe; and the fortunate change in the relations of the respective courts presented a favourable prospect of the perfect re-establishment of public tranquillity. By the treaty, on which the hopes of his majesty were founded, the emperor agreed, that Spain should take possession of the duchies of Parma and Placentia, in the mode prescribed by the treaty of Seville; and that the Ostend Company, which had given such umbrage to the maritime powers, should be totally dissolved, on condition that England, and the other contracting powers of the treaty of Seville, should become guarantees of the pragmatic sanction. The duke of Parma dying at this juncture, an English fleet, under sir Charles Wager, was fitted out; which, having joined the Spanish fleet at Barcelona, convoyed the Spanish troops destined for Italy to Leghorn, Don Carlos himself taking the route of France, when the Imperial forces which had marched into Parma being withdrawn, the infant took peaceable possession of his new territories.

On the 22nd of July, a new treaty was signed at Vienna, between the emperor and the kings of Great Britain and Spain, tending to confirm the former. In August, a treaty of union and of defensive alliance, between the electorates of Saxony and Hanover, was executed at Dresden. The court of Spain, expressing some doubts with regard to the pregnancy of the duchess of Parma, which the late duke had declared in his will, at the same time soliciting the allies to defer the execution of their projects, till his consort should be delivered; she underwent a formal examination, by five midwives of different nations, in presence of the elder duchess-dowager, several ladies of quality, three physicians, and a surgeon, and was declared with child. After having kept all Europe in suspense for six months, she owned that she had been deceived; and general Stampa, with the Imperial forces, took possession of the duchies of Parma and Placentia, which, as I have just related, were re-occupied by Spain, in consequence of the signing of the treaty of Vienna, and the retirement of the Imperial general into the Milanese.

On the return of the session in January, the king declared, in an elaborate speech, that the general tranquillity of Europe was restored and established by the last treaty of Vienna; that Don Carlos, notwithstanding the apparent difficulty of accomplishing that object, was in possession of Parma and Placentia; that the part taken in the late transactions had redounded much to the honour and interest of the nation; that a family convention was concluded between the courts of Spain and Tuscany, for preserving mutual peace and friendship in the two houses; that 6000 Spaniards had been quietly admitted and quartered in the duchy of Tuscany, to secure, by the express consent of the grand duke, the reversion of his dominions; and that the estimate for the service of the current year would be considerably less than those of former years. He recommended unanimity, observing, that his government had no security but what was equally conducive to their happiness, and to the protection of his people; that their prosperity had no foundation, but in the defence and support of his government. "Our safety," he observed, "is mutual, and our interests inseparable."

An address was moved by lord Harvey, a frivolous, superficial, and officious partisan of the minister, who obtained some degree of celebrity by his insignificant but unremitted activity, and who has been satirized by Pope with equal malignity and wit, under the name of Sporus. His motion was opposed by sir Wilfrid Lawson, Mr. William Pulteney, sir William Wyndham, and Mr. Shippen; who did not argue against a general address of thanks, but against the absurdity and bad tendency of expressions, which implied a blind approbation of all the measures of the ministry. The address, however, as originally moved was presented to his majesty, who declared in reply, that he had no doubt of the continuance of the affection and confidence of the house, and that they should ever find his views tending to the honour, interest, and security of his crown and people.

The reduction of the standing army had always been the object of anxious exertion to the country party. When the supply fell under consideration, sir William Strickland, secretary at war, moved, that the same number which had been maintained in the preceding year should be continued in pay. In opposition to the motion, lord Morpeth having demonstrated the danger to which the liberties of the nation might be exposed, by maintaining a numerous standing army in the time of peace, moved an amendment, that the number should be reduced to 12,000. The motion of the secretary at war was supported by the usual advocates of the ministry; the amendment of lord Morpeth was eloquently and powerfully advocated by Mr. Watkins William Wynne, Mr. Walter Plumer, sir William Wyndham, Mr. Shippen, Mr. William Pulteney, and Mr. Barnard; but their resistance was fruitless, and it was resolved, that the standing army be maintained without reduction. Such was the offence given by Mr. Pulteney to the court, by the zealous part he took in this and other questions of the same period, that the king, calling for his council-book, struck out his name from the list of privy-counsellors; a measure which, as in all other instances, only tended to extend and confirm his popularity.

Sir Robert Walpole, having now obtained the first great object of all his wishes and his exertions, Peace, determined upon the adoption of a measure, which, however vehemently opposed and universally reprobated, has proved, in its ultimate establishment and extension, one of the most permanent sources of our commercial and financial prosperity. The principal branches of revenue were at this time divided into port duties or customs, duties of excise, and taxes levied on immoveable property, such as the duties on land, houses, hearths, and windows. It was obvious that the latter description of duties bore with equal weight on the poor and wealthy classes of society; and the extent of the frauds on the customs, which no vigilance could prevent, were equally deplorable in a moral point of view, and injurious to the revenue. He conceived a plan, therefore, to convert the greater part of the customs into duties of excise, and in the month of February introduced a bill, proposing that the duties on salt, which about two years before had been abolished, should now be revived, and granted to his majesty, his heirs, and successors, for a term of three years; declaring, at the same time, as some propitiation of the country party, that the land-tax should be reduced to one shilling in the pound, and finally abolished. The duties on salt, he said, affected, it was true, all classes of society; but the burden of the tax being so equally and generally diffused, the sum contributed by the lower orders of the people would be found, on computation, so trifling as scarcely to deserve mention. This tax, while it existed, was never the subject of complaint; and when it was repealed, no one appeared to think himself benefited. He knew the reproaches he had to expect on this occasion; but he had been long accustomed to be affronted and insulted, both within the walls of that place and without, and while he knew his intentions to be upright, and his only aim to serve his country, to the best of his knowledge and the utmost of his power, he should continue to disregard those reflections which he was conscious he did not deserve. The country party expressed their opposition to the bill in terms of the utmost vehemence, and repeatedly accused the minister of being influenced, in bringing it forward, by wicked and malignant designs. It was passed, however, by a large majority, and was succeeded by the expulsion from the house of Dennis Bond and serjeant Birch, commissioners for the sale of the forfeited estates, who were declared guilty, by a committee of the house, of flagrant breach of trust, in the sale of an estate which had belonged to the late earl of Derwentwater. During this session, five other members were expelled for various acts of knavery. The house of lords followed the example of the commons, and voted against the reduction of the army. On the first day of June the king closed the session, after having informed both houses, that the states-general had acceded to the treaty of Vienna, and that he had determined to visit his German dominions, and to vest the authority of regent, during his absence, in the queen. He accordingly set out for Hanover in the beginning of June; having received intimation that the pragmatic sanction had been confirmed by the diet of the empire, after a formal protest by Bavaria, Saxony, and the electors palatine; a confirmation which of course included the favourite object of his father and himself, the investiture of the duchies of Bremen and Verden.

A SINGULAR and lamentable act of suicide distinguished the annals of the present year. 1732. Richard Smith, a book-binder, and prisoner for debt within the rules of the king's bench, formed the resolution of dying by his own hand, and persuaded his wife to follow his example, after murdering their infant. The act was committed without any of the usual indications of lunacy or irresolution. They were found hanging in their bed-chamber, at the distance of about a yard from each other; and in a separate apartment the child lay dead in a cradle. They left two papers, enclosed in a short letter to their landlord, whose kindness they implored in favour of their dog and cat. They even left money to pay the porter who should carry the enclosed papers to the person for whom they were addressed. In one of these, the husband thanked that person for the marks of friendship he had received at his hands, and complained of the ill offices he had experienced from a different quarter. The other paper, subscribed by the husband and wife, contained the reasons which induced them to act such a tragedy on themselves and their offspring. They declared that they withdrew themselves from poverty and rags, evils that through a train of unlucky accidents had become inevitable. They appealed to their neighbours, for the industry with which they had endeavoured to obtain a livelihood, and justified the murder of their child, by saying, it was an act of less cruelty to take her with them, than to leave her friendless in the world, exposed to indigence and misery. They professed their belief in the mercy of God, and submitted themselves to his infinite goodness for his forgiveness after death.

TRUSTEES had been appointed by charter to superintend a new settlement in Georgia, and general Oglethorpe, being appointed governor, embarked at Gravesend, accompanied by a number of poor families, who founded the town of Savannah on the river of that name. The contiguity of Georgia to the Spanish settlement of Florida, and the impossibility of determining their respective boundaries, excited the natural apprehension of the Spaniards, and laid the foundation of future jealousy and contention.

THE session of parliament was opened 1733. by a speech on the usual topics, and by a correspondent reply on the part of the two houses; and the commons, having resolved themselves into a committee, to deliberate on the most efficacious means of securing and improving the duties and revenues charged on tobacco and wines, the papers relating to these duties were submitted to the perusal of the members. The commissioners of the customs and excise were ordered to attend the house, of which the avenues were crowded by multitudes; and the members of the country party waited impatiently for a proposal, in which they regarded the liberties of their country as so deeply interested. Sir Robert Walpole introduced his speech, by lamenting the arts which had been employed to prejudice the people against his plan, before it was known. He affirmed, that the clamours occasioned by these prejudices had originated in the misrepresentations of smugglers, and dishonest dealers, who had enriched themselves by defrauding the public. He expatiated on the frauds committed in that branch of the revenue arising from the duties on tobacco; on the hardship to which the American planters were subjected, by the heavy duties payable on importation, as well as by the ill-usage they had experienced from their factors and correspondents in England; on the injury done to the fair trader, and the loss of revenue sustained by the public. He asserted, that the plan he was about to propose, would remove all these inconveniences, prevent innumerable frauds, perjuries, and false entries, and add £200,000 or £300,000 per annum to the public revenue; he declared that he had no intention to promote a general excise; he endeavoured to anticipate the chief objections that would be made to his plan, and then proceeded to enter into the necessary details. He proposed to join the laws of the excise to those of the customs; that the further subsidy of three farthings per pound, charged upon imported tobacco, should still be levied at the custom-house, and be paid as usual to his majesty's civil list; that then the tobacco should be lodged in warehouses, to be appointed for that purpose by the commissioners of excise; that the keeper of each warehouse, appointed by the commissioners, should have one lock and key, and the merchant-importer another, and the tobacco be thus secured, till it should find a market, either by home consumption or exportation; that the part designed for exportation should be weighed at the custom-house, discharged of the three farthings per pound which had been paid at its first importation, and then exported without further trouble; that the portion destined for home consumption should, in the presence of the warehouse-keeper, be delivered to the purchaser, on his paying an inland duty of 4*d.* per pound in weight, to the proper officer appointed to receive it, by which means the merchant would be relieved from the inconvenience of paying the duty on importation, or of granting bonds, and finding securities for payment, before he had found a market for the commodity. In the course of the debate, which was extremely violent, sir Robert took notice of the multitudes which had beset the house; he remarked, that it would be an easy task for a designing seditious person to excite tumult and disorder among them; that gentlemen might affirm they came as humble suppliants, but he knew whom the law called sturdy beggars, and those who brought them to that place could not be certain that they would not behave in the same manner. This insinuation was resented by sir John Barnard, who observed, that merchants of character had a right to come down to the court of requests, and to the lobby of the house of commons, in order to solicit their friends against any project, which they might deem injurious to their commerce. The bill being passed by a majority of 61, the whole nation, inflamed by the misrepresentations of those, whose fraudulent practices it was intended to counteract, exasperated by the appellation of "sturdy beggars," and stimulated by alarm for the safety of the constitution, and the liberty of the people, of which long experience has proved the fallacy, burst into one loud clamour of opposition and discontent. The populace crowded around Westminster-hall, blocking up all the avenues to the house of commons. The persons of those members who voted in favour of the bill were grossly insulted, and their lives endangered; and sir Robert Walpole himself was exposed to the continual probability of open assassination. He was at length obliged to give way to the expression of popular resentment, and thought proper to move, that the second reading of the bill might be postponed till the 12th of June. The rejoicings on occasion of this victory over the minister were universal, and he was burnt in effigy by the London populace. The introduction of the bill, however, prepared the way for future success, and called the attention of parliament and of the nation to the various and extensive frauds practised in the customs. A committee was appointed to enquire into the abuses of that branch of the revenue, and twenty-one persons ballotted for the purpose.

The king having intimated in a message, that he was about to give the princess-royal in marriage to the prince of Orange, eighty thousand pounds were granted, as a marriage dower, out of the money arising from the sale of lands in the island of St. Christopher's. After a warm debate, the directors of the South Sea Company were ordered to lay before the house an account of the forfeited estates which had belonged to them. It was now discovered, that the large sums of money thus arising had been distributed among the proprietors, without the knowledge or the sanction of parliament. Lord Bathurst moved for a resolution of the house, that the disposal of this money by way of dividend, without any order of a general court for that purpose, was a violation of the act of parliament, and a manifest injustice to the proprietors of stock. All endeavours, however, to obtain a resolution to that effect were precluded by the fears of the ministry, and the influence of the directors. A bill had been brought in, for devoting a part of the sinking fund to purposes inconsistent with its original intention; and notwithstanding the opposition of the lords Bathurst and Carteret, and the earls of Stafford and Chesterfield, the latter of whom had resigned his staff of lord steward of the household, was passed by a small majority. On the 11th of June, the king closed the session with a speech, in which he noticed, in terms of severity, the wicked endeavours that had been lately employed, to inflame the minds of the people by the most unjust representations.

The tranquillity of Europe was now disturbed by the death of Augustus, king of Poland. The late emperor, Charles VI., had been much dissatisfied with the conduct of Augustus, in the latter part of his reign, suspecting that he had formed engagements with the courts of France and Bavaria, unfavourable to the pragmatic sanction. These suspicions being obliterated, by the acquiescence of the son of Augustus, the elector of Saxony, in the utility and necessity of the pragmatic sanction, the court of Vienna no longer opposed, as it had hitherto done, but promoted the views of Augustus respecting the succession. On the other hand, France from first to last openly supported the cause of Stanislaus, who had married the daughter of Lewis XIV. His numerous alliances, his shining virtues, and the exemplary correctness of his habits, compared with those of the other continental princes, had preserved him many friends in Poland; so that the marquis de Monti, the French ambassador, was easily enabled, in conjunction with the primate, to form a powerful and numerous faction in his favour.

The prince of Saxony being warmly supported by the courts of Vienna and St. Petersburgh, a double election ensued. Stanislaus had proceeded, immediately after the annunciation of the death of Augustus, to Warsaw, where he was received and treated as king; but he was soon driven from that city by the Russian army, under count Munich, was compelled to retire to Dantzick, where he sustained a long siege, encountered many dangers, endured many hardships, and with infinite difficulty made his escape to Konigsberg, where he was honourably protected by the king of Prussia. His flight was followed by a general submission to Augustus, and a general amnesty was granted, in return, to the partizans of Stanislaus. Disappointed in their principal object, the court of Versailles yielded to the impulse of revenge, commanded the duke of Berwick to pass the Rhine in October, at the head of a numerous army, and take measures for entering the heart of Germany, if the Imperialists should march into Poland. Before the day of election, the Imperial, Russian, and Prussian ministers delivered their protestations against the possible election of Stanislaus, as a person proscribed, disqualified, depending upon a foreign power, and connected with the Turks and other infidels. The Russian general, Lasci, entered Poland at the head of 50,000 men, and the diet was opened on the 25th of August. Prince Visazowiski, the chief of the Saxon interest, retired to the other side of the Vistula with 3000 men, including some of the nobility who adhered to the same party. Notwithstanding the vicinity of the Russian force, the primate proceeded to the election; and Stanislaus, who had travelled through Germany in the disguise of a peasant, and concealed himself in the house of the French ambassador at Warsaw, was elected king. He immediately appeared in the electoral field, and was received with loud acclamations. But his triumph was of short duration; the strength of the opposite party gradually augmented, and he was compelled to abandon Warsaw to his rival.

Kehl and Philipsburgh, having been taken by the French, notwithstanding the duke of Berwick had the honour to be opposed by prince Eugene, now in the decline of his health and faculties, and France having concluded a treaty with Spain and Sardinia, by which they were engaged to the prosecution of hostilities against the emperor, made offers for a compromise, through the mediation of Great Britain, which were rejected. The confederate army of France, Spain, and Sardinia, entered Italy, and captured Tortona, Navara, Pavia, the city of Milan, and several other towns and fortresses. While the Austrians were thus driven from the Milanese, the Neapolitan nobility, irritated and oppressed under the government of the count de Visconti, the Imperial viceroy, joined in an invitation to Don Carlos, the infant duke of Parma, to attempt an invasion of that kingdom. He accordingly entered the Neapolitan territories, at the head of a considerable army, and was received in the metropolis with loud acclamations, as the general deliverer. Visconti, having retreated into Apulia, was pursued by the Spanish general, the count de Montemar, who gained over him at Bitonto, on May 25th, a decisive victory. Don Carlos, being proclaimed king of Naples, immediately proceeded in person to the reduction of Sicily, which he easily accomplished. In this extremity, the emperor implored succours of the Czarina of Russia, who immediately dispatched an army of 30,000 men to his assistance; an interposition which induced the court of Versailles to assent to a negotiation. A general treaty of peace was concluded in the spring of the next year, by which Naples and Sicily were yielded to Don Carlos; and Parma and Placentia, the paternal possessions of Don Carlos, were ceded to the house of Austria; to whom the other conquests also of the allies in Germany and Italy were restored. The reversion of the grand duchy of Tuscany, relinquished by Spain, was conferred, as a fief of the empire at the demise of the grand duke, upon the duke of Lorraine, who was affianced to the eldest archduchess, Maria Theresa, the sole heiress, under the pragmatic sanction, of the dominions of the house of Austria. The elector of Saxony was acknowledged as king of Poland, and the duchy of Lorraine ceded to Stanislaus, with the nominal title of king; the duchy, a most valuable possession, for which France had frequently and unsuccessfully contended, to be after his death for ever united to that crown. The king of Sardinia was recompensed by certain districts of the Milanese.

The session of 1734 was distinguished by many vigorous but unsuccessful endeavours to obtain the repeal of the septennial act; by the rejection of a motion for preventing the removal of officers, not above the rank of colonel, otherwise than by the judgment of a court-martial, or the authority of parliament, the duke of Bolton and lord Cobham having been deprived of their commissions, for opposing the measures of the court; and by the failure of a bill for limiting the number of officers civil and military in the house of commons. In the ensuing sessions, the house of lords was agitated by a petition from several of the Scotch nobility, complaining of the influence of the crown in the election of the peers of Scotland, which was dismissed by a motion of adjournment. A bill, for the relief of the people called Quakers from prosecution in the exchequer, ecclesiastical, and other courts, was rejected in the lords, after violent opposition. The old statutes against conjuration, witchcraft, and dealing with evil spirits, were repealed; and a bill was passed to distrain the disposition of lands by mortmain, an exempting clause being inserted in favour of the universities.

The kingdom was at this time agitated with curiosity, horror, and surprise, by the commission of a singular act of atrocity in the capital of Scotland. A criminal named Wilson, being condemned for robbing a collector, was executed at Edinburgh on the 14th of April; when John Porteus, the commander of the city guard, a man of brutal disposition and abandoned morals, provoked at the mischief of some boys, who flung stones at the executioner as he was cutting down the body, ordered his men, without having recourse to the previous formalities of the law, to fire with shot among the crowd, by which several persons were killed and wounded. He was committed to prison, in July found guilty of wilful murder, and received sentence of death, which was to be executed on the 8th of September; but, in the mean time, the queen (his majesty being absent on the continent) granted him a reprieve, on condition of his being transported. On the 7th of September, about ten at night, a great number of men entered the city of Edinburgh, and by surprize seized all the fire-arms, battle-axes, and drums belonging to the city guard. In a few minutes, they locked and secured all the city gates, beat an alarm with drums, and then attempted to force open the door of the prison, where Porteus was confined. Finding their attempts unavailing, they burnt the door from its hinges. Having obtained an entrance, they made the under-keeper open the double locks of the captain's apartment, dragged the latter down the stairs, and hurried him away. They marched along with lighted torches before them, and proceeded to the usual place of execution, where the murder was committed. The temporary gallows having been taken down, they obtained a rope from a neighbouring shop, one end of which they threw over a dyer's pole, from which they left him suspended, and quietly dispersed to their several habitations. The perpetrators of this atrocity were never discovered, notwithstanding a reward of £200 was offered by proclamation for such detection. The government yielding to the dictates of resentment rather than of policy, and in defiance of the remonstrance of the Scottish representatives, and the indignation of the Scottish people, brought in and carried a bill, for disabling the lord provost of Edinburgh from holding any office of magistracy in Great Britain, for abolishing the guard of that city, and for taking away the gates of the Nether-bow-port, which during this transaction had been shut, in order to prevent the troops quartered in the suburbs from entering the city.

1737. The next session was opened by commission on the 1st of February, having been prorogued from the 21st of January, in consequence of the indisposition of the king, occasioned by a tempestuous passage from Holland. The first subject of discussion, in the course of the session, was a motion of Mr. Pulteney for an address to his majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to settle £100,000 per annum on the prince of Wales. The motion was opposed by sir Robert Walpole, as an encroachment on the prerogative; as an act of officious interference in his majesty's domestic arrangements; and as an effort to excite dissension between his majesty and the prince. In consequence of the marriage of the prince to Augusta, princess of Saxe Gotha, the king had offered to settle a jointure on the princess, and to grant to his royal highness, for his majesty's life, the sum of £50,000 per annum, to be issued out of the civil list revenues, independently of the prince's revenues arising from the duchy of Cornwal. The prince, by a verbal answer, expressed his dutiful respect and gratitude to his majesty; but that "the affair was in other hands, and he was sorry for it." The motion was finally negatived by a majority of 234 to 204. The consequence of this motion, and of other causes of misunderstanding, was a decided and avowed alienation of the two courts of St. James's and Leicester House, which so deeply affected the minds and conduct of all the illustrious parties, that during the last illness of the queen, who expired in November, the prince was unable or reluctant to perform the usual offices of filial piety.

One of the great characteristics of Walpole's administration, was a liberal and politic employment of the agency of the press. To this line of conduct he was excited, by the number and virulence of those able pamphleteers, who, beneath the auspices of Bolingbroke, Chesterfield, and the other members of the opposition, discussed the principal questions of public policy with partial but persuasive ability, and descanted on the imbecility, the folly, and the criminality of their political opponents, in a strain of vigorous and ingenious satire, which, if it were frequently unjust and always malignant, delighted by its wit, and commanded the admiration of those who most sincerely and justly hated the principles of its writers. The most celebrated orators, the most profound statesmen, and the most brilliant wits of the day, were occasional auxiliaries to the public and popular journals; and even now that the interest arising from the relation of their essays to contemporary circumstances, and to objects of immediate anxiety, is necessarily lost, the effusions of Bolingbroke, Chesterfield, Amhurst, and their coadjutors, will be read with pleasure for the ingenuity of their arguments, the felicity of their sarcasms and allusions, and the beauty of their language.

To counteract the efforts of so formidable a phalanx, sir Robert engaged, on the side of the ministry, a host of periodical writers, who, if their talents had justified the liberality of their master, or the occasional justice of their cause, would have silenced and eclipsed the literary advocates of opposition. But unfortunately the wit, the eloquence, and the ingenuity of the latter were not more conspicuous, than the absence of all these qualities in the writings of their opponents; the literary talent of the nation was decidedly in favour of the ministry, and extended its influence from the journals to the theatres. At a time when many of the latter were employed to divert the public by every variety of entertainment, and when none of them were in a flourishing state, the imprudence and extravagance of a gentleman who possessed an unusual portion of wit, humour, and genius, obliged him to strike out a new species of amusement, which enabled the minister to counteract the political influence of the stage, under the pretext of restraining its licentiousness. To extricate himself out of many difficulties in which he was involved, and to revenge indignities which had been cast upon him by the people in power, Henry Fielding determined to amuse the town, at the expence of some persons of rank and of influence in the political world. For this purpose he collected a company of performers, who exhibited at the Haymarket Theatre, under the title of "The Great Mogul's Company of Comedians." The piece he represented was Pasquin, which he acted to crowded audiences for fifty successive nights. Encouraged by the favourable reception of this performance, he determined to continue at the same place during the next season, where he produced several new plays, some of which were applauded, and some condemned. The severity of Fielding's satire exasperated the minister, and convinced him of the policy of preventing similar attacks upon the members of the government; and a bill was introduced, by the conditions of which no new dramatic pieces could be exhibited, without the express license of the lord chamberlain. The only decided opponent of this bill was lord Chesterfield, who strenuously urged the impolicy and injustice of reposing in a single person the power of judging and determining without limitation, control, or appeal. "If poets and players," he observed, "are to be restrained, let them be restrained as other subjects are, by the known laws of their country; if they offend, let them be tried, as every Englishman ought to be, by God and their country." Notwithstanding these remonstrances, the bill passed through the two houses, with little opposition; and, if we can forgive the injustice of the abstract principle to which lord Chesterfield alluded, may be applauded, as having contributed to the chastity, without having repressed the spirit or the freedom of the British drama.

CHAPTER X.

GEORGE II.

Disputes with Spain—The Gin Act—Hostilities between Denmark and Hanover—Pacific Disposition of the Ministers—Expedition and extraordinary Success of Admiral Vernon—Capture of Porto Bello—Expedition to Carthagena, and its Failure—Banishment from Court of the Prince of Wales—Resignation of Walpole—Conduct of the new Ministry—Foreign Affairs—Accession of the Empress Maria-Theresa—Naval Transactions—Exploits of the King of Prussia—Battle of Dettingen—The Annesley Cause—Naval Operations of Matthews and Lestock—Anson's Voyage round the World—Death of the Emperor Charles VII.—Battle of Fontenoy—Change in the Ministry—Projected Invasion of England—Capture of Cape Breton.

SINCE the treaty of Seville, mutual encroachments, on the privileges of each other, had been made by the Spanish and English subjects in America. A right which the English merchants claimed by the treaty, of cutting log-wood in the bay of Campeachy, afforded them frequent opportunities of carrying on an illicit trade in the immediate vicinity; and to suppress the evil, the Spaniards were resolved to annihilate the claim. The Spanish vessels employed to protect the coast committed frequent hostilities on the English, many of whom were sent to dig in the mines of Potosi, and deprived of every means of communicating their complaints to the British government. Repeated remonstrances, on this violation of treaty, were sent to the court Madrid, but no effectual measures were taken by Spain to prevent these outrages. The English merchants complained repeatedly and loudly of the losses they sustained, while the minister, persisting in his usual policy, endeavoured to accommodate the dispute by protracted negotiation.

In the latter end of June, rear-admiral Haddock set sail with a strong squadron for the Mediterranean, with the view of giving weight to the negotiation of the British minister at the court of Madrid. An act, to discourage the retail of spirituous liquors, had incensed the populace to such a degree, as to occassion serious tumults in the cities of London and Westminster. They were so addicted to the use of the pernicious compound, gin or Geneva, that in less than two years 12,000 persons, within the bills of mortality, were convicted in the penalty of from £10 to £100 each, for having sold it illegally.

1738. On the 4th of June, the son of the princess of Wales was baptized by the name of George; but her royal highness still continued to labour under the displeasure of his majesty. In the month of October, the good understanding between the elector of Hanover and the king of Denmark had nearly been disturbed by a circumstance of trivial importance. A detachment of Hanoverians, irritated by some real or supposed provocation, took by assault the castle of Steinhorst, belonging to the privy-counsellor Wederkop, and defended by thirty Danish dragoons. Several men were killed on both sides, before the Hanoverians could enter the place, when the garrison was disarmed and conducted to the frontiers. Fortunately for England, which would have been compelled to support the rights of its monarch, as elector of Hanover, the dispute was compromised, in consequence of mutual concessions.

1739. On Thursday, the 1st of February, the parliament was opened as usual by a speech from his majesty, in which he informed them, that he had concluded and ratified a convention with the king of Spain, who had consented to make reparation for the loss of his subjects, by a certain stipulated payment; and that plenipotentiaries were named in the convention for regulating, within a limited time, all those grievances and abuses, which had hitherto interrupted our commerce and navigation in the American seas, as well as for settling all other matters in dispute. The publication of the convention itself was the general object of animadversion in parliament, and of discontent among the most intelligent class of the nation. It was alleged, that the balance of £95,000, stipulated to be paid into the exchequer of England, by his catholic majesty, was wholly inadequate to the just demands of the English merchants; that the Spaniards, by the convention, instead of granting us reparation, had obtained a general release; that every insult and injury, uttered and committed in defiance of the king of Great Britain, was justified and avowed; and even the atrocity of the Spanish pirate, who had cut off the ear of captain Jenkins, and used the most disgraceful of expressions towards the person of the king;—even the atrocity of this fellow was forgiven, and he lived to enjoy the fruits of his rapine. Mr. William Pitt, who had first excited the attention of the house to his extraordinary talents during the preceding session, declaimed against the convention as insecure, unsatisfactory, and dishonourable; and sir Thomas Sanderson, afterwards the good, the great, and the accomplished earl of Scarborough, supported the general tenor of his reasoning with equal ardour and ability. The house, upon a division, agreed to the address, by no greater a majority than twenty-eight. After the division, sir William Wyndham addressed himself to the house in warm terms of remonstrance against the motion which had just been carried; and so far provoked the minister, beyond the limits of his usual circumspection, that he indulged in the grossest and most personal abuse. He asserted, that the gentleman, who was now the mouth of his opponents, had been pardoned by the vigilance of a former government, as the head of those friends to the Pretender, who twenty-five years before had conspired the destruction of their country and of the royal family, but all the use or return which he had made for that clemency, was to qualify himself, according to law, that he and his party might, at some time or other, have occasion to destroy the law. In the house of lords, forty peers entered their protests against the presentation of the address, and in the house of commons, many members of the country party retired in disgust from their parliamentary duty.

Notwithsanding the violence of the ministers in their domestic contentions, and their determination to postpone the resumption of hostilities, as far as might accord with the safety of their country and their own retention of power, the aggressions of Spain were too evident, and the sentiments of the nation too determined, to permit any further indulgence in forbearance or inactivity. New instructions were therefore transmitted to Mr. Keene, our ambassador at Madrid, who declared to the marquis de Villarias, that his Britannic majesty insisted on the king's executing, without delay, the arrangements to which he had acceded by the convention; on his renouncing his pretended right to visit the British ships in the American sea; and on his acknowledgment of the justice of the British establishment on the confines of Georgia and Carolina. No attention was paid to this remonstrance; and the warmth of the nation became so fervent, that the ministry found it necessary to authorise reprisals. The breach soon became unavoidable, and Great Britain was unanimous for a reparation by arms. The negotiation was soon suspended, and war declared on both sides; that against Spain on the 23rd of October, with the usual solemnities.

Immediately after the declaration of war, two Spanish prizes of great value were taken in the Mediterranean, and admiral Vernon was sent with a fleet into the West Indies. He had asserted that Porto Bello, a port and harbour in South America, could be easily destroyed, and that he himself, with six ships, would undertake to reduce it. The project was regarded by the ministry as quixotic and impracticable; but the admiral persisting in his assertions, they at length complied with his request, not without hope, that the failure of the expedition might repress the confidence of the party which espoused it. After touching at Jamaica, and making reprisals in his course, he arrived on the 20th of November in sight of Porto Bello. The night was partly spent in consulting measures for a vigorous attack, as the place was defended by many forts, strongly guarded, and by several ships of force, which lay in the harbour to cover the town. On the 21st, the Hampton Court, being in the van, began its attack on Castillo d'Hierro, and was succeeded by the Norwich and Worcester, which behaved with admirable resolution. The admiral came up, with the blue flag at his topmast-head, and the bloody flag on his main-topmast-head, and dropt anchor within half a cable's length of the castle. On this the Spaniards summoned all their force, which did considerable execution, but was of little effect; the admiral's guns being so well directed as to make a breach in their upper works, and oblige them to quit their lower tier of guns, and fly for refuge to their ambuscades. This being perceived, the admiral hoisted the signal for landing, which was so well obeyed, that in a few minutes they were safely landed in the front of the enemy's lower battery, with the loss of only two soldiers. They immediately entered by the embrasures, the one creeping over the other's shoulders, so that in three minutes they were on the platform, they struck the Spanish flag of defiance, and hoisted the British standard. This event induced the Spaniards in the castle to hang out the white flag, and surrender at discretion, five officers and thirty-five men only remaining out of three hundred, the rest being fled, killed, or wounded. In the mean time, Castello de Gloria and the fort of Jeronimo kept up a constant fire on the admiral; but their shot either fell short, or went over him, while the admiral's lower tier beat down the flag of the castle, destroyed several houses in the town, and sunk a sloop that lay between the forts. The conflict was only suspended by the approach of night. In the morning, as the admiral was taking the necessary measures for resuming the attack, a flag of truce was sent from the castle, proposing terms, which, with some modification, were agreed to. The garrison were allowed to march out with all the honours of war; ten thousand dollars, which had arrived to pay the Spanish garrison, fell into the hands of the English, which the admiral ordered to be distributed among the forces; three hundred pieces of cannon were spiked or destroyed, and the fortifications razed to the ground.

The seceding members had resumed their seats in the house of commons, but were unable to oppose with success the measures of Walpole. On the 13th day of March, a vessel arrived from the West Indies with an account of the capture of Porto Bello, and the two houses of parliament joined in an address of congratulation on the success of his majesty's arms. The success of Vernon equally contributed to the acquiescence of the parliament, in granting liberal supplies, and to the general popularity of the war. In the beginning of the following May, the enthusiasm of the people was still farther excited by the arrival of a sloop, with 1740. additional dispatches from the admiral, announcing the bombardment of Carthagena, and the capture of the fort of San Lorenzo on the river Chagre, in the neighbourhood of Porto Bello. In the beginning of May the king set out for Hanover; in a fews days after his departure, the nuptials of the princess Mary to the prince of Hesse were celebrated by proxy; and these events were immediately followed by the death of his Prussian majesty.

A FORMIDABLE armament was now equipped, convoyed by sir Chaloner Ogle, and intended for the coasts of New Spain, consisting of twenty-nine ships of the line, and almost an equal number of frigates, furnished with every description of warlike stores, 15,000 seamen, and as many land forces. Never was a fleet more completely equipped, nor ever had the nation more sanguine hopes of success. Lord Cathcart was appointed to command the land forces; but dying on the passage, the command devolved on general Wentworth, whose abilities were supposed to be unequal to the importance of the undertaking. They at length arrived on the coast of Spain, before the city of Carthagena. This place lies within sixty miles of Panama, and served as a magazine for the merchandize of Spain, which was conveyed thither from Europe, and thence transported by land to Panama, to be exchanged for the commodities of the New World. The taking of Carthagena, therefore, would have entirely obstructed the trade between New Spain and the mother country.

IN order to form the siege of this important fortification, the troops were landed on the island Tierra Bomba, near the mouth of the harbour, which had been previously fortified by all the arts of engineering. Having landed, they erected a battery, with which they made a breach in the principal fort; while Vernon, who had proceeded to Carthagena, and taken the command of the besieging fleet, sent a number of ships into the harbour, to divide the fire of the enemy, and to co-operate with the forces that were landed. The breach being deemed practicable, a body of troops was commanded to storm; but the Spaniards deserted the forts, notwithstanding they were perfectly defensible. On gaining this advantage the English troops advanced nearer to the city, but met with a reception more warm and intrepid than they had expected. It was alleged, that the fleet could not approach the town so near as to batter it, and that nothing remained but to attempt one of the forts by scaling. The leaders of the fleet and army indulged in mutual accusation, each asserting the probability of what the other denied. At length Wentworth, stimulated by the admiral's reproach, resolved to try the dangerous experiment, and ordered that fort St. Lazare should be attempted by escalade. The forces marching up to the attack, their guides were slain, and they mistook their way. Instead of attempting the weakest part of the fort, they advanced to where it was strongest, and where they were exposed to the fire of the town. Colonel Grant, who commanded the grenadiers, was killed in the beginning of the attack. It was soon afterwards discovered, that the scaling ladders were too short, the officers were perplexed for want of orders, and the troops stood exposed to the whole fire of the enemy, without knowing how to proceed. After sustaining a dreadful fire for some hours, with great intrepidity, they at length retreated, leaving 600 men dead on the spot. The rainy season now began with such violence, that it was impossible for the troops to continue encamped, and great havoc was made by diseases arising from the climate. To these calamities was added the dissension between the military and naval commanders, who blamed each other for every failure and disappointment. At length they were induced to agree in one mortifying measure; that of re-embarking the troops, and withdrawing them, as fast as possible, from the scene of enterprise. The fortifications near the harbour, therefore, being demolished, the troops were conveyed to Jamaica, which, though sufficiently unhealthy, was regarded as a perfect contrast to the infectious climate whence they had just escaped. Vernon, instead of undertaking any further enterprise, that might have done honour to the British arms, set sail in July from Jamaica, with the forces which had, by this time, in some degree recruited their health and strength, and anchored at the south-east part of Cuba, in a bay, on which he bestowed the appellation of Cumberland harbour. The troops were landed, and encamped at the distance of twenty miles further up the river, where they remained totally inactive, and subsisted chiefly on salt and damaged provisions, till the month of November, when, being considerably diminished by sickness, they were re-embarked and re-conveyed to Jamaica. The admiral was afterwards reinforced from England by four ships of war and 3000 soldiers, but performed nothing worthy of the reputation he had acquired by the capture of Porto Bello.

The failure of this expedition was no sooner known in England, than the kingdom was filled with clamour and indignation against the minister, who found himself charged also with various other acts of misconduct. The principal of these accusations related to the inactivity of the English fleet at home. Sir John Norris had twice sailed to the coast of Spain, at the head of a powerful squadron, without performing any thing of consequence against the enemy; while the Spanish privateers annoyed the British commerce with great success. The general discontent of the people had an evident influence on the election of members to the new parliament. The duke of Argyle exerted himself with much success among the shires and boroughs of Scotland, and all the adherents of the prince of Wales employed their talents and their influence in favour of the country party. In order to obviate the difficulties presented by the prince's strenuous opposition to his cause, Walpole endeavoured, by promises of royal favour, and by offers of pecuniary emolument, to disengage him from the country party. The bishop of Oxford was dispatched with an offer, that if he would write a letter of submission to the king, he and all his counsellors should be taken into favour, £50,000 a year should be added to his revenue, £200,000 be granted him to pay his debts, and suitable provision be made, in due time, for all his dependants. However tempting this offer must have been, to one in the prince's situation, he generously rejected it; declaring that he would not accept of conditions, dictated to him under the influence of a minister, of whose measures he disapproved.

On the meeting of parliament in December, the address of thanks was carried as usual; but in the first division on a disputed election, he retained only a majority of six, which he justly regarded as an indication of defeat. A petition presented by the electors of Westminster, against the illegal practices of the high bailiff, and the introduction, by the justices, of a military force to overawe the election, under the pretext of preventing riots, was taken into the consideration of the house; the election was declared void, by a majority of four voices, and the offending persons reprimanded on their knees, at the bar of the house. Sir Robert, perceiving the uncertainty and peril of the situation to which he was now reduced, determined to regain his ascendancy by one bold effort, or retire from the storm, which he was no longer able to resist. On the next question, therefore, of disputed election, he pressed the commons to a division; and having the mortification to witness a majority against him of sixteen voices, he declared that he would never more sit in that house. On the next day the parliament was adjourned from the 3rd of February to the 18th; and, in the mean time, sir Robert was created earl of Orford, with precedence to his illegitimate child as the daughter of an earl. 1742.

The whole nation was convulsed with a joy, more creditable to its sensibility than its judgment or good sense, on the earl's resignation of his employments. Yet if the professions of pretended patriots, and the vehemence of those senators, who indulge in continual and violent declamation against the government, as a matter of oratorical taste rather than political principle, might have been received as pledges of independence and sincerity, the change in the ministry would have more than justified the full expression of popular exultation. Unfortunately, the base and mercenary character of his opponents was as obvious to Walpole as unsuspected by the nation; his party still remained too steadily attached to his person, and too formidable in numbers, to leave much hope to his opponents of obtaining office, but on conditions, of which, however, only one was imposed, and that one the impunity of Walpole. The chancellorship of the exchequer was now confided to Mr. Sandys, who was likewise appointed a lord of the treasury; and the earl of Wilmington succeeded him, as first commissioner of the board. Lord Harrington was declared president of the council, and in his room lord Carteret was made secretary of state. The duke of Argyle was made master-general of the ordnance, and field-marshal and commander-in-chief of all the forces in South Britain; both which employments he renounced in a month, dissatisfied with his colleagues. The marquis of Tweedale was appointed to the revived office of secretary of state for Scotland; Mr. Pulteney was sworn of the privy-council, and afterwards created earl of Bath; and after the resignation of the duke of Argyle, the earl of Stair was appointed field-marshal of all his majesty's forces, and ambassador extraordinary to the states-general. The ostensible policy observed in the formation of the ministry, was the change of men, but the preservation of Whig principles. The new possessors of office were loud and eloquent in their professions of patriotism and independence: they declared, that they would concur in promoting an enquiry into past measures, and in enacting the necessary laws to secure the constitution from the practices of corruption. Had they been disposed to fulfil their promises, they might have erected a monument of immortality to themselves, and placed the liberties and prosperity of Britain on a foundation, which internal corruption and foreign violence might have vainly endeavoured to overthrow. But they had scarcely assumed the reins of power, before they displayed themselves in all the prominence of their real characters. It was soon discovered, that the principles and practices of the late administration, which had been the theme of constant reprobation among the Whigs, who had now been called to the government, were adopted in all their extent: on the re-introduction of the pension bill, lord Carteret, who had been, during the last year, one of its most strenuous advocates, voted against it; and a motion of lord Limerick, for enquiry into the conduct of affairs for the last twenty years, was lost by a majority of two voices, in consequence of the opposition of the court party; sir Robert Godschall, having moved for leave to bring in a bill to repeal the act for septennial parliaments, was opposed by Mr. Pulteney and Mr. Sandys, and the question passed in the negative. As some compensation to the people for these repeated disappointments, they permitted the committal of a bill for excluding certain officers from seats in the house of commons. They passed another for encouraging the linen manufacture; a third for regulating the trade of the plantations; and a fourth to prevent the marriage of lunatics. Lord Limerick, not discouraged by his former failure, brought forward a motion, on the 23rd of March, for an enquiry into the conduct of Robert, earl of Orford, for the last ten years of his administration: after a vehement debate, the motion was carried, and a resolution passed for the choice, by ballot, of a secret committee. They immediately proceeded to examine evidence, and discovered many acts of irregularity and corruption which, at that period of English history, had been unequalled for boldness and magnitude. It appeared that he had granted fraudulent contracts for paying the troops in the West Indies; that he employed iniquitous arts to influence elections; that as secret service-money during the last ten years, he had obtained £1,453,400 of the public money; that above £50,000 of this sum had been paid to authors and printers of newspapers and political tracts in defence of the ministry; and that on the very day which preceded his resignation, he had signed orders on the civil list revenues, for more than £30,000; but as the cash remaining in the exchequer did not exceed £14,000, he had raised the remaining part of the £30,000 by pledging the orders to a banker. The committee proceeded to make further progress in their scrutiny, when they were interrupted by the prorogation of parliament.

During these intestine commotions, the Imperial throne became vacant by the death of Charles VI. second son to the emperor Leopold, who succeeded his brother Joseph in 1711, and was the fifteenth emperor of that family. In order to preserve the succession of his hereditary dominions entire, Leopold obtained the guarantee of the pragmatic sanction, from the chief powers of Europe. In 1720, after the approbation of the council, it was sworn to by all the states of his hereditary dominions; in 1725, it was guaranteed by Spain, at the treaty of Vienna, on Naples and Sicily being ceded by the emperor, as an establishment for Don Carlos; in 1726 it was guaranteed by Russia, and soon afterwards confirmed by the Imperial diet; at the second treaty of Vienna, in 1731, it obtained the sanction of Great Britain; in 1732 it was confirmed by the king of Denmark and the states-general; in 1738 the elector of Saxony followed their example, on the emperor's promising to establish him on the throne of Poland; and in the same year, France also acquiesced in its guarantee, on condition of the cession of Lorraine. The courts of Versailles and Madrid were the first to violate their engagements, notwithstanding they had obtained for their concession many valuable and probably unexpected equivalents. Great Britain, Holland, and Russia continued faithful to their promise; while the electors of Bavaria, Cologne, Triers, and the Palatine, especially the two former, who naturally opposed every measure that defeated their claim to so powerful a succession, had frequently and openly expressed their dissatisfaction with the arrangements of the other powers, and their determination to resist every violation of justice, or of their legitimate pretensions. Immediately on the emperor's death, Maria Theresa, his eldest daughter, who had been married in 1736 to the duke of Lorraine, now grand duke of Tuscany, was proclaimed queen of Hungary and Bohemia, princess of Transilvania, archduchess of Austria, and universal successor to all the dominions of Austria, pursuant to the pragmatic sanction. The queen immediately notified her accession to the different courts of Europe, by most of whom she was acknowledged; and France, in particular, renewed her assurance in the strongest terms. The conduct of the duke of Bavaria was different: he returned her letters unopened, and advanced his claim to the Austrian succession, on the foundation of the will of Ferdinand I., which imported, that in case no heir should remain of any of the three brothers of the empire, the eldest archduchess, daughter to the said Ferdinand, who should be alive when the succession should be open, should succeed. Now the male line being extinct in Charles VI., the elector, by his descent from Anne, second daughter to Ferdinand I., claimed the succession as open by the will. On the part of the court of Vienna, it was maintained, that the succession was not open; the tenor of the will, according to the copy deposited in the Austrian archives, declaring "in case there shall be no lawful heir living of any of the three brothers." He afterwards asserted his right through his wife, daughter to the emperor Joseph; in which he was powerfully supported by the house of Bourbon.

The example of the duke of Bavaria was imitated by the king of Spain, who advanced his pretensions to the Imperial succession by virtue of his descent from Maria Theresa, wife of Lewis XIV. and daughter of Philip IV. He immediately formed an army in Catalonia, and made public preparations to invade Italy.

The young king of Prussia became a claimant of the principality of Silesia, as having formerly belonged to the family of Brandenburg, and soon assembled a numerous army. How futile are the pretensions of the greatest heroes to the proper virtues of their exalted station, or their imposing professions, when placed in competition with their interest and ambition! How vain is it to trust the promises, assurances, and most solemn pledges of arbitrary monarchs, and corrupted courts, when an opportunity presents itself of violating their pledges with advantage and impunity! It was not the conviction of obstructed right, or the legitimate feeling of resistance to the unjust assumption of the Imperial power, that excited the activity, and awakened the pretended indignation of the hostile powers; but the prospect of easy conquest over a defenceless and inexperienced female, the apparent certainty of triumph over her feminine timidity, and the expectation that she would resign the greater and fairer portion of her dominions to preserve the rest. Yet there remained one at least of the European nations, which, subject like every other political community to occasional error, and debased by obvious imperfection, still supported, in defiance of difficulty, calumny, and all the probabilities against success, the cause of justice, and of continental happiness. Attacked on every side, by France, Saxony, and Bavaria, England alone supported the rights of Maria Theresa with promptitude and activity. Her example was followed by Sardinia and Holland; and Russia at length acceded to the union in her favour. In the mean time, the king of Naples resolved to support the claims of his family to the Austrian dominions in Italy; his mother, the queen of Spain, had formed a plan for erecting these dominions into a monarchy for her second son, Don Philip, and a body of 15,000 men, being embarked at Barcelona, were transported to Orbitello, under the convoy of the united squadrons of France and Spain. While admiral Haddock, with twelve ships of the line, lay at anchor in the bay of Gibralter, the Spanish fleet passed the straits in the night, and was joined by the French squadron from Toulon. The British admiral, sailing from Gibralter, fell in with them in a few days, and found both squadrons drawn up in line of battle. As he bore down upon the Spanish fleet, the French admiral sent a flag of truce to inform him, that as the French and Spaniards were engaged in a joint expedition, he should be obliged to act in concert with his master's allies. This interposition prevented an engagement: admiral Haddock could not but perceive the absurdity of the protection, afforded by a pretended friend and legitimate neutral to the fleet of an enemy. But his force was much inferior to that of the combined fleets, and he was therefore obliged to proceed to Port Mahon, leaving the enemy to prosecute their voyage without molestation.

The king of England had ordered his ambassador, the earl of Hyndford, to join with Ginckle, the Dutch ambassador, in presenting an earnest remonstrance to the king of Prussia, against his continuing his troops in Silesia. The proposal was rejected by Frederic, and gave rise to a suspicion, that the English court had participated in a scheme of general confederacy against the king of Prussia, in which his dominions were to be partitioned out, and his Britannic majesty, as elector of Hanover, was to have his share of them. Though this intrigue was probably unknown to the court of England, and was certainly received with no encouragement, his Prussian majesty affected to believe the contrary, united himself closely with France, and espoused the cause of the elector of Bavaria.

The king of Prussia engaged the Austrians at Czaslaw, and defeated them; but instead of turning his victory to the general interest of the allies, he converted it to his own benefit; for he immediately concluded a peace with Austria, which left him in quiet possession of Upper and Lower Silesia, together with the country of Glatz. At the same time, the king of Poland concluded a treaty with the queen. The French were astonished and mortified by these treaties; they saw themselves abandoned by two principal allies, and were obliged to retreat under the walls of Prague; from which they were only enabled to escape by the skill and dexterity of Belleisle, who conducted the army through a hundred miles of the enemy's country, and brought them in the depth of winter, though harassed by a superior army of the Austrians, to the friendly ramparts of Agra.

Dispirited by the equivocal success of the operations at sea, the nation began to look with anxiety for an opportunity of retrieving the glory of England by some enterprise on land; and the views of the king according with the wishes of his people, it was determined to send a powerful force into the Netherlands, to join in the quarrels that were beginning on the continent. The king determined to conduct the undertaking in person: an army of 10,000 men was transported to Flanders, and the war with Spain became an object of secondary consideration. The policy of Britain, originally directed by the partiality of the sovereign to his electoral interests, but ultimately coinciding beyond the hopes of the court, or the anticipation of the people with the general interests of Europe, tended to retrieve the desperate situation of the queen of Hungary. The French were driven out of Bohemia. The general of the empress, prince Charles of Lorraine, at the head of a large army, invaded the dominions of Bavaria. Her rival, the nominal emperor, was obliged to fly before her, and being not only abandoned by his allies, but divested of his hereditary dominions, retired to Francfort, where he afterwards lived in obscurity. Though the French had begun the war under pretext of alliance to the duke, they did not relinquish hostile operations in consequence of his disasters, but persisted in sustaining of themselves the whole burden of the contest

The troops sent to the queen's assistance by England were commanded by the earl of Stair, an experienced general, who had learned the art of war under prince Eugene. His chief object was to effect a junction with the army of the queen, commanded by prince Charles, and thus to outnumber the enemy in the field. To prevent this junction, the French assembled an army of 50,000 men upon the Maine, under the command of marshal Noailles, who posted his troops on the east side of that river. The British forces, to the number of 40,000, pushed forward on the other side into a country, where they found themselves, by the precaution of the French, entirely destitute of provisions. The king of England arriving in the camp while the army was in this deplorable situation, he resolved on penetrating forward, to join 12,000 Hanoverians and Hessians, who had reached Hanau. With this view he decamped; but before his army had marched three leagues, he found himself inclosed on every side by the enemy, near the village of Dettingen. In this extremity he seemed to be deprived of every resource: if he engaged the enemy, it must be at the greatest disadvantage; if he remained inactive, his army must unavoidably starve; and a retreat was evidently impracticable. The impetuosity of the French troops relieved him from this embarrassment: they passed the defile which they should have been contented to guard; and, under the conduct of the duke de Gramont, their horse charged the English with great fury; but being received with intrepidity, they were obliged to make a precipitate retreat over the Maine, having sustained a loss of 5000 men. His Britannic majesty, with great personal courage, exposed himself to a severe fire of the enemy's cannon, and in the midst of the engagement encouraged the troops by his presence and example. The English obtained the honour of the day; but were obliged to leave the field of battle, which was taken possession of by the French. The joy occasioned by this victory, in the camp of the allies, received a considerable check by their being obliged to leave their killed and wounded on the field of battle, and proceed to a plain on the road to Hanau, where they lay all night under arms, while his majesty was obliged to take up his quarters at Hernstein. A shower of rain, which fell in the night-time, and continued till eight in the morning, proved fatal to many of the wounded; and all that lord Stair could do for their relief, was to send a trumpeter to marshal Noailles, acquainting him, that the king his master having thought proper to remove to Hanau, he had left an independent company in the field to take care of the wounded, who were strictly ordered to commit no hostilities; that therefore the marshal might send a detachment to bury his slain, and hoped that he would treat with humanity the wounded who had been left behind. It is to the honour of the French general, that he punctually complied with his lordship's request, by treating the wounded with the utmost tenderness and humanity. The day after the battle, the allied army arrived at Hanau, and were joined by 12,000 additional Hanoverians and Hessians. After this junction, lord Stair proposed to the king to pass the Maine, and again attack the French, but finding his advice disregarded, resigned his command. In October, the king of Great Britain returned to Hanover, and the army separated. The troops in British pay marched back to the Netherlands, and the rest took the route to their respective countries.

On the 25th of November, the great cause between James Annesley esq. and the earl of Anglesea was decided in the court of exchequer in Ireland, in favour of the former. It was proved, that Mr. Annesley was the son of the late lord Altham, and had been trepanned by his uncle, the earl of Anglesea, and sent into slavery in America, where he was discovered by admiral Vernon. He was sent home to prosecute his claims to the title and estates, which by this verdict he obtained, but died before the litigation was concluded, leaving his right to his children. The earl of Anglesea dying soon afterwards, the cause was removed, on an appeal, to the court of chancery; and, as we shall find hereafter, became the subject of long and intricate proceedings.

The English ministry had sent out a powerful squadron into the Mediterranean, to overawe those states, which might be inclined to lend assistance to France or Spain. This fleet had been conducted by Lestock; but admiral Matthews, though a younger officer, was sent out to take the chief command: in consequence of which a misunderstanding arose between them, and they soon had an opportunity of discovering their mutual animosity. The combined fleets of France and Spain, to the number of thirty-four sail, were seen off Toulon, and a signal was made by the English admiral to prepare for engaging. It happened that his signals were not perfectly exact: he had exhibited, at the same time, the signal for the line of battle, and the signal for engaging. This circumstance afforded Lestock a sufficient pretence for refusing to advance with alacrity; so that Matthews, after some vain attempts to engage the enemy in conjunction, resolved to engage 1744.

with his own division. One ship of the line, belonging to the Spanish squadron, struck to captain Hawke, but was next day burnt by the admiral's order. Captain Cornwall was killed in the action, after continuing to give command, even when his leg was shot off by a cannon-ball. The pursuit was continued for three days, at the end of which Lestock appeared to come up with some vigour: but Matthews now gave orders for discontinuing the pursuit, and sailed away to Port Mahon, to repair the damage he had sustained. The account of this transaction was received in England with equal surprise and discontent, and both admirals, on their return, were tried by a court martial. Matthews, who had fought with intrepidity, was declared for the future incapable of serving his majesty's navy; while Lestock, who had kept at a distance during the engagement, was acquitted with honour. So extraordinary a verdict, unjustified by evidence, and apparently influenced by no particular prepossession on the part of the court, presents a striking instance of human fallibility, and of the uncertainty of every decision, adopted at a moment of popular turbulence.

At the period when the expedition to the South Seas was first projected, a squadron was entrusted to the command of commodore Anson; which was destined to sail through the straits of Magellan, and steering northward along the coasts of Chili and Peru, to co-operate occasionally with admiral Vernon, across the isthmus of Darien; but the latter part of the plan was frustrated by the delays and mistakes of the ministry. When the season was too far advanced, the commodore set sail with five ships of the line, a frigate, two store ships, and about fourteen hundred men. Two of his large ships, having separated from him in a storm, before he weathered Cape Horn, took refuge at Rio Janeiro, from whence they proceeded to Europe. A frigate, commanded by captain Cheap, was shipwrecked on a distant island in the South Sea. Having met with a dreadful tempest, which dispersed the remainder of his fleet, the commodore arrived at Juan Fernandez, where he was joined by the Glocester, a ship of the line, a sloop, and a pink with provisions. With these remains of his squadron he made prize of several vessels, took and burned the little town of Payta, and set sail from the coast of Mexico to the Philippine Islands, in the passage to which the Glocester was abandoned and sunk. The other vessels had been destroyed for want of men to navigate them; so that nothing now remained but the commodore's own ship, the Centurion, and that but very indifferently manned. The crews had been horribly thinned by sickness; they sustained the utmost extremities of misery from the shattered condition of their ships, and were dreadfully afflicted with the scurvy, which was in some measure relieved on their arrival at the island of Tinian. Anson now placed all his hopes in taking one of those valuable Spanish ships, which trade from the Philippine Islands to Mexico. Only one or two of these vessels went on the voyage in the same year, and they were therefore very large, in order to carry a sufficiency of treasure, and proportionably strong for the purpose of defence. The commodore now prosecuted his voyage to China, where he ordered his vessel to be sheathed, and procured a reinforcement of sailors. On leaving Canton, he again directed his course towards Manilla, where the object of his pursuit actually fell into his hands, after an obstinate engagement. This prize, the Neustra Signora de Cobadonga, mounted sixty guns, and was manned by 500 sailors, twice the number of the crew of the Centurion. Anson returned home after an absence of three years, with his prize, of which the value was estimated at £313,000, exclusive of his other captures, which amounted to as much more. He was immediately elevated to the peerage.

In the mean time, the French proceeded in their operations with vigour. They opposed prince Charles, and interrupted his attempts to pass the Rhine. They gained also some successes in Italy, but their chief hopes were placed on a projected invasion of England. Cardinal Fleury was now dead, and cardinal Tencin, who succeeded him in power, was proud, enterprising, and turbulent. France, from the violence of the parliamentary disputes in England, had conceived an opinion that the people were ripe for revolt, and only awaited the presence of the Pretender to avow their sentiments. These prepossessions being encouraged by the Jacobite party in Great Britain, an invasion was determined upon; and Charles, the son of the old Pretender arrived at Paris, where he obtained an audience of the French king. This family had long been the dupes of France, but it was now imagined that the inclinations of the French court were decidedly in their favour. The troops destined for the expedition amounted to 15,000 men, whom it was proposed to embark at Dunkirk, and some others of the ports nearest to England, under the direction of the Pretender. The duke de Roqueville, with twenty ships of the line, was to see them safely landed; and the famous count Saxe was to command them when put on shore. But the whole project was disconcerted by the appearance of sir John Norris, who with a superior force advanced to attack them. The French fleet was thus obliged to put back; and being frustrated in the hope of a sudden descent, the cabinet proceeded to an open declaration of war.

While preparations were making, by all the continental powers, for a bloody and vigorous campaign, the emperor Charles VII. died at Munich on the 20th of January, an event which changed the aspect of affairs in Germany, and considerably affected the rest of Europe. The misfortunes of this monarch, which so deeply impaired his health, were owing to his fatal attachment to France. The grand duke of Tuscany, husband to the queen of Hungary, was declared emperor in his stead; and, notwithstanding this event, the belligerent powers continued to support the quarrel with unabated animosity. In the Netherlands, the operations of the allied army were far from successful. The French had assembled an army of 20,000 men, the command of which was given to count Saxe, natural son to the late king of Poland, who had acquired great experience in war. Having long been a soldier of fortune, he had, in the beginning of these commotions, offered his services to several crowns, and among others to that of Great Britain; but his offers were rejected. The English were now commanded by the duke of Cumberland, who, though possessed of bravery and talent, could not be expected to equal his antagonists in military skill, and was far inferior in the number of his troops. The French, therefore, bore down all before them, besieged Fribourg, and invested the strong city of Tournay. On the 19th of April, the duke marched from Brussels to stop the progress of the assailants. He continued his march to Soignies, where on the 24th, in a general council of war, it was resolved to advance towards the enemy, as the relief of the city was of the last importance. On the 28th, having repulsed some advanced guards, they took post at Maulbrey, in view of the enemy, with the wood of Leuse on the left wing. Orders were then given that no man should stir out of the camp on pain of death, while the allied generals reconnoitred the enemy, who were covered by a rivulet on the left, and copses and hedges on the right, lined with their grassines, and supported by several squadrons from the main body. They had the village of St. Antoine on the right, and the town of Fontenoy in their front. Both armies continued in this situation during the night, and orders were given that the main body should march at two in the morning and join the vanguard, to bring the enemy to a general engagement. The following dispositions were made for the attack. Prince Waldeck, with the Dutch troops composing the left wing, to undertake the reduction of the village of Fontenoy; brigadier Ingoldsby, with four battalions, was ordered to attack a masked battery, at the verge of the wood above the village of Vezon; while general Ligonier was to attack the trenches, with the British and Hanoverian infantry, covered by the cavalry, under sir James Campbell. This brave general, being carried off by a cannon-ball, left his part for some time defective, and the infantry exposed to the enemy's batteries; till his royal highness ordered up seven pieces of cannon at the head of the foot-guards, which soon silenced the enemy's moving guns. The army being obliged to pass through three narrow defiles, occupied from four till nine o'clock, to form themselves as they advanced in order of battle. The troops were then ordered to advance to the different points of attack as rapidly as possible: lord Ligonier, assisted by lord Albemarle, and count Zastrow, bore down all before him, and took possession of the French trenches; but the Dutch miscarrying in the attack on Fontenoy, though supported by two British battalions, exposed the left flank of lord Ligonier to an incessant cannonade, while, on the other hand, the battery to be attacked by general Ingoldsby was not even attempted; a circumstance which also exposed the right flank of his lordship, and left him, though in possession of the enemy's works, exposed to a continual discharge of 200 cannon. To avoid this cross-fire, it was judged necessary to retire from the trenches, and to rally the troops, in the expectation of exciting the Dutch to another attack; but on advancing a second time they acted as before, notwithstanding the British and Hanoverians retook possession of the trenches they had previously occupied. The duke of Cumberland, in this emergency, placed himself at the head of Ligonier's horse, and advanced through the hottest of the fire towards the right flank, which the Irish brigades in the French service embraced the opportunity of attacking before he could come up; for having poured down upon the right, supported by their whole army, he was obliged, from the rapid decrease of his numbers, to retire and form his troops; it being evident that no dependence could be placed on his allies. About three o'clock in the afternoon, a general retreat was ordered; to favour which, such prudent dispositions were made, that the enemy, on the severe repulse of the regiment of Noailles, by a body of Hanoverian horse, under major-general Zastrow, thought proper to drop the pursuit, being entirely broken, with the loss of thirty-two officers. The allies marched in regular order from the field, having posted some regiments of foot and squadrons of horse to secure the retreat of the main army, which encamped at night under the cannon of Aeth. The allied army left upon the field of battle about 12,000 men, and the loss of the French was nearly equal.

In the mean time, the attention of the English was diverted from the continent to an occurrence which more nearly affected the tranquillity of the kingdom. In our own dominions was about to be kindled a civil war, which, notwithstanding the temporary alarm, distress, and inconvenience, to which it gave occasion, cemented more firmly the union of the nation and the government. The threat of an invasion from France had roused the indignation of all classes, who burned with resentment against the Pretender, and against the enemy who had supplied him with arms, and assisted him by its council; nor were the people of England ever less disposed to receive him with favour, than at the moment he selected for his final attempt.

A change in the ministry had occurred, at a moment when such a circumstance was singularly propitious to the nation. Lords Harrington and Chesterfield and Mr. Pelham being appointed to the chief departments in the government, the operations of war were no longer thwarted by a turbulent opposition. Admirals Rowley and Warren had retrieved the honour of the British flag, and made several rich captures at sea. About the same time, a bold and enterprising project was formed, by several public-spirited gentlemen in New England, for dispossessing France of the island of Cape Breton, as it appeared to them that this possession afforded to the enemy, by the increase of the fishery in those seas, not only an inexhaustible source of wealth, but a constant nursery for able seamen. In consequence of the royal assent, orders were transmitted to his majesty's squadron in the West Indies, under commodore Warren, to sail for Canso, where, on his arrival, about the end of April, he found the American troops encamped. On the 29th, they embarked in the transports, and with a squadron of ten men arrived the next day off Louisburgh. The transports were ordered into Gaberous bay, a little to the southward of the city, where that evening the troops were landed, under cover of 100 men, who bravely repulsed a party of 150 of the enemy, who had marched down to oppose the descent, with considerable loss. The troops, as they moved towards the city, having set some houses on fire, so intimidated the enemy, that they evacuated their grand battery of thirty guns, and with it a proportionable quantity of stores, which was instantly taken possession of by M. Vaughan, with a body of the troops. The enemy, sensible of their error, soon rallied to recover it; but were as soon obliged to retire to the town in confusion. This event secured the approaches on the land-side, which greatly contributed to the reduction of the place: in the mean time, the fleet continued cruising off the fort, and took the Vigilant, a French man of war, with some transports destined for the relief of the place. On the 26th of May, the island battery was attacked by 200 men, who were repulsed with the loss of 152, killed and prisoners. This misfortune appeared trifling compared with the privations and distresses to which the troops were subjected; as they were obliged to act the parts of man and horse, drawing their heavy cannon and mortars on sledges, through ways almost impassable, being all day up to their knees in swampy shoals, and exposed at night in miserable tents to foggy damps, which occasioned so extensive a sickness and mortality, that 1500 were disabled for service at one time. They supported their distresses, however, with exemplary resolution; and after the town had been greatly damaged by the bombs, and a general assault had been ordered, M. Chaubrun, the governor, consented to capitulate on the 17th of June. The acquisition of this important settlement, to the crown of Great Britain, delivered New England from her fears, secured Acadia, retained in awe the neighbouring Indians, and restored the advantages of the Newfoundland fishery. The place had not been many days in the hands of the English, before three valuable prizes appeared off the harbour, conceiving it to be in the possession of the French, and were brought in as prizes;—an act that could scarcely be justified, as it appears to be an indispensible stipulation of the law of nations, that the flag of the power to which it belongs, should be conspicuously exhibited from every fortress.

CHAPTER XI.

GEORGE II.

[1744 to 1746.]

THE principal powers of Europe being now engaged in the wars on the continent; the kingdom being exhausted of troops by the necessity of augmenting the army in Flanders; and George II. being absent on a visit to his German dominions; the Pretender selected the opportunity to make a vigorous and final effort to regain the crown of England. Charles Edward, though educated in a luxurious court, was uninfected by its effeminacy. He was enterprising and ambitious; but, from inexperience or incapacity, unequal to the importance of the enterprise. He had been for some time excited to the attempt by the multitude of adherents who surrounded him, and was taught to believe that the nation, unable to sustain the load of taxes by which it was oppressed, would espouse his cause with enthusiasm and rapidity. He was furnished by Mr. Walsh, a wealthy merchant of St. Maloes, with a frigate of eighteen guns, well equipped, and a considerable supply of money and stores, and set sail on the 14th of July from port St. Lazare, accompanied by several of his adherents, the chief of whom were the marquis of Tullibardine, sir Thomas Sheridan, colonel Sullivan, George Kelly, esq. and Ray Stuart, and was joined off Belleisle by the Elizabeth, a French man of war of sixty-six guns, furnished with ammunition and military stores, and suspected to convey a large quantity of treasure, for the purposes of bribery and of paying the troops. They continued their course till the 20th, when, falling in with a fleet of merchant-ships, convoyed by four English men of war: the frigate bore away, while the Elizabeth waited for the Lion, captain Brett, and an engagement ensued, which lasted nine hours; in which the Elizabeth sustained the loss of her captain and sixty-four men killed, and 136 wounded. With great difficulty she returned to Brest. The frigate continued her course, and having arrived safely at the Western Islands of Scotland, cruised for some days between Ulst and Barra; and losing all hopes of being joined by the Elizabeth, stood in for the coast of Lochaber, and landed the Pretender and his companions at Mingarie castle, between the isles of Sky and Mull. Some of his friends, having immediate intelligence of his arrival, flocked to pay their compliments, and joined him with a party of the Camerons, Macdonalds, Macphersons, Maclaughlins, Mackinnons, and Stuarts, who formed a body of about 2000 men. The chief of the Camerons being indisposed, Miss Jenny Cameron marched at the head of the clan, appeared in the camp with her sword drawn, in a sea-green habit, and addressed the Pretender to this effect: "Here are men devoted to your service, who, though headed by a woman, you will find have nothing womanish about them." On the 12th of August, Charles displayed his banner with the motto Tandem Triumphans, inviting the clans to repair to the royal standard, and assuring them of liberty, property, and protection. Many of the Highlanders hastened to his standard, and the first camp of the rebels was formed in the neighbourhood of Fort William, from whence they found means to surprise two companies of foot, between Fort William and Fort Augustus. The king's troops made an obstinate defence till their ammunition was spent, when they were obliged, to the number of 80, to surrender at discretion. In a few days after, captain Swectman was surprised by a party of the rebels; and being brought before the Pretender, he liberated him on parole, and gave him one of his manifestoes, with a pass for his security, signed Charles P. Custos Regni.

The first accounts of the Pretender's progress were received with incredulity; but their authenticity being confirmed by the dispatches of the duke of Argyle, the lords of the admiralty issued a proclamation, offering a reward of £30,000 for the apprehension of the Pretender, and dispatched a courier to lord Harrington, then in Holland, for the purpose of acquainting his majesty with the events which had occurred.

In the mean time, lieutenant-general sir John Cope, who commanded in Scotland, received orders to assemble what troops he could to oppose their progress; while general Blakeney defended the fortress of Stirling, and general Guest the castle and town of Edinburgh, the only places which were at that time tenable. Sir John Cope took post near Stirling, where his situation was not only commodious for covering the town, but for receiving reinforcements to quell the insurrection in its infancy. The general, however, adopted a sudden resolution of decamping and advancing, whether with a design to attack the enemy, or expecting to be joined by some well affected clans, is uncertain. On his arrival at Delwhinny, he received intelligence that the rebels were advanced to the chain near the pass of Carryarick, and intended to wait for him in that position. The post, however, was so strong that it was pronounced impracticable to attempt it, without risking the loss of the army, which at this moment it was of importance to preserve, as no other troops had been collected to reinforce them, or to retard the progress of the enemy. A council of war was held, in which it was debated, whether it was advisable to return to Stirling, or proceed to Inverness. The former was objected to, as it was evident the rebels could reach Stirling before them, having at their command a much nearer way, by the head of Loch Ranagh; and as they would be able to seize and break down the bridge at Hynnachin, and thus cut off a retreat, the water of Tumble being at this time so rapid as to be no where fordable, and the necessity of obtaining provisions rendering it expedient to hasten to Inverness. By the march of the general northward, the south of Scotland was wholly exposed to the incursions of the invaders, who did not fail to improve the opportunity. They immediately took possession of Blair Castle, where they stopped the post-boy, and examined his letters. They then proceeded to Perth, which they entered on the 4th of September. The provost and magistrates, on their appearance, departed the town; but new magistrates being appointed, they proclaimed the Pretender at the cross. They continued at Perth till the 17th, during which time they were considerably reinforced by several of the nobility and gentry with their clans, and having sent a party of 200 of Clanronald's men to Dundee, they proclaimed their king, levied the public money, and brought a vessel they found in the harbour round to Perth. The duke of Perth, and the marquis of Tullibardine, were very active in raising their tenants; the former of these noblemen, being refused by two of his tenants, whom he had requested to join the Pretender, shot them dead upon the spot; an act of atrocity which so intimidated the rest, that they marched with him, to the number of 400, to join the Pretender's forces. The Pretender first directed his march towards Glasgow, but suddenly changed his route, and proceeded in the direction of Edinburgh. The magistrates of that city, on sir John Cope's marching northward, seemed to exert themselves against the impending danger, by entering into a voluntary subscription for raising 1000 men for their defence. A regiment of volunteers, consisting chiefly of gentlemen, was formed, reparations made, cannon planted, and barricadoes erected at the gates, so that from the first appearance of loyalty a vigorous defence might have been expected; but the advance of the rebel army seemed to intimidate their resolution. Two regiments of dragoons, with the volunteers and city guard, retired from Cerstorphine, where they were posted on the approach of the rebel vanguard. A council was called, to deliberate on the safety of the city; and the well affected being mostly under arms, the Jacobites had a great majority, and urged the necessity of a mutual compromise. A letter was produced, signed Charles P. Regent, and a deputation was sent out to meet him; which had scarcely passed the gates, before intelligence was received, that sir John Cope, with the king's troops, were arrived at Dunbar. The deputies were immediately ordered to be recalled; but before the message reached them, they had entered the camp of the rebels at Grey's-Mills, and returned with a peremptory demand of their compliance by two o'clock next morning, otherwise they might expect to be treated as enemies. Another deputation was sent to gain time, and after some debate, whether the dragoons should enter the city or not, it passed in the negative. The dragoons, therefore, immediately proceeded to join general Cope. No orders being given what part to act, they delivered their arms into the castle. The governor issued orders for the cannon also to be deposited in the castle; but his commands being disregarded, they fell into the hands of the rebels. When the hackney-coach returned with the deputies, and entered at the Nether-bow gate, 1000 highlanders, under Sullivan and Lochyel, rushed in and took possession of the city; a circumstance so unaccountable, that the lord provost was suspected of treason, and soon after taken into custody. General Guest, in the mean time, having secured the castle, removed the bank and the effects of the principal inhabitants into that fortress, to the great disappointment of the chevalier. General Cope had arrived at Inverness on the 29th of August, where he obtained the necessary refreshments; and, being joined by several highlanders, continued his march to Aberdeen, where, having ordered transports, he embarked his troops for the road of Leith, but was obliged, by contrary winds, to land them on the 16th of September at Dunbar. Had he arrived a few days sooner, he might probably have saved Edinburgh; but on his being joined by general Foulkes he was informed of that event, and on the 19th he decamped from Dunbar, with an intent to expel the rebels and repossess the town. The army passed the night near Haddington, on the verge of Glaidsmuir, and continued in the morning their march to Edinburgh. On receiving intelligence that the rebel army was advancing, a detachment was sent forward to reconnoitre, which repelled the vanguard of the enemy from the village of Tranent. The army immediately drew up on an advantageous piece of ground, with the hamlets of Preston Pans and Cockney in their flanks; covered by Seaton house on their left; and those of Bankton and Grange to the right; the village of Tranent in their front, secured by a large fosse; and the sea in their rear. The volunteers and militia had no share in the action, as it was imagined that they might confuse the regular troops. The Pretender placed himself, in his highland dress, at the head of his troops, and brandishing his sword, exclaimed theatrically,

"My sword I draw, my scabbard I throw by; which was answered by a loud huzza, and "that they would soon find scabbards enough." In a council of war, it was determined to attack the king's troops early in the morning. At three o'clock, three columns of chosen highlanders advanced with so much impetuosity on the right flank of the English, where the train of artillery was posted with a guard of 100 men, that they broke the guard, seized the cannon, and by feats of irregular bravery carried dismay and destruction into the ranks of the enemy. Every endeavour was made, by general Cope and the rest of the officers, to rally the troops, but in vain. Colonel Gardiner, being deserted by his regiment, dismounted; and placing himself at the head of the foot, fell greatly regretted, and worthy of a better fate. The highlanders immediately gave themselves up to plunder, which afforded the king's troops an opportunity of rallying, and of attacking them in the midst of their disorder. But such was the confusion and panic of the dragoons, that all efforts and exhortations were ineffectual; and the general, perceiving that further conflict was hopeless, retreated in the direction of Berwick, where he arrived the next day. The loss of the king's troops, in the battle of Preston Pans, amounted to 500 killed, 1500 prisoners, including 83 officers, and all their baggage, tents, money, and ammunition. The loss of the rebels consisted of no more than four officers and 80 men. They immediately returned to Edinburgh in triumph, marching the wounded and prisoners in procession through the streets, and playing their favourite air, "The king shall enjoy his own again."
"A useless burden till I reign or die."

This unexpected instance of success induced many stragglers to flock to the chevalier's standard, and awed the inhabitants of the districts, through which the army passed, into the appearance of attachment and submission. Except the castle of Edinburgh, Stirling, Fort William, and Inverness, they were in fact masters of all Scotland; the three former were blocked up, and the troops in the latter obliged to act on the defensive. The lord president, however, by his alertness, succeeded in raising twenty independent companies for the protection of Inverness; and he was joined in October by lord Loudon, who received a commission to command what force could be assembled in that neighbourhood. These arrangements tended considerably to depress the hopes of the disaffected in that quarter, and induced lord Lovat, in particular, to temporise as long as possible. On receiving a letter from the lord president, animadverting on the ingratitude and folly of his conduct, in sending his son to join the Pretender, advising him to recal him immediately, as the only means of securing the favour of the government, he answered, that it was hard he should suffer for the disaffection of his son, in which he had no part; that his desire was to live peaceably under the government; but if he was attacked, he had 600 of his clan at home, who would defend him to the last extremity. Soon afterwards this wary hypocrite threw off the mask, and declared openly for the Pretender's interest, in which he had long been secretly engaged.

The militia was now drawn out; three battalions of the guards, and seven marching regiments, which had just arrived from Flanders, were ordered to march northward, and assemble under marshal Wade. They were soon afterwards joined by four Dutch regiments. Many of the principal nobility obtained commissions for levying regiments in their respective counties; one general spirit of attachment to the existing government appeared to animate the people. The zeal of the archbishop of York was eminently conspicuous; and under his auspices an association was formed, and £40,000 raised by subscription for the support of government: and the example was followed in many other cities and counties of the kingdom.

The parliament met on the 16th of October, and his majesty informed the two houses, in his speech from the throne, that the unnatural rebellion, broken out in Scotland, had occasioned his calling them together sooner than usual in order to have their timely advice and assistance for its suppression; observing, that during the course of his reign, as he had made the laws of the land the rule of his government, and in all his actions consulted the preservation of the civil and religious liberties of his people, it was the more astonishing, that any of his protestant subjects should be deluded into measures introductory to popery and arbitrary power. Warm addresses were returned by both houses, expressive of their deep and grateful sense of his majesty's just and mild administration, their strong abhorrence and detestation of the rebellion formed against his person and government, and their unalterable and firm resolution to support, at the hazard of their lives and fortunes, his rightful title to the crown, and the constitution established in church and state.

The speedy concurrence and loyalty of the parliament, diffused throughout the people a general spirit of confidence and satisfaction, which was increased by the arrival of the British troops, under the command of the duke of Cumberland, from Flanders, and of four troops of horse, Bland's dragoons, a battalion of the guards, and eleven battalions of foot. Some of these were encamped near Dartford, in the south of England, to prevent an invasion of the French troops, as a diversion in favour of the Pretender; others were stationed along the coast; while admiral Vernon lay in the channel, with a strong fleet, to watch the motions of the enemy. The alarm occasioned by these precautions was so serious and so general, that the bank, in order to evade the extraordinary pressure occasioned by the fears of its creditors, was compelled to issue a declaration, that all future payments would be made in silver alone; a measure, which considerably retarded the urgency and eagerness of the various claimants.

In the mean time, the young Pretender, elated with success, possessed himself of the antient palace of the Scottish monarchs, where he assembled a court, and assumed the formality and magnificence of acknowledged sovereignty. In this gleam of prosperity, he was joined by several reinforcements from the earl of Kilmarnock, lords Elcho, Pitsligo, Balmerino, Glenbucket, and Ogilvie. Nothing was now wanting to render him master of Scotland, but the castle of Edinburgh, in which the regalia of the kingdom, the bank, and all its other treasures were deposited. On the 29th of September, he directed the communication between the castle and the city to be cut off. General Guest had hitherto refrained from firing on the rebels, being unwilling to damage the town, or involve the innocent in common destruction with the guilty; but as hostilities were now unavoidable, a battery from the castle was opened upon them, by which twenty persons were killed, and several houses reduced to ruins. A resolute fellow, named Taylor, engaged to make himself master of the castle with 30 men: in the attempt he was taken prisoner, with most of his party; and the general, finding that if the blockade continued the garrison would soon want provisions, commanded a sally to be made under cover of the half-moon battery, by which they were enabled to throw up a trench between the town and the castle. On the next day, having posted a body of men behind the parapet, he cleared the street, obtained a considerable supply of provisions, and was pursued on retiring by a party, of which the object was to prevent his retreat, and to capture the intrenchments; but the detachment, cautiously withdrawing into the garrison, exposed the enemy to a smart cannonade, which obliged them to retire with considerable loss. From that time the communication was restored, and the garrison plentifully supplied.

The chevalier exerted his new authority, by levying contributions in all parts of the kingdom; his demands were 6000 pair of shoes, 4000 targets, and 1000 tents; to furnish which, a tax of 2*s*. 6*d*. in the pound was imposed on all landlords of houses, on pain of military execution, by which he raised £15,000. He obtained £7000 for goods which he had seized at his majesty's warehouse at Leith; extorted a considerable sum of money from Mr. Erskine, a wealthy brewer, and (as his forces suspected him to be well affected to the government) destroyed his furniture, and purloined his most valuable articles of plate and family remembrance. Mr. Erskine implored the chevalier in person for relief, assuring him, that such methods would never thrive with him, adding, "The good man George takes part of my money, but verily thou takest all, and thou may'st as well take away my life as the drop that supports it;" to which the Pretender replied, that "as Mr. Erskine was many years indebted to his father's revenue of excise, he was bound in conscience to pay the arrears." A demand being made on the city of Glasgow for £15,000, the forbearance of the chevalier was propitiated by the immediate payment of 5000 guineas. The common apology of Charles consisted in the assurance, "that in the present emergency his necessities required what he demanded, that the persons temporarily injured should obtain ample redress when the present tumult of events had subsided, and that the day of their deliverance was at hand." The ravages of the foraging parties and detached patroles were still more extensive and exhorbitant, and obliged the unfortunate villagers and cottagers to fly from place to place, for their own safety and the security of their scanty property.

The expectations of the Pretender's friends were still further elated, by the arrival at Montrose of four French vessels, with a supply of cannon, military stores, and money, accompanied by Mr. Boyer, who acted in the capacity of French ambassador, and who assured them, that a powerful diversion would be effected in their favour in the south of England, and that repeated reinforcements would also join them in Scotland, till the contest should be decided. They immediately planted a battery at Alloa, to secure the passage of the Forth, and cover the landing of their stores, while they advanced detachments towards Stirling, which were frequently harassed by the vigilance of general Blakeney, and at length completely dispersed.

Encouraged by the first appearance of success, the chevalier determined, about the end of October, to march for England by the route of Carlisle. Warrants were issued for the detention of all horses and carriages; and the army, which consisted of about 10,000 men, being reviewed on the 28th, proceeded on the 1st of November in the direction of Carlisle. On the 6th, their vanguard entered England, and on the 9th was followed by the whole army, which crossed the Eden four miles below Carlisle, and established its quarters on Brough side. In the evening, a body of their hussars, having advanced to reconnoitre the town, were obliged to retire before the cannon of the garrison; but in the morning they drew a line of circumvallation, and invested the city on all sides. Mr. Patterson, the mayor, received a letter from the chevalier, in which he required him to surrender the place; with menaces of punishment in case of his refusal, and a demand of a definitive answer within two hours. On receiving no answer, the rebels retired to Brampton, and at the earnest persuasion of the duke of Perth, who expressed his suspicions of the sincerity of the French court, and enforced the necessity of taking Carlisle as necessary to the reputation of their arms, they determined to attempt the siege. The time from the 2nd to the 13th was occupied in providing themselves with scaling ladders, fascines, and carriages; and on the last of these days at noon, they appeared for the second time before the town. Colonel Durand, in the mean time, made all the preparations requisite for a vigorous defence; and being supported by the Cumberland and Westmoreland militias, with a few invalids, declared that he thought the garrison tenable against a better enemy than the rebel host, and that he was resolved to hold out to the last extremity. Accordingly the fire from the walls was renewed with great vigour; but it being found, the next day, that the rebels had broken ground to erect a battery, the magistrates thought proper to capitulate; on which the militia dispersed to their respective abodes, and colonel Durand, having but 70 men left, and these invalids, was obliged to evacuate the fortress, having previously spiked nine pieces of cannon. The town was entered on the 15th by the duke of Perth; on the 19th the chevalier made his public entry, under a general discharge of artillery, and was received by several of the inhabitants with every demonstration of joy.

Marshal Wade, who had assembled his army near Doncaster, arrived at Newcastle on the 19th of October, from whence he proceeded, on the 6th of November, towards Carlisle, through roads rendered almost impassable by the snow. They reached Ovington on the next day, and pushed forward to Hexham, near which place there was a camp marked out, and great care taken by the inhabitants to furnish them with straw and large fires. Here marshal Wade received intelligence of the surrender of Carlisle, and deeming it impossible to overtake the enemy, determined to retreat to Newcastle, where he returned on the 22nd.

The surrender of Carlisle diffused a general panic throughout the nation, and stimulated the ministry to the utmost possible exertion. Orders were issued for forming an army of 10,000 men, in Staffordshire, under sir John Ligonier, who had under him as lieutenant-generals, the duke of Richmond and general Sinclair.

The rebels, exhilirated by their unexpected success in obtaining the northern key of the kingdom, finding that the inclemency of the weather retarded the march of marshal Wade's army, and expecting the aid of a powerful descent from France, conceived the bold design of attempting to possess the capital of England. A garrison of 200 men being left in Carlisle, under Mr. Hamilton, their main body, consisting of about 7500 men, with sixteen field pieces, proceeded on the 20th of November to Penrith, which the Pretender entered on the next day, marching on foot, at the head of a considerable body, in the highland dress. The rebels proclaimed the Pretender in all the towns through which they marched, and levied the excise. At Manchester they beat up for recruits, and formed a regiment, the command of which was given to colonel Townley. Among other individuals, they were joined by a clergyman, named Coppack, who received from the Pretender the title of bishop of Carlisle. While they continued their march with great rapidity, the maritime towns, particularly those of Whitehaven and Liverpool, carried all their valuable effects on board the shipping lying in the harbours, in order to put to sea on their first approach. The corporation of Liverpool, sacrificing their own safety to the defence of the country, sent the regiment they had raised to join lord Cholmondeley and his men; who, apprehending that the rebels intended a descent on Wales, ordered the bridges at Warrington, Stockport, &c. on the Mersey, to be broken down; which retarded their progress, while the army of the king obtained leisure to form at Stone.

The rebels continued their route, but in so indecisive a manner, that it could not be easily determined, whether they intended to make an irruption into England or into Wales. On the 30th they advanced towards Stockport and Knutsford; near the former, the young Pretender waded the river in his highland dress, with the water up to his middle, at the head of his men. On the 1st of December his whole army rendezvoused at Macclesfield, and sent an advanced party to Ashbury, on the road to Newcastle-under-Line. On the next day they resumed their march in two columns, one of which entered Congleton, the other passed by Gawsworth.

In the mean time, the duke of Cumberland arrived at Lichfield, to take the chief command of the army assembled in that neighbourhood; which he found posted in such a manner, to observe the motions of the enemy, as did great credit to the conduct of sir John Ligonier. He ordered Kingston's horse and Bland's dragroons to advance to Newcastle, to join two battalions of foot, that were stationed there to observe the enemy; on whose approach they were to retire to Stone, and rejoin the army. Two battalions of the guards arrived by forced marches from London; and on the same day the army encamped in the neighbourhood of Stone, in order to support the advanced posts, if attacked. The detachment stationed at Newcastle was alarmed by the approach of the enemy's vanguard, and retired to Stone, where the whole army was drawn up in the night, in order to receive them. In this position they continued until the noon of the ensuing day, when advice was received, that they had turned to the left in two columns, and had taken the route of Leek and Ashbourne in their way to Derby; a movement which sufficiently indicated their intention of proceeding to London. It was resolved, therefore, to march the troops to Northampton for the purpose of intercepting them; but, on the arrival of the duke of Cumberland at Coventry, he obtained intelligence of their halting at Derby, and he therefore commanded the troops to encamp on Merridan common to observe their motions.

The tardiness of marshal Wade was one of the causes which chiefly contributed to the rapid advance of the rebels. Between the 1st and the 15th of December he had only advanced about eighty miles; a delay which prevented him, not only from impeding their progress in the direction of Derby, but from arriving in time to intercept their retreat.

The consternation of the capital was great and general. The rebels had now advanced to the centre of the kingdom, within one hundred miles of their intended destination, and were promised a powerful and immediate accession of strength from the friendship of the French king. Such indeed was the exultation of the Jacobites, and the alarm of the friends of the establishment, that had the chevalier taken advantage of the general confusion, and proceeded immediately to London, he might have encouraged his secret friends to a declaration of their sentiments, and impressed the opposite party with a sensation of fatal and universal timidity. The government took advantage of their irresolution, to adopt such measures as effectually secured the national safety. A camp was formed on Finchley common, where the royal standard was to be erected; the militia were held in constant readiness, and double guards posted at the city gates, for the purpose of securing all suspected persons; the gentlemen of the law, headed by the lord chancellor and judges, entered into a loyal association; and having waited on his majesty at Kensington, in 200 coaches, were graciously received. The same enthusiasm and spirit of association pervaded all ranks and professions, and £20,000 was raised by subscription, for furnishing the army with necessaries, to protect it against the inclemency of the season.

The chevalier received from his friends in London regular intelligence of these demonstrations of public spirit; and he therefore assembled a council of war, in which it was debated, whether the army should proceed to London, in defiance of every obstacle, or to return to Scotland, while a retreat was possible. Many of the chiefs of the clans advocated the former resolution, observing, that the capital was the first object of military enterprise, and that by approaching it, whatever might be the success of ulterior operations, they would discourage their enemies, and exhilirate the confidence of their friends; that by a retreat they would lose at once their reputation and their discipline, and what was worse, their spirits; that the calamities of war would follow them, and lay waste their country. The lowlanders and the French were anxious to return to Scotland without delay, in order to join lord Dalrymple, and with the forces assembled there to effect the recovery of Edinburgh, and by that event be enabled to wait till succours could arrive from abroad. They determined on the latter of these alternatives; and having levied the public money, and furnished their followers with shoes, during their stay at Derby, they abandoned that town on the 6th of December, and resumed their march in the direction of Ashbourne, from whence they proceeded with such rapidity, that on the 9th their advanced guard entered Manchester, where they raised contributions to the amount of £2500, and, continuing their march with great expedition, arrived on the 12th at Preston.

His royal highness, on intelligence of their retreat, set out on the 7th from the camp at Merridan, with all the horse, and 1000 volunteers, leaving sir John Ligonier to command the army in his absence. The badness of the road materially impeded his progress, so that he did not arrive at Macclesfield until the 10th. Marshal Wade, in the mean time, had arrived at Preston on the same day in which it was evacuated by the rebels. He was joined that evening by the forces of the duke, and it was determined to pursue the enemy in the morning, in order to bring them to action before they reached Scotland. Their design was interrupted, however, by an express from London, with orders to hold the army in readiness to march southward; and the rebels, taking advantage of the delay, gained a day's march on their pursuers. This order was occasioned by intelligence received from admiral Vernon, that the enemy had put to sea; but on the next day a counter-order arrived, and the army continued their pursuit. On the 18th his royal highness, at the head of several horse and dragoons, came up with their rear-guard at the village of Clifton, where they had lined the ways and hedges with a body of their best troops, while the Pretender, and the remaining part of his army, continued their retreat through Clifton. Their intention was to let the duke, with the advanced guard, pass into the ambuscade, then to surround him and carry him off, before the troops could come up to his relief. His royal highness had approached so near, before he was apprized of his danger, that his footman was taken prisoner, and he himself was indebted for his escape to the intelligence of Thomas Savage, a poor inhabitant of the village, who, addressing him with bluntness, enabled him to defeat their intention, and to dislodge them with great precipitation. A skirmish succeeded; in which the rebels sustained a loss of about 70 prisoners, the duke taking possession of the village. Early in the morning they proceeded to Penrith, where their famine and their necessities were acceptably relieved by the food and accommodations provided for the rebels, who had hastily proceeded to Carlisle; and having reinforced the garrison to secure their retreat, passed the Eden and Solway, and in two columns entered Scotland. The duke of Cumberland soon afterwards invested Carlisle with his whole army. After an interchange of messages between the duke and the governor, in which the former declared that he could not negotiate with rebels, and that all the terms he could or would grant to the garrison of Carlisle were, that they should not be put to the sword, but reserved for his majesty's pleasure, the gates were delivered up, and general Bligh took possession of the town, with 1000 foot and 120 horse. The rebel officers were committed prisoners to the castle, and the men secured in the jail and the cathedral.

1746. The young chevalier proceeded by the way of Dumfries to Glasgow, from which city he exacted severe contributions, on account of its attachment to the government, for whose service it had raised a regiment of 900 men, under the command of the earl of Hume. Quitting Glasgow, he advanced towards Stirling, and was joined by a small body of forces, which had been assembled by lord Lewis Gordon and lord John Drummond, brothers to the dukes of Gordon and Perth. He now invested the castle of Stirling, commanded by general Blakeney; but general Hawley, who lay near Edinburgh with a considerable detachment of the royal army, undertook to raise the siege, and advanced towards the rebel army as far as Falkirk. After two days were passed in mutually examining each other's strength, the rebels, being impatient to engage, were led in high spirits to attack the king's army. The chevalier, who was in the front line, gave the signal to attack; and by the first fire Hawley's forces were put into confusion. The horse retreated with so much precipitation, that they fell upon their own infantry; while the rebels, pursuing the advantage they had gained, put the greater part of the royal army to an immediate flight. The latter retired in confusion to Edinburgh, leaving the rebels in possession of their tents, baggage, and artillery

The duke of Cumberland had, in the mean time, put himself at the head of the royal forces remaining at Edinburgh, which consisted of about 14,000 men. With these he advanced to Aberdeen, where he was joined by several persons of distinction, attached to the family on the throne. After having refreshed his troops for some time, he renewed his march, and in twelve days arrived on the banks of the deep and rapid river Spey. The Pretender, having entered Inverness without opposition, still continued to linger in that neighbourhood. On the 16th of April, his royal highness, having given the necessary orders for the day, decamped from Nairn between four and five in the morning; and having disposed the army in three columns, covered on the flanks by the horse and dragoons, proceeded towards the enemy. After a march of eight miles, the vanguard perceived them in motion to the left. The duke immediately formed his army; but the rebels declining to advance, he continued to move forward to the distance of a mile: after a short halt, his army again proceeded with fixed bayonets; and, having passed the morass, obtained a full view of the enemy in line of battle, behind the huts and walls of Culloden house. The dispositions made by his royal highness have always been regarded, by those conversant with military subjects, as highly honourable to his military skill: for such was the nature of his arrangement, that if any one battalion failed, there were two at hand to supply its place; and if any two pieces of cannon were taken, there were three to open upon the assailants. Some time was spent, by both armies, in gaining the flank; but the royalists, still advancing, were enabled to leave behind them the morass that lay to their right; a circumstance which enabled them to extend their front, for which purpose Pulteney's foot were ordered from the rear to take post on the right, and Kingston's horse, with a squadron of light dragoons, to cover the right. Lord Bury was ordered forward to reconnoitre a wretched imitation of a battery, and was fired upon by the rebels, whose cannon did little execution, owing to the unskilfulness with which it was conducted.

The first discharge of the royal artillery threw the rebels into evident confusion; they rallied, however, and after making a furious onset again retired, closely pursued by the horse. Their attack on the left was equally unsuccessful; for the king's troops being ordered to reserve their fire till the enemy had advanced within pistol-shot, the carnage was excessive. The commanders, however, of the rebels continued to exhort their troops, and to urge them to the most desperate exertions. The regiments of Barrel and Dejean, yielding to their impetuosity, opened them a passage, and immediately closing, encircled them between the first and second line, and so bravely and vigorously attacked them with the bayonet, that their broad swords and targets proved of little service, few escaping to their main body. At the same time, the Argyleshire militia pulling down a park wall that guarded the flank of the enemy, and making way for the dragoons under Hawley, they with sword in hand attacked the rebels, of whom they made great slaughter. In less than half an hour the highlanders were totally routed, and the field covered with their wounded and slain to the amount of 300 men. The French picquets on their left stood inactive during the whole engagement, and afterwards surrendered prisoners of war. An entire body of the clans marched from the field in order, while the rest were routed with great slaughter, and their leaders obliged to retire.

The glory of this victory was sullied by the barbarity of the soldiers. Not contented with the blood which was so profusely shed during the action, they now traversed the field, and massacred and robbed the wounded. Many were slain, who had approached the scene of combat, excited by curiosity. Immediately after the action, the duke commanded that thirty-six deserters should be executed; and, within a short period of time, the country around was one melancholy scene of plunder, slaughter, and desolation.

By this decisive action were blasted all the hopes of the young adventurer, who immediately fled, with a captain of Fitz-James's cavalry. When their horses were fatigued, they both alighted, and separately sought for safety. He wandered in the country for some days, a forlorn fugitive, and the wretched spectator of all those horrors, which his ambition had brought upon the adherents of his family. He was surrounded by armed troops, who kept him in continual alarm. Sometimes he lurked in caves and cottages, without attendants, or any support but what the poorest peasant could supply. Sometimes he rowed in fishing boats from isle to isle among the Hebrides, and often in sight of his pursuers, who were animated in their search by a reward of £30,000 offered for taking him, dead or alive. For some days he appeared in female attire, and passed in that disguise through the midst of his enemies. In the course of his concealment, he had occasion to trust his life to the fidelity of about fifty individuals, whose attachment to his family prevailed over their avarice.

In the mean time, he continued to wander over the frightful wilds of Glengary, for near six months, until at length a privateer of St. Maloe's, hired by his adherents, arrived at Lochnanach, and in this vessel he embarked, in the most wretched attire. His linen had not been changed for many weeks; his eyes were become hollow, his visage wan, and his constitution impaired by famine and fatigue. He was accompanied by Sullivan and Sheridan, two Irish adherents, who had shared all his calamities; with Cameron of Lochiel, Cameron's brother, and other exiles. They set sail for France; and after being chased by two English men of war, arrived in safety at Roseau, near Morlaix, in Bretagne.

While the young Pretender was thus pursued, the scaffolds and the gibbets were preparing for those of his unfortunate adherents who were made prisoners. Seventeen officers of the rebel army were hanged, drawn, and quartered, on Kennington common. Nine were executed in the same manner at Carlisle, and eleven at York. A few obtained pardons, and a considerable number of the common men were sent to the plantations in America.

Bills of indictment for high treason were found, by the county of Surrey, against the earls of Cromartie and Kilmarnock, who had borne a considerable share in many of the subordinate operations. They were tried by their peers in Westminster hall, and found guilty. Cromartie was pardoned; but the other two were beheaded on Tower hill. Kilmarnock, convinced of his errors, or flattered to the last with hopes of pardon, declared his consciousness of his crimes, and professed his repentance; but Balmerino, undaunted even at the approach of death, gloried in the cause for which he fell. His fellow-sufferers, when commanded to exlaim, "God bless king George," performed with a faint voice the injunction; but Balmerino cried out aloud, "God bless king James." Mr. Radcliffe, brother to the late earl of Derwentwater, who was beheaded in the former reign, was taken on board of ship, and the identity of his person being proved, he was sentenced upon a former conviction, and also suffered on Tower hill.

Lord Lovat had endeavoured to escape the penalties attaching to his treason, by professions of antipathy towards the conduct of his son, who had formed, at a critical moment of the contest, the siege of Fort Augustus. Lord Loudon paid him a visit, at his residence of Castle Downie, with 800 men, and requested security for the peaceable behaviour of his clan. His lordship promised that all the arms in their possession should be delivered up by the 16th, expressed his aversion to the proceedings of his son, and agreed to return with lord Loudon to Inverness, till he should fulfil his engagements. Having lulled the vigilance of the guards, by his apparent indifference to the cause of the rebels, he effected his escape; but was retaken, was impeached by the commons, found guilty, sentenced on the 18th of March to the usual punishment of treason, and was beheaded on the 9th of April 1747. on Tower hill; exhibiting at the place of execution no indication of repentance, or of despondency, at the ignominious termination of a life of dissimulation and treachery.

The rebellion being thus suppressed, the legislature directed its attention to the establishment of some regulations in Scotland, with the view of preventing the recurrence of similar commotions. The highlanders had hitherto worn the antient military dress of their ancestors, and never went without arms. They therefore regarded themselves as a body of people distinct from the rest of the nation, and were ready, upon the shortest notice, to join any insurrection of their chiefs, to whom they still regarded themselves as bound, by the feudal tenures of military service. To remove these inconveniences, they were obliged, by act of parliament, to wear clothes of the common fashion, and were prohibited the use of firearms. The hereditary jurisdiction of their chiefs was at the same time abolished. The law, prohibiting the highland dress, was however repealed in the month of June 1782; an act of policy and humanity which indicated, in common with more important circumstances, the gradual progress of the nation in justness of thinking and liberality of feeling.

CHAPTER XII.

GEORGE II.

DURING the commotions in England which we have just recorded, the flames of war continued to rage upon the continent with unabating violence. The French arms had been repeatedly crowned with success, and the Netherlands were reduced under the Gallic dominion. The factions, which for more than a century had divided the United Provinces, were increased by these disasters. One party declared for the prince of Orange as a stadtholder; the other, opposing this election, were favourably disposed to the cause of France. If a stadtholder were elected, the constitution would be established on the basis of a limited monarchy; if the opposite party prevailed, the whole power of the state would be rested in an aristocracy, which would sacrifice the interests of the kingdom to the views of France. Of two evils, therefore, the Dutch chose the former. The people, inflamed to a degree of turbulence approaching sedition, compelled their magistrates to declare the prince of Orange as stadtholder, captain-general, and admiral of the United Provinces. All commerce with France was immediately prohibited, the Dutch army was augmented, and orders were issued for the immediate commencement of hostilities. The king of Sardinia, influenced by the example of the states, deserted her connection with France, to become the ally of England. Italy was subjected to all the horrors of intestine war, while strangers were contending in her bosom for the possession of her usurped dominions. The French and Spaniards on one side, and the Imperialists, with the king of Sardinia, on the other, ravaged, by turns, the beautiful territories of the finest, and once the most powerful country of the world.

AT this period, the English made an unsuccessful attempt on Port l'Orient, 1747. and the French obtained considerable victories at Roeroux in Flanders, and at La Feldt. The fruit of these victories was still wanting, and it was resolved to lay siege to Bergen op Zoom, a place deemed impregnable, less on account of its being the masterpiece of the celebrated engineer, Coehorn, than because it was continually supplied with all kinds of ammunition and necessaries by the river Scheldt, which forms an arm of the sea behind it. Of all the sieges that had ever been formed, this, in all probability, was the most difficult. The conduct of it was given to count Lowendhal, who had already conquered a portion of Dutch Brabant. This general, a native of Denmark, had been in the Russian service. He spoke nearly all the languages of Europe; he knew all its courts, their politics, the genius of the several inhabitants, and their manner of fighting; and had at last given the preference to the French service, into which, through the friendship of marshal Saxe, he was received, in the rank of lieutenant-general. The French and the allies, the besieged and the besiegers themselves, all believed that the enterprise would fail. Every measure of precaution was taken by the allies: the garrison was reinforced; provisions of all kinds arrived by the Scheldt; the artillery was admirably served; the besieged made several sallies; attacks were made by a considerable body of troops, which protected the lines near the city, and mines were sprung in several places. A sickness among the besiegers, encamped on an unwholesome spot, seconded the resistance of the garrison. At length, after three weeks open trenches, count Lowendhal demonstrated that there are occasions, when it is necessary to go beyond the established rules of art. The breaches were not yet practicable, but there were three works slightly damaged; the ravelin of Edem, and two bastions, one of which was called the Maiden, and the other the Coehorn. The general, on the 20th of September, resolved to carry the town by an assault on these three places at once. The troops having received their orders in whispers, descended in the dead of the night, when the besieged reposed in imagined security, into the fossée, and ran to the three breaches. Twelve grenadiers made themselves masters of the fort of Edem, killing all who resisted, and making the rest throw down their arms in dismay. The Maiden and the Coehorn were assailed and carried with the same vivacity, the troops climbing up in crowds. Every thing was carried; they pushed on to the ramparts, where they formed, and entered the city with fixed bayonets. The marquis de Lujac seized on the gate leading to the harbour, the commander of that fortress surrendering at discretion. All the other forts were surrendered in the same manner. The baron de Cromstrom, who commanded in the town, fled to the lines. The prince of Hesse Philipstadt making some resistance in the streets, with two regiments, the one Scotch, and the other Swiss, they were cut to pieces. The rest of the garrison fled towards the lines for protection, and spread terror wherever they came, till the flight became general. The city was pillaged by the victorious troops. They seized, in the name of the king, seventeen large barges, laden with ammunition and refreshments. On the chests were written in large characters, "For the invincible garrison of Bergen op Zoom." The king, on receiving intelligence of this important and unexpected event, created count Lowendhal a marshal of France. The surprise and affliction of the English nation was only equalled by the consternation of the people of Holland, which was still further increased by the commencement of the siege of Maestricht.

But the successes of the French in the Netherlands were counterbalanced by several disappointments. In Italy, the brother of the marshal Belleisle, attempting to penetrate into Piedmont, at the head of 34,000 men, was defeated and slain. A fleet sent out for the recovery of Cape Breton was unsuccessful; two more were fitted out, one to make a descent on the British colonies in America, and the other to extend and secure the dominion of France in the East Indies. The latter were attacked by Anson and Warren, and nine of their vessels were captured. Shortly afterwards, commodore Fox, with six ships of war, took about forty French ships, laden from St. Domingo; and this loss was followed by another defeat, in which the French lost seven ships of the line and several frigates.

Amidst this variety of events, the belligerent powers began at length to wish for the blessings of peace. The Dutch had, for some time, endeavoured to limit the continuance of a war, in which they had much to lose, and nothing to gain. The king of France, even after his victories on the continent, had expressed his desire of general tranquillity to sir John Ligonier, who had been made prisoner at the battle of La Feldt. The bad success of his fleets, and of his troops in Italy, the frequency of bankruptcies, and the election of a stadtholder in Holland, who gave spirit to the opposition, all contributed to render him weary of hostilities, and to induce him to propose an accommodation. The secret wishes of the allies tended to the same purpose; the Dutch had already sustained a loss of 35,000 men, prisoners in France; and the English ministry, consulting their own security from the attacks of opposition, and the discontent of the people, excited by the unfortunate vicissitudes of the war, readily acquiesced in the preliminary arrangements of a final negotiation. The contending powers, therefore, agreed to assemble a congress at Aix-la-Chapelle, where the earl of Sandwich and sir Thomas Robinson assisted as plenipotentiaries from the king of Great Britain. The treaty 1748. was concluded on the 23rd of October. It confirmed the treaties of Westphalia, Madrid, Nimeguen, Ryswick, Utrecht, Baden, and the Hague, the quadruple alliance, and the treaty of Vienna. All conquests made in all parts of the world were to be reciprocally restored; the artillery found in the conquered places to be restored, in the same condition as when taken, with a few exceptions; the duchies of Parma, Placentia, and Guastalla, to be ceded to Don Philip, but to return to the present possessors in case he died without issue-male, or he, or any of his descendants, should become king of Spain, or of the two Sicilies; the king of Sardinia to be maintained in possession of all his estates; the duke of Modena to be re-established in his rights; the republic of Genoa to be restored to all its possessions; the states of Italy to remain, as far as was conformable with the above arrangements, in the same relative situation as before the commencement of the war; the assiento treaty was confirmed; the fortifications of Dunkirk were to remain as they stood on the land side, but in other respects the antient treaties to be observed; the king of Prussia was confirmed in the possession of Silesia, and it was agreed, that the queen of Hungary should be secured in her patrimonial dominions. One article of the treaty was particularly displeasing to the English people. It was stipulated, that the king of Great Britain should send two persons of rank as hostages to France, until restitution should be made of Cape Breton, and all other conquests which England had made during the war. This was in itself a mortifying clause: and to add to the dissatisfaction of the nation, no mention was made of searching the vessels of England in the American seas, a point on which the war was originally begun. The limits of the different colonies and possessions of the various powers in North America, were not ascertained or defined, nor did the nation receive any equivalent for those forts which were restored to the enemy. The faction of the Pelhams, who had carried on the war so ingloriously, and were on that account obnoxious to the people, being apprehensive, that if the struggle continued much longer, they would be obliged to resign the reins of administration to more fortunate hands, came to the resolution of negotiating with the enemy. They were conscious that peace, which is itself a great support to an established ministry, would enable them to make the most of their parliamentary interest, which was considerable, and to perfect that system of corruption which had been introduced at the revolution, and uniformly practised by all their predecessors; but by none more successfully than by Walpole. The sudden and unexampled apostacy, immediately after the fall of that minister, of so many clamorous demagogues, impressed the people with a persuasion, that public spirit was no more than an empty sound, and that virtue had for ever deserted the senate. This disposition of mind naturally led them to acquiesce, without open murmurs, in the measures of the ministers, who were allowed to go on from blunder to blunder in the war with Spain and France, till they arrived at the climax of imbecility in the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle; by which, as we have seen, they sacrificed the honour of the nation, in sending hostages to France, left the original cause of quarrel as undetermined as at its commencement, and sowed the seeds of a future war, or rather perpetuated the preceding one, by the appointment of commissaries to fix the boundaries of the English and French territories in America.

The earl of Sussex and lord Cartwright were sent as hostages to France, and soon afterwards the French evacuated their conquests in Flanders, and compelled the Pretender to retire from their territory.

On the 7th of March in the ensuing year, the lords of trade and plantations 1749.
published an advertisement for the better peopling and settling the province of Nova Scotia in North America, comprising offers of so liberal a nature, that numbers of settlers were induced to emigrate, and the capital, Halifax, was laid out. About the same time, letters were received from admiral Boscawen, dated Fort St. David's, October 17th, 1748, informing the ministry, that he had taken the port of Arria Coupan, and afterwards laid siege to Pondicherry; but had been at length compelled to raise the siege, from the vigorous resistance of the garrison, and the inclemency of the season, and to retreat to Fort St. David's. The admiral lost before the place 757 soldiers, 43 artillery-men, and 265 seamen. In the course of the spring, intelligence almost equally disastrous was received from the same admiral, stationed in the East Indies. A hurricane came on in the night of the 12th of April, and continuing all the next day, the Namur of 74 guns, and the Pembroke of 60, were entirely lost, and every soul on board, but 38 seamen, perished. The Apollo, of 40 guns and 350 men, foundered at sea. No part of the fleet escaped the storm, and the sea shore was covered with wrecks and dead bodies.

Among the less important, but remarkable events of this period, must be numbered, the trial and reprimand of admiral Knowles for negligence, in an action with the Spanish fleet near the Havannah, in which he took the Conquestadore, and drove on shore a 74 gun vessel, which was burnt by her crew; the occurrence of several shocks of an earthquake in London and Westminster, on the 8th of February and the 8th of March; and the passing of a bill, which gave much satisfaction to the populace, for the encouragement of the white herring fishery.

1750. One of the most grievous consequences of the war had been the immense accumulation of debt, which it had been the means of entailing on the nation. To lighten this burden, Mr. Pelham, who now conducted the business of the state, proposed to have recourse to the same expedient which immediately preceded the consolidation of the various funds in the year 1719. His plan was to lessen the debt by lowering the interest, which had been promised on granting the supplies, or obliging the lenders to receive the sums originally granted. This measure, though considered as in some degree a hardship on the lender, produced the desired effect, without any inconvenience to the public credit. Other measures, equally beneficial to the public, were prosecuted with the same success. The importation of iron from America was permitted, and the commerce of Africa laid open to the nation, under the sanction of the board of trade.

1751. On Wednesday, the 20th of March, his royal highness, Frederick prince of Wales, departed this life, in the 46th year of his age, universally regretted. He left issue by his princess, then far advanced in pregnancy, five sons and three daughters; of whom prince George, afterwards George III., succeeded him as heir apparent. On the 25th of March, both houses waited on the king with addresses of condolence; and, on the 12th of April, the body of his royal highness was, with the usual pomp and ceremony, deposited in a vault of the chapel of Henry VII. On the 17th, both houses sent messages of condolence to the princess-dowager. The death of the prince, by depriving the opposition of one great source of electioneering and parliamentary influence, contributed, above all other events, to secure, for the next five years, the domestic tranquillity of the nation.

The rest of the year 1751, and the year 1752, were distinguished by few events, either domestic or foreign, worthy of being recorded. On the 11th of July in the former year, the princess-dowager of Wales was delivered of a posthumous princess, baptized by the name of Caroline Matilda. On the 14th of November, his majesty opened the session of parliament with a gracious speech, in the close of which, he exhorted both houses to consider seriously of some effectual provision to suppress the audacious crimes of robbery and violence, which had become so frequent around the capital, proceeding, in a great measure, from that profligate spirit of irreligion, idleness, gaming, and extravagance, which had of late extended itself, in an uncommon degree, to the dishonour of the nation, and the great offence and prejudice of the sober and industrious part of the people. The addresses of the two houses were echoes to the speech; and the grants amounted to nearly £4,000,000. An act was passed, for preventing thefts and robberies, by which places of public recreation, dancing, and music, were suppressed and prohibited, unless licensed by justices of the peace empowered for that purpose. An act also received the royal assent, for annexing the forfeited estates in Scotland unalienably in the crown; and for establishing a method of leasing these estates, and applying the rents and profits to the civilization and improvement of the islands, and for preventing future disorders in that part of the united kingdom.

The most important object of parliamentary 1752. attention in the succeeding session, was an act for the better prevention of clandestine marriages, and for the more public solemnization of that ceremony. The grievance complained of, and which this law was meant to redress was, that the sons and daughters of opulent families were often seduced into marriage, before they had acquired sufficient experience in life to guard against any imprudent connection. This statute, therefore, enacted, that the banns of marriage should be regularly published three successive Sundays, in the church of the parish where both parties had resided for one month at least before the ceremony. It declared, that any marriage solemnized without this previous publication, or a license obtained from the bishop's court, should be void; and that the person who solemnized it should be transported for seven years. It is impossible to contemplate one provision of this act, without indignation at its cruelty, and surprise at its absurdity. The clause by which it is declared, that a marriage contracted under the circumstances mentioned shall be void, tends to facilitate, instead of impeding the designs of the licentious and the unprincipled, on youth and inexperience. Within the last ten years, nearly a hundred instances have occurred, of venturers and profligates, who, having gratified their libidinous desires, under the sanction of an illegal marriage, have afterwards, on the authority of this act, obtained a divorce.

This session was also distinguished by another act, which excited the jealousy of the people, and was ultimately abandoned. A law, for the naturalization of the Jews, was introduced into the house of commons; the ministry affirming that such a law would greatly contribute to the benefit of the nation; that it would increase the commerce, the credit, and the wealth of the kingdom, and set a laudable example of toleration. It was observed in reply, that by this bill greater favour was shewn to the Jews than to some sects professing Christianity; that an introduction of that obnoxious people into the kingdom would degrade the character of the nation, and repress in the people that zeal for religion which was already too much abated. The bill was at first passed into a law, but excited such general and vehement dissatisfaction, that it was thought expedient to repeal it in the ensuing session.

The absence of all political discussion, and the tranquillity subsisting 1753. in all the states of Europe, gave an importance to domestic and comparatively trivial incidents, which would have been disregarded amidst the turbulence of political contention, and the vicissitudes of hostile conflict. Every class, and every rank of society, was at this time agitated by the case of one Elizabeth Canning, who deposed before a magistrate, that, on the night of new year's day, she was seized under the wall of Bedlam by two ruffians, who stripped her of her upper garments, gagged her, and attempted to murder her if she made the least noise, conveyed her to Enfield Wash, where she was robbed of her stays, and on her refusal to comply with the brutal desires of several visitors of the house, confined in a cold, damp, and unfurnished apartment. Here, according to her own account, she remained a whole month, with no other sustenance than a few stale crusts of bread, and about a gallon of water, till at length she forced her way through a window, and ran home to her mother's house, almost naked, on the night of the 29th of January. The story, improbable as it was, and totally unsupported by evidence, excited the compassion of several benevolent individuals, who raised a subscription for bringing to justice the supposed criminals. Wells, her servant-maid, Virtue Hall, and a gipsey-woman named Squires, were apprehended. Wells was acquitted of the felony, but punished as a loose woman; and Squires, though she produced evidence that she was seen at Abbotsbury, in Dorsetshire, at the time of the supposed robbery, was capitally convicted, upon the evidence of Virtue Hall, who had become evidence for Canning, but afterwards retracted all she had sworn. On the representation of the attorney-general, Squires was pardoned, and bills of perjury were found on both sides. The witnesses against Canning were acquitted; but she was found guilty of perjury, and transported to America. Such, however, was the impression produced in her favour, by her own artifice, the effrontery of Virtue Hall, and the general prejudice against the character of Squires, that her opponents were insulted by the populace; every class and description of society was agitated by the quarrel; the cause of both parties was advocated with vehemence in pamphlets and pasquinades; and the partisans of Canning paid for her transportation in a private ship, supplied her with money to the amount of £300, and obtained her, by the warmth of their recommendations, a reception among the most respectable families of New England.

1754. The beginning of the year was rendered remarkable by a severe frost, so that the navigation of barges was impeded, and passengers crossed the river on foot above Kingston bridge. On the 31st of May, the duke of Newcastle succeeded his deceased brother, Mr. Pelham, as first lord of the treasury, and was himself succeeded, as secretary of state, by sir Thomas Robinson, afterwards lord Grantham. Mr. Legge was appointed chancellor of the exchequer; and these changes were accompanied by many subordinate arrangements.

The incapacity of the English administration, and the inglorious issue of the late war, had encouraged the insolence, and given new energy to the injustice of France. As they undertook the war without spirit, they concluded it without prudence. The whole tenor of their conduct was an indication of timidity and apprehension. They discovered nothing of that firmness and perseverance which become the ministers of a great and brave nation, and of which their enemies had set them an example in the day of their distress. By their suppliant behaviour, and tame acquiescence in the proposals of France, they manifestly acknowledged her superiority, augmented her confidence, and inflamed her ambition.

A more infallible method of preventing the permanence and stability of the peace could not be invented. Our enemies imagined, not without reason, that the same ministry which crouched to them in the course of the negotiation, would be equally acquiescent if they infringed any article of the treaty. They accordingly continued hostilities in the East Indies, and made encroachments on our territories in America, believing that Britain, whom they had lately reduced so low, would not dare to retaliate. Nor is it unlikely that their belief would have been realized, had not the intrepidity of the people counteracted the indecision of the ministry. For though the enemy had, by presents and false insinuations, been constantly debauching the Indians from our interest, and spiriting them up against our colonies; though they were erecting one chain of forts from the river St. Lawrence to the Mississippi, and another along the great lakes, to cut off our planters from any trade or communication with the natives, the ministers trusted to the slowness and feebleness of negotiation, and though they always received evasive answers, and found that hostilities were continued, still imagined that they could conquer the arms of France with rolls of parchment.

Intimidated at length, however, by the clamours of the people, they sent orders to the different governors of the American provinces, to form a general association against the enemy, to endeavour to win the Indians over to our interest, and to repel force by force. But the orders were more easily given than executed. The colonies, which were chiefly peopled by dissenters, and persons who were dissatisfied with the state of civil and religious liberty in Great Britain and Ireland, entertained the utmost jealousy of each other, so that it required time and address to make them act in concert. Had not the enemy proved successful in their first operations, and rendered the common danger apparent and imminent, it is difficult to pronounce how far their opposite interests and religious prejudices might have misled them. They seemed to coincide in nothing, but in acknowledging a certain degree of dependence on the crown of Great Britain.

It was not surprising, therefore, that they should ineffectually oppose the French, who acted in concert, and under one head; or that they could not secure the Indians to their interest, when they were not only at variance with each other, but endeavoured to excite the savages against their brother-colonists. Their conduct to the natives had been so blameable, that they could not hope to succeed in recovering their friendship. They had made a practice of comprehending in their surveys the Indian hunting grounds and cornfields, without permission or compensation. They had been accustomed to sell them adulterated rum, and to decoy their children into slavery. Having built a fort on their territories, the missionaries and agents of France took advantage of the prejudice excited by these acts of injustice and cruelty, to represent the erection, as intended for the subjection of the Indians, and the hostile possession of their country. The Indians themselves were inclined, from interested motives, to believe them. They found that the English were wealthy and divided, and that more was to be gained by taking up the hatchet against them, than from attacking the French, whom they saw acting in a compact body, animated by one soul.

To resist the encroachments of the French, a party was sent from Virginia, under major Washington, afterwards so distinguished in the annals of his country, to dislodge them from a position on the Ohio. At first he gained some trivial advantages; but on the 4th of July 900 French and 200 Indians attacked his party, consisting of only 300 men, and defeated him, with the loss of 150 killed and 70 wounded. After this disaster, the majority of the Indians either remained neuter, or joined the enemy, who had a body of 11,000 regulars, 4000 workmen, and 25,000 well-trained militia-men, ready to act on any emergency.

The views of the French, in their present line of policy, were no less obvious than dangerous. They had, in the last war, acquired an evident superiority over Great Britain on land. The object was now to cut off the resources of her maritime strength, the remaining obstacle to the prosecution of their ambitious designs. As this strength depended, at that period, chiefly on her trade to India and America, they formed the project of extirpating her colonies and factories in both those quarters of the globe, and of establishing their own marine on the ruin of the British. For these reasons they availed themselves of the inaccuracy with which, through the imperfection of geography, the limits of Nova Scotia had been ascertained in the treaty of Utrecht, to lay claim to more than was their due, and by that claim to render the remainder of little utility to England. Pretending, from the same motives, to have first discovered the mouths of the Misissippi, they asserted a right to all the adjacent country, towards New Mexico on the east, and as far as the Apalachian and Allegany mountains on the west; in consequence of which, they expelled the planters of the Ohio Company, which had obtained a charter from the British legislature, for cultivating a considerable tract of these rich and valuable lands, and built fort Du Quesne, on the arms of the river Monongahela, a situation which gave it the command of all the country contiguous to the Ohio and Misissippi.

If we discard from our estimate the right of the natives, which by both sides was regarded as nothing, it is apparent that justice was on the side of England. Both of the nations engaged in the contest had much less regard to right than to convenience. Were the French allowed to unite Canada to their settlements along the Misissippi, by the possession of the vast country which lies between them, the English colonies would, in time of peace, be deprived of all share in the Indian trade, and be, in time of war, exposed to the danger of continual inroads, or to the ruinous charge of defending a frontier of more than 1500 miles in length. If, on the contrary, the claims of France on the Ohio and Nova Scotia did not succeed, their two colonies would remain entirely disunited, the entrance into one being shut up, during the winter, by the intensity of the frost; and the entrance into the other being at all times difficult, on account of the banks and bars at the mouth of the Misissippi; circumstances which would greatly diminish their value to France, and ultimately involve the ruin of her principal settlements in the West Indies.

Both nations, being fully sensible of these truths, no longer considered the quarrels in America as worthy of little consideration; and though the two courts breathed nothing but peace, and exchanged mutual professions of friendship and regard, which deceived neither party, it was determined to terminate the negotiation by an appeal to the sword. The French silently prepared a naval armament at Brest, to convey troops and military stores to Canada. But the English government, whose superiority of strength on the watery element enabled them to equip fleets with greater expedition, obtained the start of them, and dispatched admiral Boscawen, with a considerable squadron, into the Indian seas, for the purpose of intercepting their ships of war and convoys. Fogs, which are so frequent in the latitude where he cruised, favouring the enemy's escape, prevented the full success of his expedition. Two ships of the line, however, were taken, and the question of peace or hostility at length decided, a measure so vigorous being the most explicit and effectual declaration of war.

1755. Nor were hostilities directed to ships of war exclusively. French merchantmen were brought into our harbours in great numbers. The ministry did not think it necessary to wait for a formal declaration of war before they proceeded to hostilities, which would destroy the resources of France's maritime strength, and procure the country full indemnification for what had been wrested from it in time of profound peace. It was in vain that our enemies made all Europe resound with their complaints, and endeavoured to represent these reprisals as acts of piracy. All the world perceived that they were the aggressors, and that they assumed this hypocritical moderation, because they intended to interest other courts in their favour, and because, having been counteracted in their schemes, before they were ripe for execution, they were unprepared for the prosecution of successful warfare.

The advantages which we obtained by this manœuvre yielded us ample compensation for the losses sustained in America, where, upon the whole, we considered ourselves as worsted. Four operations had been undertaken in America at the same time: of these, one was commanded by colonel Monckton, who had orders to expel the French from their encroachments on the province of Nova Scotia; the second, further to the south, was directed against Crown Point, under the command of general Johnson; the third, under the conduct of general Shirley, was destined to Niagara, to secure the forts on the river; and the fourth, which was yet further southward, against fort Du Quesne, under general Braddock. In these expeditions, Monckton captured the fort of Beausejour, which secured to Great Britain the entire possession of Nova Scotia. Johnson, though he failed in taking the fort which had been the first object of his enterprise, obtained a decisive victory over the French, under baron Dieskau, at Lake George, on the 8th of September, in which the baron was taken prisoner, and 1000 of his army killed. Shirley lost the season for operation by delay. Braddock was vigorous and active, but suffered a defeat. He was naturally proud, self-conceited, and impatient. His impatience was inflamed by the slowness of the provincials in assembling, and by seeing great part of the season for action exhausted, without an opportunity of signalizing his courage. Stimulated by these motives, he marched precipitately and incautiously against the enemy, as soon as he had surmounted the obstacles which had hitherto retarded his operations. Instead of employing the allied Indians as a scouting party to reconnoitre the woods and thickets, and to prevent the main body from falling into an ambuscade, he moved on securely with the regulars in front, and, as might have been expected, was suddenly attacked in a swamp, overgrown with bushes and high grass, by bodies of French and Indians, so judiciously posted, that though they could not be distinctly seen, they kept up a constant fire, which was the more severe and galling, because it could not be returned. The troops, being seized with a panic, fell into confusion, and notwithstanding the utmost efforts of the general and the other officers, fled in consternation. Had not the Virginians, by advancing from the rear, and by engaging the enemy, allowed them time to resume their ranks and recover their spirits, the rout would in all probability have been total, and the army destroyed. As it was, one half of the troops were cut to pieces, and their precipitate retreat exposed the Virginian frontiers to the scalping parties of the enemy, and had the most pernicious influence on our interests, by deciding the conduct of the wavering Indians. The general, after having five horses killed under him, remained on the field of battle; preferring an honourable death to an ignominious life, and atoning, in some measure, by his devotion, for having sacrificed the lives of so many brave men in vain.

Such was the state of affairs in America, the first theatre of the war, when the French, finding that the concessions of the English ministry were by no means so immediate or so extensive as they had reason to anticipate, from the feeble and timid policy of the last few years, began at length to devote the whole of their attention and resources to the prosecution of the war in Europe. 1756. Several bodies of troops moved to the coasts of Picardy, Normandy, and Britany, and threatened an invasion of Great Britain. The consternation which a few misled islanders had lately occasioned, was yet impressed on the remembrance of the nation. Through the want of a well-regulated militia, the use of arms was unknown to the generality of the people; and that martial spirit, which formerly rendered them the terror of France, was consequently extinct. As there was not in the kingdom a body of regulars, upon whom alone they relied for protection, an universal panic was diffused through the nation; nor could it be removed by the consideration of our superior fleet, because we might, as has frequently happened, be deprived of its assistance by unfavourable winds and tides. So that the ministry, who were not free from the general contagion of fear, could think of no better expedient, for quieting the general apprehension, than calling to our assistance a body of hired Hanoverians and Hessians, imitating, in this respect, the example of the antient Britons, who lost their liberty by employing auxiliary Germans, against their invaders, the Picts and Scots.

While the kingdom shamefully trembled at this alarm, too notorious to be concealed, too fatal in its consequences to be forgotten, the French equipped, at Toulon, with the utmost expedition, a fleet of twelve men of war, which convoyed an army of eleven thousand men, under the command of Richlieu, to the island of Minorca. The British ministry obtained early intelligence of this design; but such apprehension, distraction, and irresolution prevailed in their councils, and so absurdly arranged was the disposition of our navy, that admiral Byng, with a squadron of ships inferior to that of the enemy in number and quality, did not make his appearance off Minorca till a month after trenches had been opened before St. Philip's fort.

About six o'clock in the evening of the 19th of May, the enemy, to the number of seventeen sail, was descried by admiral Byng, advancing in order of battle. The evening was spent, by both fleets, in contending for the advantage of the weather-gauge. At day-light on the 20th, the French fleet could not be descried; but soon re-appearing, the line of battle was formed on both sides; and about two, admiral Byng made the signal to engage. Rear-admiral West, an officer of approved ability and resolution, bore down with his division upon the enemy, and attacked them with such impetuosity, that the ships opposed to him were driven out of the line. Instead of supporting the rear-admiral, Byng, either from a desire to preserve the line, or from an inexcusable timidity, kept at the greatest distance, and made little use of his artillery. The French admiral discovered the same disinclination to continue the engagement; he edged away with an easy sail, while Byng made a demonstration of giving chace. The French laid claim to the victory, and the retreat of the English admiral was productive of all the consequences of a defeat. Under pretext of providing for the safety of Gibralter, he repaired thither with the utmost expedition.

The garrison of St. Philip's, thus shamefully abandoned to the enemy, instead of giving themselves up to despair, resolved to behave with spirit, and to defend the place to the last extremity. From the 20th of May to the 27th of June, they sustained and retorted the enemy's fire with the most undaunted resolution. At length, the works being in many places demolished, the guns dismounted, the garrison exhausted by hard duty and incessant watching, and little probability remaining of relief, a capitulation was demanded, and granted on honourable terms. The fortress was accordingly delivered up to the French on the 28th of June.

Minorca, thus dismembered from the British empire, was the object of universal regret. Its importance was sensibly felt, and its loss sincerely lamented. The fears of an imaginary invasion gave way to indignation and resentment against the ministry and the delinquent admiral. Addresses were presented to the throne, petitioning in the strongest terms for a change of men and measures; and the people, rendered gloomy and distrustful, and irritated by misfortunes, already imagined themselves on the brink of ruin. The first fury of their resentment was directed against the unfortunate Byng. The ministry used every endeavour to foment this animosity, and to avert the danger which threatened themselves. They aggravated his misconduct, exposed his folly, and expatiated on his cowardice. The public prints abounded with the most virulent invectives against him, and mobs were hired to hang and burn him in effigy in various parts of the capital. He was superseded in command, and sent home under an arrest. On the 28th of December, he was brought before a court-martial, and after a long trial was condemned as falling under part of the twelfth article of war. The severity of this article, which inflicts the punishment of death on every person in the fleet, who, through cowardice, negligence, or disaffection, shall, in time of action, keep back from the enemy, and violate his duty, induced the judges to recommend him as a proper object of his majesty's mercy. The distinguished merit and services of his ancestors, the recommendation of his judges, and the testimony of the French general, who had been a spectator of the whole engagement, proved insufficient to save him, his death being represented to the king as the only means of pacifying the populace. Thus devoted, he prepared to meet his fate with steadiness and resolution. He was shot at Portsmouth, on the 14th of March in the ensuing year. The firm, composed, and undaunted manner in which he died, confuted every imputation on his personal courage. Immediately before his death, he delivered a paper to the marshal of the admiralty, in which he declared his innocence, and that he considered himself as a victim, destined to divert the indignation and resentment of an injured and deluded people from their proper objects. While the judicious part of the nation lamented the misfortunes, they could not but condemn the backwardness of the unhappy admiral. They were at a loss to discover in his conduct any offence worthy of death; and whatever idea they entertained of the cruelty and injustice of the minister, it was still the subject of regret and astonishment, that they were not contented with a mode of punishment less ignominious and severe.

Such was the state of the kingdom at this crisis, that it was found absolutely necessary to sacrifice the private partialities of the court to the wishes of the people, and to commit the administration to men, whose character for patriotism and ability had obtained them the confidence of the public. The duke of Devonshire was placed at the head of the treasury, and lord Temple succeeded lord Anson in the admiralty. Mr. Legge was appointed chancellor of the exchequer, and Mr. Pitt succeeded Mr. Fox as secretary of state. The seals were committed to the judges Willes, Smythe, and Wilmot.

While the people of England were regretting the last and unfortunate campaign, and execrating the individuals to whom they ascribed their losses and disappointments, the flames of discord and dissention, which had already been lighting up in the New World, began to burst forth among the principal powers of Europe. To form a just opinion of the present situation and interests of the states of Europe, it will be necessary to retrace concisely the steps we have already trod, and to recal the attention of our readers to negotiations and events which we have already recorded.

The rich and fertile province of Silesia had been wrested from Austria by the king of Prussia, and solemnly confirmed to him by two different treaties. This very important conquest, reluctantly surrendered, had excited an antipathy between the empress-queen and that monarch, and the former only waited for a favourable opportunity, to attempt its recovery.

Russia was allied to Austria by antient treaties, by their united wars against the Turks, and by the reciprocal affection of their native sovereigns. There existed, between the czarina and the king of Prussia, several personal subjects of complaint, and every means had been employed to injure that monarch's affairs in the north. They succeeded so far as to render Russia his implacable enemy, and ready to participate in any designs that might contribute to his ruin.

Augustus III. king of Poland, and elector of Saxony, independent of his close connection with Austria and Russia, to the latter of whom he owed his crown, was anxious to obtain an opportunity of renewing his demands on the king of Prussia, for an indemnification of the depredations committed by him in Saxony, in 1741. But the dominions of this monarch were in no condition to support a war, with so formidable a monarch as the king of Prussia. Poland was destitute of troops, resources, and fortifications, exposed to every incursion, and considerable only by her extent and fertility, Saxony was in the same defenceless situation; her army mouldering away, and her coffers empty.

As the views of these powers were exactly similar, they entered into a treaty apparently inoffensive; but several private articles were added inimical to his Prussian majesty; and it was particularly stipulated, that in case he should attack either of their territories, they should mutually furnish an army of 60,000 men, to re-invest the empress-queen in the duchy of Silesia.

The monarch, against whom these three powers were united, was at once the dread and the admiration of Europe. The house of Brandenburgh, from the most humble situation, had risen imperceptibly, in the course of a century, to a considerable degree of influence and power. The late king was extravagantly attached to a numerous army, and had converted a great part of his subjects into soldiers. Though barbarous in manners, cruel and turbulent in disposition, and despotic in his power, by singular good fortune, he had no opportunity of diminishing that army he had been so careful in collecting. He delighted in review and bloodless skirmishes, and trained one of the most numerous armies in Europe to the most perfect discipline. At his death, he delivered this powerful palladium to his son Frederic III., whom he had always treated with rigour and inhumanity, and accompanied the gift by a sum in the treasury adequate to the support of so numerous a force. From the moment the young monarch ascended the throne, it became obvious that there was an end to that inactivity which had characterized the former reign. The extent of his views, and the variety of his talents, were soon conspicuous in his actions. The boldness of his enterprises could only be equalled by the impenetrable secrecy observed in their execution. To the most lively imagination, and a fortitude scarcely to be paralleled, were added the strongest propensity for an active life, and a constitution capable of supporting its fatigues. He invented a new method of disciplining armies, and of giving battle. By the rapidity of his evolutions, and the celerity of his marches, he totally changed the modes of warfare. He saw the storm which was gathering around him, and determined to meet it. He had studied the character of the courts and the generals to whom he was opposed; and reposed, with a confidence justified by the event, on his own superiority.

I have already noticed the commencement of a treaty, between his Britannic majesty and the czarina of Russia. The king of Prussia had been, for some time, secretly discontented with the court of Versailles; but they continued, in appearance, so closely connected, as to excite suspicion that France had cajoled him into a participation of her views. To obviate the effects of such an alliance, the treaty with Russia was projected. It stipulated, that her Russian majesty should furnish a body of troops to the number of 55,000 men, and 50 gallies with the necessary crews, to be employed in the service of Britain, whenever required. No sooner was this treaty made public, than his Prussian majesty, perceiving at once the motives which had induced Russia to accede to it, declared, in the strongest manner, that he would oppose to the utmost the introduction of all foreign troops into the empire. This declaration, while it put an end to the treaty with Russia, evinced that the views of their Britannic and Prussian majesties were the same. The former was apprehensive of the French, the latter of the Russians. The king of England, who was particularly attached to his Hanoverian dominions, beheld them not only exposed to the resentment of France, but to that of Prussia, either of whom was sufficient to ravage his electorate, while the Russian subsidiaries were at too great a distance to afford him relief. An alliance with the court of London would relieve the king of Prussia, on the contrary, from the attacks of the Russians, and afford him an opportunity of attacking Austria, of whose designs he had been long suspicious. With regard to the views of the French court he entertained little apprehension, concluding that, from its long and hereditary hatred to Austria, it would always continue stedfast to the Prussian interests. A treaty was therefore signed at London, by which his Prussian majesty obtained from Great Britain a subsidy of £750,000, and the two sovereigns agreed not to make peace without the consent of each other. The queen of Hungary, finding that, by the late treaty, all her hopes of Russian assistance were frustrated, and inflamed with resentment, made proffers of negotiation to France, her most dangerous and most antient enemy; and to procure the friendship of that court, gave up her barrier in the Netherlands, which England had for ages been securing against that power, with its blood and treasure. By this extraordinary revolution, the whole political system of Europe acquired a new aspect, and the treaties of a century were rendered ineffectual. The treaty between France and Austria was no sooner ratified than Russia was invited to accede, and the czarina, regardless of her subsidies from England, warmly embraced the proposal. Sweden was seduced, by the intrigues of the French, to join the confederacy; and a war was commenced, between that nation and Prussia, contrary to the inclination of both monarchs.

The United Provinces, confirmed in their taste for peace by their fear of the expences of war, were unwilling to lose the advantages of a neutrality, which would throw the greatest part of their conquests into the hands of their subjects. Spain had equally neglected her finances and her forces. Her settlements abroad, and her dominions at home, were in the same defenceless situation, and the court was equally destitute of ambition and of policy. The monarch resigned himself to amusements inconsistent with his rank, and paid no attention whatever to public affairs.

The menaces of his enemies only rendered the Prussian monarch more eager to take the field. He marched, therefore, with a numerous army into Saxony, proposing to penetrate through that country into Bohemia. His declarations of friendship to the king of Poland were specious; but that monarch chose rather to rely on the valour and attachment of his troops, whom he assembled in a strong camp between Pirna and Konigstein, which was entrenched, provided with a numerous train of artillery, and deemed impregnable. Frederic, offended at this proceeding, demanded, as a proof of his neutrality, that the king of Poland should disembody his troops immediately. On the refusal of this demand, he instantly surrounded the Saxon army, intercepted their convoys of provision, and cut them off from all communication with the adjacent country. In the mean time, a great proportion of his army advanced into Bohemia, under the command of field-marshal Keith, and encamped within a small distance of the Bohemian army, consisting of 50,000 men.

Frederic, with his wonted celerity, repaired to Bohemia, assumed in person the command of M. Keith's corps, and advanced to give battle to the enemy. The Austrian general had taken possession of Lowoschutz, with a numerous body of infantry, and placed a battery of cannon in the front of the town; he had formed his cavalry chequerwise, and posted 2000 croats and pandars in the vineyards on his right. The Prussian monarch occupied with six battalions a hollow way, and some rising grounds which commanded the town. Early in the morning of 1st of October, the Prussian cavalry advanced to attack the enemy's horse; they were twice driven back, with very considerable loss. The Prussian infantry then advanced to attack the village of Lowoschutz in flank, but met with so warm a reception, that in all probability they would have been repulsed, had not marshal Keith headed them in person. Drawing his sword, he told them, "that he would lead them on to victory." But being informed that their powder and shot were exhausted, he exclaimed, with admirable presence of mind, "that he was happy their ammunition was expended, as he was confident the enemy could not withstand them at the point of the bayonet." So saying, he advanced at their head, drove the Austrians from Lowoschutz, and set the suburbs on fire. The loss was nearly equal on both sides, and both parties claimed the victory; but the consequences adjudged it to the king of Prussia, as the Austrian general was cut off from all hopes of relieving the Saxon army, which was the principal object of the battle.

By the battle of Lowoschutz, his Prussian majesty became absolute master of Saxony. Being informed that the original papers, relating to the confederacy which had been formed against him, were deposited in the archives of Dresden, he demanded the keys from the queen of Poland, who still remained in that place, and acted with a dignity becoming her birth. Upon her refusal, he ordered the doors to be forced, though not without some imputation on his politeness, as the queen of Poland opposed in person the officer who executed the order. Having obtained possession of these originals, he immediately published them, as the best justification of his proceedings in Saxony, and his invasion of Bohemia.

During these transactions at Dresden, prince Ferdinand of Brunswick had made himself master of Leipsic. The Prussian monarch, having rejoined his forces before Pirna, his Saxon enemies were reduced to the necesity of perishing by famine, or of attempting to cut their passage through the Prussian detachments that surrounded them, and forming a junction with the Austrians.

Marshal Brown advanced to Altendorf to facilitate their design, and they effected the passage of the Elbe; but not being sufficiently acquainted with their ground, they were soon entangled in the broken roads and narrow ravines which they had to pass, and reduced to such extreme distress, that they were obliged to surrender at discretion. The king of Poland thus suffered the mortification of seeing his whole army, consisting of 17,000 men, lay down their arms. In this deplorable condition, he sent a letter from the fortress of Koningstein, petitioning a safe passage for himself and his two sons to retire into Poland.

The affairs of America had been hitherto distinguished by the same gloomy aspect with those of Great Britain. Major-general Abercrombie arrived at New York on the 25th of June, and took upon him the command of the troops there assembled, till such time as the earl of Loudon, who had already distinguished himself in the service of his country, should arrive as commander-in-chief. A body of the enemy had formed an ambuscade, to intercept any reinforcements or provisions that might be sent to relieve the garrison of Oswego, which had hitherto been shamefully neglected. A considerable convoy of stores and provisions were, however, safely conducted thither by colonel Bradstreet. Returning with his detachment down the river Onondaga, he was saluted with a general charge of musquetry, from a party of Indians secreted among the bushes, which killed a considerable number of his men. The colonel expected, and was prepared for such an attack. He immediately landed his men, and taking possession of a small island, drove the Indians from their lurking places. Proceeding up the river, he attacked and defeated two different parties of the enemy, with great slaughter, and returned to Albany without further molestation. Intelligence being received from the prisoners that the French were preparing to besiege Oswego, a regiment of regulars, under the command of major-general Webb, was detached to its relief, but proved too late to afford any assistance.

The fort of Oswego was situated on the south side of Lake Ontario, at the mouth of the river Onondaga. On the opposite side was another fort called Ontario. Both of these had been erected in a hasty and injudicious manner, and were incapable of resisting a regular approach. The garrison consisted of about 1400 men, most of them newly-raised and inexperienced, and were commanded by lieutenant-colonel Mercer, an officer of acknowledged talent and courage. The attack of the place was formed by M. Montcalm, an officer remarkable for his vigilance and enterprising spirit, with upwards of 2000 men under his command. The fort of Ontario being deserted in a short time, was taken possession of by the enemy; after which they kept up an unceasing fire upon the English from its batteries. Colonel Mercer being killed, and the garrison in the greatest confusion, they were obliged to capitulate, and surrender prisoners of war. Both forts were immediately demolished. Several cruelties were committed by the Indians on the English prisoners, which the English commander did not use the requisite endeavours to prevent. In violation of the articles of capitulation and of humanity, he not only suffered the British officers and soldiers to be insulted, robbed, and massacred by the Indians, but gave up 20 of the garrison, as an atonement to these barbarians for the same number of their countrymen, who had been killed in the siege. They were put to death with the most excruciating torments.

The earl of Loudon, who had been unaccountably detained in England, did not arrive in Albany till the 29th of May. No determinate plan of operations had been arranged; the season was suffered to pass away, and the capture of Oswego by the enemy had dispirited the colonies, and prevented the adoption of any spirited enterprise. His lordship, however, did all that remained in his power to remedy the negligence of his predecessors in command. Every preparation was made for an early campaign in the spring. He secured the frontiers, reinforced the garrisons, and endeavoured to remove that spirit of disaffection and inactivity, which had been disseminated among the different provinces.

To counteract the depression of the public mind, occasioned by a succession of disastrous events, was the first object of the new ministers, and to do this, it was necessary to display a confidence in themselves. On the meeting of parliament in December, his majesty addressed the two houses in animated language, expressing his assurance, that, under the blessing of Divine Providence, the union, fortitude, and affection of his people would enable him to surmount all difficulties, and vindicate the dignity of his crown against the antient enemy of Great Britain. He declared that the succour and preservation of America constituted a principal object of his solicitude and attention; and observed, that the growing dangers to which the British colonies might stand exposed, from recent losses in that country, demanded resolutions of vigour and dispatch. He said, that an adequate and firm defence at home should occupy the chief place in his thoughts; that, with a view to that object, he had nothing so much at heart as to remove all ground of dissatisfaction from the minds of his people, and for that end he recommended to the care and diligence of the parliament, the framing of a national militia, planned and regulated with an equal regard to the just rights of his crown and of his people. After adverting to the danger which threatened the protestant interest in Germany, from the combination formed against it, he told them, that he had ordered his electoral troops to be withdrawn, relying with pleasure on the zeal and spirit of his people for the defence of his person and realm. Every part of this speech was acceptable to the nation, but the last declaration was received with peculiar satisfaction. To provide against the unfounded dread of an invasion, a body of 12,000 Hessians and Hannoverians, were commanded over, and encamped in different parts of the kingdom. This measure contributed to exasperate the resentment, and foment the turbulence of the people. They reprehended the minister for a measure so pusillanimous and disgraceful; it was asserted in the houses of parliament, and echoed by the people, that by such a proceeding the liberties of the country were endangered, and that the employment of foreign troops evidently implied, that the nation was incapable of defending herself, and must confide her safety to mercenary auxiliaries. The general impression was so warm and uncontrolable, that the populace were exasperated to insult and maltreat the inoffensive Germans. The return of these troops, therefore, to their native country was hailed with sincere and universal gratulations, and contributed in no inconsiderable degree to the popularity of the ministers, and the consequent success of those measures which required the support and sympathy of the whole community.

THE most liberal supplies were immediately granted for carrying on the war. Fifty thousand seamen and marines, and 40,000 men, were voted for the land service. Grants of £8,350,000 were made for the expences of government. These votes, however, did not pass without some animadversion. When it was stated, that a great part of the troops were intended to form an army of observation, for the defence of Hanover, and that a great part of the supplies were demanded to enable his majesty to fulfil his engagements with the king of Prussia, it could not but occur, even to the friends of the ministers, that they had formerly opposed with intrepidity the system of politics now adopted, by which Great Britain, sacrificing the advantages of her insular situation, had been seduced, by her connection with Hanover, to become a principal in the wars of the continent. They expatiated on the enormous amount of the debt, which had been already incurred by supporting this interference. These arguments, whatever may be their force, (and as applied to the connexon of Hanover with England they cannot easily be refuted,) were overpowered by the evident demands of the crisis, and the necessity of counteracting the ambition, and repelling the violence of France. The address was expressed in language the most gratifying to the king, and the supplies were granted with readiness and liberality.

1756. HOSTILITIES had been carried on in the East Indies, for some years, before the courts of Great Britain and France had come to an open rupture. By espousing the quarrels of the princes and nabobs of that country, a pretence was found for perpetual acts of warfare between the two nations. Soon after the death of Aurengzebe, who was the last monarch of distinguished abilities, an universal degeneracy pervaded the empire of Indostan, and those provinces which were most distant from the seat of government, asserted their independence of his successor; or were only in nominal subservience to his authority, which they acknowledged, because it gave a sanction to their own power. The inhabitants of the extensive and fertile country lying on both sides of the Ganges, and extending from that river to the Indus on the west, and to Cape Comorin on the south, are of two distinct descriptions: the Hindoos or Gentoos, who are the Aborigines of Indostan; and the Musselmen or Mahometans, who are descended from those Arabs, Persians, and Tartars, who have at different times invaded India, and gradually extended their conquests through the whole of the peninsula. The Hindoos, a mild and industrious people, are employed under Zimændars, or land-holders, either in manufactures, or in the labours of husbandry. The Zimændars are themselves dependent on their Musselmen-lords; and all the offices of state, the lucrative employments, and the judicial and military appointments are in the hands of the Mahometans. Such are the circumstances of those Hindoos who inhabit the districts conquered by the Musselmen. But there are also others, who, having never been subdued, are still subject to their own rajahs and hereditary kings, whom I have just described, as only acknowledging a nominal superiority, by the payment of tribute or some act of fealty. In these circumstances Thamis Khouli Khan, or Nadir Shah, king of Persia, found the inhabitants of Indostan, when he invaded the empire in 1738, at the invitation of Nizam al Moulouk, grand vizier and subah of the Decan. That conqueror, after he had reduced to subjection the pusillanimous emperor Mehemet, and had laid the empire under enormous contributions, compelled the Mogul to enter into a treaty with him, by which it was stipulated, that the functions of grand vizier, and those of subah, originally an officer invested with the authority of viceroy, or vicar-general in a certain division of the empire, should be rendered hereditary in the families of the present possessors; and the ambitious Nizam al Moulouk was confirmed in the subahship of the Decan, which constituted a third part of the Mogul empire.

SUBORDINATE to the dignity of subah was the office of the nabobs; who, by the constitution of the empire, were governors of provinces, nominated by the emperor, and confirmed by the Mogul. Of those in the Decan, the chief was the nabobship of Arcot, or the Carnatic, extending along the Coromandel coast, from Cape Comorin to the river Kistna, and comprising the territories of the rajah of Tanjore, and the states of Madura and Mazara, which were tributary to the nabob.

The nabob of Arcot, having been deposed by the Mogul, and another appointed in his room, had recourse to the French, who on certain conditions engaged to reinstate him in his government. With their assistance he attacked, defeated, and slew his competitor, resumed the government of Arcot, and punctually performed the conditions which had been stipulated with his French allies.

Mahommed Ali Khan, the son of the deceased nabob, solicited the aid of the English, who assisted him with men, money, and ammunition. Under the pretence of acting as auxiliaries to these princes, the English and French East India Company endeavoured to obtain the expulsion of each other from the peninsula. Victory, however, for the most part, declared in favour of the English, Mahommed Ali Khan was placed on the throne of his father, and the French, reduced by repeated defeats, were obliged to act on the defensive. A mutual agreement was at last entered into by both companies; by which it was stipulated, that they should reciprocally restore the territories taken by each since the year 1748, and that for the future neither should interfere in the differences between the princes of the country. In this war, the extraordinary talents of Mr. Clive, who had formerly served in a civil station, were for the first time displayed. The tranquillity produced by this treaty was but of short duration. The restless ambition of the French could not brook the superiority which the English maintained in India. Insidious intrigue was employed in the place of open hostility. They endeavoured to foment animosities among the nabobs who favoured the English, or were under their protection, and again assisted their enemies with troops to oppose them.

In consequence of an application from the English East India Company, government had dispatched a small fleet under the commands of rear-admirals Watson and Pocock, to support their pretensions, and to protect their commerce. On the arrival of this squadron at Fort St. David's, it was judged adviseable that they should proceed to the attack of Angria, a piratical prince in the neighbourhood of Bombay, who was formidable to all the European powers, and had particularly distressed and annoyed the English, from his vicinity to their settlements. This piratical state had existed longer than a century. Its founder was Kouna Ji Angria. He took possession of the small island of Severndroog, and for some time continued his attacks on Indian vessels trading along that coast. Grown bolder by success, he attacked without distinction the ships of all nations. Under his successors this little nest of robbers flourished and increased, and it became the mutual interest of the European powers, however divided in their views, to extirpate this lawless and universal invader. The Portuguese joined the English in 1722, and attempted to destroy the place of their resort; but their expedition proved disgraceful and abortive: and a similar enterprise, undertaken by the Dutch in 1724, was equally unfortunate. At length the Marattahs, a fierce and rapacious people, upon Angria's refusing to pay the customary tribute, agreed to attack the common enemy by land, while the English attacked them by sea. Admiral Watson, accompanied by colonel Clive, who commanded the land forces, sailed from Bombay on the 7th of February, and on the 12th anchored off the harbour and fort of Geriah, the principal residence of Angria. The chief had quitted the place; but his wife and family remained under the protection of his brother-in-law, who, on being summoned to surrender, by a message from the admiral, replied, that he would defend the place to the last extremity. Upon this, about five in the afternoon, the whole English fleet sailed into the harbour, and in a few minutes silenced the enemy's batteries. Angria's fleet was set on fire by the bursting of a shell, and soon after the magazine of the fort blew up. At five in the morning the place surrendered, and was taken possession of by the English, who found a great number of cannon, a large quantity of ammunition, and money, and effects, to the value of £130,000. Among the prisoners were Angria's wife, children, and mother, whom the admiral treated with becoming humanity.

Soon after the admiral's return from this enterprise, an event occurred, which clouded for a time the prospects of the company, and excited one general feeling of alarm and indignation. A custom had for some time prevailed in these countries, which was productive of the most pernicious consequences. The governors of all the European provinces had assumed the right of granting an asylum to such of the natives of the country as were afraid of oppression or of punishment; obtaining for these acts of protection very considerable bribes. One of the chief officers of Bengal had taken refuge at Calcutta, in order to escape the penalties of his crime. Surajah Doulah, the subah of Bengal, was greatly incensed at this proceeding; and being likewise irritated by the inattention paid to his claims of certain duties, he levied a numerous army, marched to Calcutta, and invested the place, which was then destitute of defence. The governor, under the pretence of being a quaker, took refuge on board a ship in the river, accompanied by the ladies and counsellors, with their most valuable effects, and the books of the company. Mr. Holwell, the second in command, declared that he would stay and defend the place to the last extremity, though 100 soldiers of the garrison had accompanied the party that fled on board. With the assistance of a few gallant officers, he defended the fort for three days with uncommon courage and resolution. At last, overpowered by numbers, deserted by his soldiers, and the enemy having forced their way into the castle, he was obliged to submit; the subah promising, on the word of a soldier, that no injury should be done to him or to his garrison.

A SCENE now occurred, unparalleled in the annals of inhumanity, and to which no language can do justice.

AT five the nabob entered the fort, accompanied by his general Meer Jaffier, and most of the principal officers of his army. He immediately ordered Omichund and Kissendass to be brought before him, and received them with civility; and having bid some officers go and take possession of the company's treasury, he proceeded to the principal apartment of the factory, where he sat in state, and received the compliments of his court and attendants, in magnificent expressions of his prowess and good fortune. Soon after he sent for Mr. Holwell, to whom he expressed much resentment at the presumption of the English in daring to defend the fort, and much dissatisfaction at the smallness of the sum found in the treasury, which did not exceed fifty thousand rupees. Mr. Holwell had two other conferences with him on this subject, before seven o'clock, when the nabob dismissed him with repeated assurances, on the word of a soldier, that he should suffer no harm.

Mr. Holwell, returning to his unfortunate companions, found them assembled, and surrounded with a strong guard. Several buildings on the north and south sides of the fort were already in flames, which approached with so thick a smoke on either hand, that the prisoners imagined their enemies had caused this conflagration, in order to suffocate them between the two fires. On each side of the eastern gate of the fort extended a range of chambers, adjoining to the curtain; and before the chambers a varanda, or open gallery: it was of arched masonry, and intended to shelter the soldiers from the sun and rain, but, being low, almost totally obstructed the chambers behind from the light and air; and whilst some of the guard were looking into other parts of the factory, for proper places to confine the prisoners during the night, the rest ordered them to assemble in ranks under the varanda, on the right hand of the gateway, where they remained for some time, with so little suspicion of their impending fate, that they laughed among themselves at the seeming oddity of this disposition, and amused themselves with conjecturing what they should next be ordered to do. About eight o'clock, those who had been sent to examine the rooms reported, that they found none fit for the purpose. On which the principal officer commanded the prisoners to go into one of the rooms which stood behind them, along the varanda. It was the common dungeon of the garrison, who used to call it the black hole. Many of the prisoners, knowing the place, began to expostulate; upon which the officer ordered his men to cut down those who hesitated; on which the prisoners obeyed. But before all were within, the room was so thronged that the last entered with difficulty. The guard immediately closed and locked the door; confining one hundred and forty-six persons in a room not twenty feet square, with only two small windows, and these obstructed by the varanda.

IT was the hottest season of the year, and the night uncommonly sultry even at this season. The excessive pressure of their bodies against one another, and the intolerable heat which prevailed as soon as the door was shut, convinced the prisoners that it was impossible to live through the night in this horrible confinement; and violent attempts were immediately made to force the door; but without effect, for it opened inward: on which many began to give a loose to rage. Mr. Holwell, who had placed himself at one of the windows, exhorted them to remain composed both in body and mind, as the only means of surviving the night, and his remonstrances produced a short interval of quiet; during which he applied to an old jemautdar, who bore some marks of humanity in his countenance, promising to give him a thousand rupees in the morning, if he would separate the prisoners into two chambers. The old man went to try, but returning in a few minutes, said it was impossible.—Mr. Holwell offered him a larger sum; on which he retired once more, and returned with the fatal sentence, that no relief could be expected, because the nabob was asleep, and no one dared to wake him.

In the mean time, every minute had increased their sufferings. The first effect of their confinement was a profuse and continued sweat, which soon produced intolerable thirst, succeeded by excruciating pains in the breast, with difficulty of breathing little short of suffocation. Various means were tried to obtain more room and air. Every one stripped off his clothes; every hat was put in motion; and these methods affording no relief, it was proposed that they should all sit down on their hams at the same time, and after remaining a short time in this posture, rise all together. This fatal expedient was thrice repeated before they had been confined an hour; and every time, several, unable to rear themselves up again, fell, and were trampled to death by their companions. Attempts were again made to force the door, which, failing as before, redoubled their rage: but their thirst increasing, nothing but water! water! became soon after the general cry. The good jemautdar immediately ordered some skins of water to be brought to the windows; but, instead of relief, his benevolence became a more dreadful cause of destruction; for the sight of the water threw every one into such excessive agitation and ravings, that, unable to resist this violent impulse of nature, none could wait to be regularly served, but each, with the utmost ferocity, battled against those who were likely to get it before him; and in these conflicts many were either pressed to death with the efforts of others, or suffocated by their own. This scene, instead of producing compassion in the guard without, only excited their mirth: and they held up lights to the bars, in order to have the diabolical satisfaction of seeing the deplorable contentions of the sufferers within; who, finding it impossible to get any water whilst it was thus furiously disputed, at length suffered those who were nearest to the windows to convey it in their hats to those behind them. It proved no relief either to their thirst or their sufferings; for the fever increased every moment with the increasing depravity of the air in the dungeon, which had been so often respired, and was saturated with the hot and deleterious effluvia of putrifying bodies, of which the stench was little less than mortal. Before midnight, all who were alive, and had not partaken of the air at the windows, were either in a lethargic stupefaction, or raving with delirium.—Every kind of invective and abuse was uttered, in hopes of provoking the guard to put an end to their miseries, by firing into the dungeon; and whilst some were blaspheming their Creator with the frantic execrations of torment in despair, Heaven was implored by others with wild and incoherent prayers; until the weaker, exhausted by these agitations, at length lay down quietly, and expired on the bodies of their dead or agonizing friends. Those who still survived, in the inward part of the dungeon, finding that the water had afforded them no relief, made a last effort to obtain air, by endeavouring to scramble over the heads of those who had stood between them and the windows, where the utmost strength of every one was employed for two hours, either in maintaining his own ground, or endeavouring to get that of which others were in possession. All regards of compassion and affection were lost, and no one would recede or give way for the relief of another. Faintness sometimes gave short pauses of quiet; but the first motion of any one renewed the struggle through all, under which, ever and anon some one sunk to rise no more. At two o'clock, not more than fifty remained alive. But even this number were too many to partake of the saving air, the contest for which, and life, continued until the morn, long implored, began to break; and, with the hope of relief, gave the few survivors a view of the dead. The survivors then at the window, finding that their intreaties could not prevail on the guard to open the door, it occurred to Mr. Cook, the secretary of the council, that Mr. Holwell, if alive, might have more influence to obtain their relief; and two of the company undertaking the search, discovered him, having still some signs of life; but when they brought him towards the window, every one refused to quit his place, excepting captain Mills, who, with rare generosity, offered to resign his; on which the rest likewise agreed to make room. He had scarcely begun to recover his senses, before an officer, sent by the nabob, came and enquired if the English chief survived; and soon after the same man returned with an order to open the prison. The dead were so thronged, and the survivors had so little strength remaining, that they were employed near half an hour in removing the bodies which lay against the door, before they could clear a passage to go out one at a time; when, of one hundred and forty-six who went in, no more than twenty-three came out alive, the ghastliest forms that ever were seen. The nabob's troops beheld them, and the havock of death from which they had escaped, with indifference; but did not prevent them from removing to a distance, and were immediately obliged, by the intolerable stench, to clear the dungeon, whilst others dug a ditch on the outside of the fort, into which all the dead bodies were promiscuously thrown.

The deliverance of the few who remained alive, was neither owing to compassion nor to regret. The subah had been informed, that there was a considerable treasure secreted in the fort, and that Mr. Holwell knew where it was deposited. It was in vain that he solemnly declared his ignorance of such a treasure; the subah gave no credit to his protestations, but ordered him and three of his friends to be conveyed, loaded with fetters, to the Indian camp. Every variety of torment was inflicted, in the hope of obtaining the disclosure of the imaginary secret, or in the rage of disappointment, till, after a variety of sufferings, for which even the subah at last appeared to display some indications of compassion, they were permitted to retire to a neighbouring settlement, belonging to the Dutch.

While these unfortunate events continued, for some time, to depress that spirit of exultation and of confidence, which had been excited by the fall of Angria; the public mind at home was equally agitated, by the dismission from office of the favourites of the people. The weight of parliamentary influence possessed by the former ministers, still gave them importance; and they had secured their sovereign's favour, by gratifying his attachment for the electorate of Hanover, and his propensity to interfere with the affairs of the continent, as a prince of the empire. Several propositions peculiarly acceptable to the court, on these and other topics, were opposed by Mr. Pitt and his adherents, and this opposition was exaggerated by the associates of the old ministry, who still hovered about the throne. The consequence of their intrigues was the peremptory dismission of the ministers from their respective offices, and Mr. Pitt, by his majesty's express command, resigned the seals on the 5th of April.

As the politics of this period were complicated and mysterious, it will be necessary to delineate the characters of the different parties who advanced pretensions to the management of the state. They consisted of three different factions: the first, highly respectable for their rank and fortune, possessed of a considerable share of parliamentary interest, and commanding influence over the monied classes, was composed of those who had grown into place and power under the old ministry. Their adulation and subservience had rendered them respected by the king; but in some material requisites of political distinction, their weakness was conspicuous; they were deficient in popularity and in talent. The second party, though superior in point of abilities, was possessed of less parliamentary interest, and was much more unpopular. Their influence entirely depended on their connection with the prince of Wales, and after his death gradually subsided. The third party, of which Mr. Pitt was the most conspicuous leader, had little influence in parliament, and less at court; but they possessed in a high degree the support and confidence of the people.

The two former were strenuous advocates for standing armies, for a strict connection with the continent, and for the necessity of securing a majority in the houses of parliament, by the liberal donation of pensions and sinecures. The third and popular party was actuated by principles of a different nature. They viewed, indeed, the increasing power of France in the same light with the two former, and acquiesced in the necessity of prescribing bounds to its extension; but they differed widely in the means to be used for that purpose. They were anxious to render the military operations of Great Britain entirely subservient to our naval strength. The sea, they contended, was our natural element, while the superiority of France is confined to the continent. Our government, they asserted, stood in no need of a standing army, which was always dangerous to freedom, and a well-trained militia would be our best security against invasion. They conceived it possible to influence the minds of men by nobler motives than that of interest; the minister who governs uprightly will never be opposed by the people.

The kingdom was filled with consternation at the dismissal of a ministry, on whom the nation relied to retrieve its honour. Addresses were presented to the throne from all quarters, bearing the most honourable testimony to their conduct, and entreating their restoration, as necessary to the salvation of the country. It was found expedient to attend to the national voice; and his majesty sacrificing his private resentments to the wishes of the people, Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge were restored to their former stations. The unpopular party, however, was not entirely excluded from a share in the administration. Their influence in the privy council, and credit in the house of commons, were too considerable to be despised or neglected. The duke of Newcastle was therefore promoted to the station of first lord of the treasury. Lord Anson was appointed first lord of the admiralty; lord Temple privy-seal; Mr. Fox paymaster of the forces; the duke of Devonshire chamberlain; and lord Gower master of the horse. The measures already pursued by the Newcastle administration had led us too far from the line of naval policy advocated by Mr. Pitt, to permit us to retreat with safety and with honour. He would not have promoted our active interference with the affairs of the continent; but to violate our engagements now that it had been made, would have been equally dangerous and dishonourable. The most vigorous measures were therefore adopted, to support the cause of our continental allies, by immediate resistance and powerful diversion; and the long and splendid succession of glorious events, which it will be soon our pleasing duty to record, present the best testimony to the promptitude, the vigour, and sagacity of the minister.

It was fortunate, indeed, for England, that the fortitude of the individual, to whom the guidance of her affairs was entrusted, was equal to his other qualities: for such was the situation of the king of Prussia, at the opening of the campaign, that a less virtuous and intrepid minister would have abandoned the contest in despair. In the preceding summer, a process had been commenced against Frederic in the Aulic council, and before the diet of the empire. The influence of a family, in which the empire had so long been hereditary, and the formidable confederacy against him, intimidated his friends, and his enemies eagerly seized the opportunity to reduce his power. He was condemned for contumacy, and it was notified to him, that he was placed under the ban of the empire, and fallen from all the dignities and possessions he held under it. The contingents of men and money, ordered to be furnished by the circles of the empire, to put this sentence in execution, were, however, slowly collected. His victory at Lowoschutz had been attended with no other consequence than the surrender of the pass at Pirna. The Austrian army in Bohemia, commanded by prince Charles of Lorraine and M. Brown, amounted to upwards of 100,000 men. The czarina sent 60,000 men, under the command of M. Apraxin, assisted by a powerful fleet, to invade Ducal Prussia; and the Swedes, in hopes of recovering what they had lost in Pomerania, joined the same confederacy, being aided by 6000 troops of Mecklenburgh.

In this perilous situation, threatened on all sides, and apparently on the brink of destruction, the Prussian monarch had no other foundations of self-confidence than his own abilities, and the superior valour and discipline of his troops. Far from being daunted at the formidable confederacy against him, he prepared for the contest with a cool rapidity peculiar to himself. He distinguished between difficulties and impossibilities; and being never discouraged by the former, sometimes appeared to execute the latter. He divided his army into three bodies, which penetrated, at the same time, by different routes into Bohemia; determining to carry the war as far from home as possible. The first body was commanded by M. Schwerin, and entered that kingdom from Silesia; the second, under the prince of Bevern, marched from Lusatia; and the third was commanded by the king in person.

As a prelude to the campaign, the prince of Bevern, on the 21st of April, having possessed himself of some strong posts on the frontiers of Bohemia, marched to attack the Austrian army, amounting to 20,000 men, commanded by count Konigseg, and posted near Reichenbach. The action began at half an hour after six in the morning, and continued until eleven. The Austrians were defeated and put to flight; their loss amounting to 1000 men killed and wounded, while that of the Prussians did not exceed 150.

The king of Prussia, on receiving information of this victory, published the account at the head of his army, by whom it was received with repeated acclamations of applause. This advantage, at the beginning of the campaign, was productive of the most salutary consequences to his Prussian majesty. It facilitated his future operations, intimidated his enemies, and animated his own troops to a spirit of desperate enterprise. The Prussian armies were now in such a situation, that a junction could be formed whenever it should be thought necessary. The intention of Frederic was to draw the enemy, if possible, to a general engagement. They were superior to him in number, and were encamped in a place so strongly fortified, by nature and art, as to be almost impregnable. It was necessary, therefore, to accomplish that object by stratagem, which strength and bravery alone could not have effected. After making a feint as if he intended to proceed towards Agria, the king of Prussia turned suddenly to the left, and joined the other divisions of his force at the place of rendezvous. By this movement, a body of 20,000 men, which had been detached from the Austrian army to observe his motions, were debarred from all communication with their main body. Elated by this advantage, he was resolved to attack the enemy, notwithstanding his own disparity of force. The Austrians, though amounting to 100,000 men, were sensible of the talents of their adversary, and determined to act with caution. Their commanders, prince Charles of Lorraine and M. Brown, determined not to march in quest of the Prussian monarch; but to wait his united force in their camp, and cover the city of Prague from insult.

The river Egra runs from the western boundary of Bohemia, and falls into the Elbe between Dresden and Prague, a little above Lowoschutz, where Frederic had obtained the victory we have recorded in the preceding year. Prague is the capital of the kingdom of Bohemia, and is situated on both sides of the Moldaw, a considerable river, which, running northwards, falls into the Elbe, higher up than the Egra. Frederic was encamped, on the 3rd of May, between the Moldaw and the hills called Weissenburg. Prince Charles of Lorraine, who had a few days before taken the command of the Austrians, had encamped on the right, or east bank of the Moldaw, his left being supported by a hill, and his right extending towards Sterboholi, where he had posted the greatest part of his cavalry. Frederic, leaving one half of his army on the east side of the same river, under the orders of marshal Keith and prince Maurice of Anhalt-Dessau; and with the other half crossed the river and encamped on the east side, near to Czimitz. Marshal Schwerin, arriving next morning, formed with his corps the left wing of Frederic's army, which now consisted of about 68,000 men. A deep ravine, which lay in front of his left, rendered it unattackable. The battle was begun by a successful charge of the Prussian cavalry on those of the Austrians. The infantry then advanced to the attack with more impetuosity than prudence, and were received with such a tremendous fire of artillery, that they were compelled to retire. In this crisis of the engagement, marshal Schwerin, who at the age of 80 years retained all the fire of youth, seeing his troops giving way, seized a pair of colours, and placing himself at the head of his regiment, exclaimed, "Let all brave Prussians follow me." The attack was then renewed with such spirit, that the Austrians were soon routed, and a signal victory was obtained, the enemy having lost 19,000 men slain, and 5000 taken prisoners, with 11 standards and 60 pieces of artillery. This loss was balanced, on the part of the Prussians, by the loss of 18,000 men, among whom was the brave old Schwerin, who was found among the slain, grasping the colours in his hand.

1757. By the event of this battle, it was expected that the Prussians would invest Prague; which they immediately did, the king commanding on one side, and marshal Keith on the other. In four days all communication from without was cut off, the whole city being surrounded with lines and entrenchments.—The number of forces shut up within the walls amounted to 50,000, besides a great many persons of the first rank, viz. prince Charles of Lorraine, marshal Brown, the princes of Saxony, the prince of Modena, the duke d'Aremberg, count Lacy, and several others of great distinction. It was generally imagined, that this city would necessarily fall a sacrifice to the victorious army, the numbers within serving no other purpose than to consume the provisions of a garrison, then but indifferently supplied. Immediately after the blockade was formed, the Prussians took possession of Cziscaberg, an eminence which commanded the town, on which the Austrians had a strong redoubt. The besieged made several vigorous, but ineffectual attempts, to recover this post, which was defended by the Prussians with the utmost resolution.—In order to ease the city of the multitude of forces cooped up useless within the walls, it was resolved to attack the Prussian army in the night, with a body of twelve thousand men, sustained by all the grenadiers, volunteers, Pandours, and Hungarian infantry, and thus, if possible, to open a way, sword in hand, through the camp of the besiegers.

The Prussians, having received intelligence of this design by a deserter, took proper measures for their reception, and in less than a quarter of an hour they were all under arms. But notwithstanding the Prussians were warned of this attempt, it was conducted with so much silence, that nothing was discovered before the Austrians charged their advanced posts. From their beginning the attack on marshal Keith's camp, and the left wing of the Prussian army, encamped on the Moldaw, it is probable the enemy intended to destroy the batteries that were raising, and to attack the bridges of communication which the Prussians had thrown over the Moldaw at Branick and Podaba, about a quarter of a German mile above and below the city. The alarm began about two o'clock, the enemy hoping to come unexpectedly upon the miners; but in this they were disappointed. The piquet of the third battalion of the Prussian guards, who were to sustain the body which covered the works, was thrown into confusion at the first fire from the enemy, owing to the darkness of the night, which rendered it impossible to distinguish the Austrian troops from their own. A lieutenant, who was detached with a party to reconnoitre the enemy, endeavoured, by lighting a fire, to discover their disposition. This had the effect of informing captain Rodig, who commanded the piquet, of their situation, who immediately attacked them on the flank, giving orders to his men to fire in platoons; upon which the enemy fled with the greatest precipitation, being ignorant of the strength of the piquet, as the shouting of the Prussian soldiers made them mistake it for a numerous body. Numbers deserted, some took shelter in Prague, and many were forced into the river, and drowned.—A regiment of the enemy's horse-grenadiers, at the time this attack began, supported by the Hungarian infantry, endeavoured to surprise a redoubt, under an incessant fire upon the whole front of the Prussians; but were repulsed with considerable loss. They renewed the attack three times, and were as often beat back, the Prussians maintaining the post with a firmness and resolution not to be described. On this occasion the battalion of prince Ferdinand of Brunswick suffered greatly.

At three in the morning, the Prussians marched out of their camp to meet the enemy. Part of the army attacked a building called Red-house, at the bottom of a declivity before Wellastowitz. The Pandours, who were in possession of this house, fired upon them incessantly from all the doors and windows, but were at last dislodged. For about two hours the Prussian army were obliged to sustain the fire of the enemy's whole cannon and musketry, which did much execution. At length, the Prussians having abandoned the Red-house, owing to the continued fire which was kept upon it from the artillery of Prague, the Pandours again took possession of it; and the rest of the enemy retired to the city, without in the least effecting their design, leaving behind them many dead and wounded, besides deserters. The Prussians upon this occasion made a few prisoners, although they suffered the loss of several officers and private men. Prince Ferdinand, the king of Prussia's youngest brother, was slightly wounded in the face, and likewise had a horse shot under him.

HITHERTO neither of the parties had received very considerable damage, the operations of the Prussians being confined to a silent blockade, and those of the Austrians to a few slight sallies, in which they were generally repulsed with loss. But the Prussian works being at length completed, and their heavy artillery arrived, they opened four batteries erected on the banks of the Moldaw, and began to play furiously on the city. In the space of twenty-four hours they threw in no less than three hundred bombs, besides an infinite quantity of red-hot balls, which set the city on fire in several places.—The king of Prussia has on this occasion been censured for want of humanity; and indeed the generals on both sides seem to have been actuated by the most horrid barbarity. When the conflagration had lasted for three days, and the inhabitants saw their city on the point of being reduced to a mass of rubbish, they in a body petitioned the commander to hearken to terms; but, instead of granting their request, he turned out 12,000 persons, the least useful in the defence of the city. These were again forced back by the Prussians, which soon brought on a famine, and reduced both the garrison and inhabitants to the necessity of living on horse-flesh, and even that was given out in a very sparing manner. In this melancholy situation, the inhabitants saw no end to their miseries, but by a speedy capitulation, which the commander, who saw himself at the head of a numerous, well-appointed, and desperate army, was determined by no means to listen to. Several resolute and well-conducted sallies were made, but without success, being always rendered fruitless by the vigilance and determined bravery of the Prussians.

IT no doubt will appear a fable to posterity, that near 50,000 men, with a train of artillery, arms, &c. should submit to be shut up for six weeks, and reduced to extremity, by an army of equal force. That of the king did not certainly, at the end of May, exceed that of the Austrians; which will appear evident, if we consider how many men he had lost in the battle, by sickness, desertion, and the numberless detached corps. This army, small as it was, formed a chain of posts, which extended many miles, and was moreover separated by the Moldaw; over which they communicated by two bridges only; the one above, and the other below the town: so that, in fact, the Austrians, had they chose to march out of the place, would have had no more than half the Prussian army to contend with: why therefore they did not, no man that has the least idea of military affairs, can ever comprehend. A torrent carried one of the bridges away; yet did they still continue quiet, and let slip this favourable opportunity, without making any attempt to go out. We have been very often on the ground about Prague, and must own it is, and will be, a matter of wonder and astonishment, that no effort was made to march out. Had they attacked the Prussians, thus separated by a great river, and divided into so many small detachments, they could not fail in their attempt; they must have destroyed their army. It is no less surprising, that so great a general as the king of Prussia should think it possible to reduce an army of 50,000 men, in such an extensive town as Prague, with one of equal force. The supineness of the Austrians justified this attempt, and saved his army from inevitable destruction.—The celebrated M. Belleisle, who knew Prague perfectly well, had, in the preceding war, with 15,000 men, defended it for many months against the Austrians; and, being at last reduced to the greatest extremity, quitted it with 12,000 men, and retired to Egra, with safety and glory. This general wrote a letter, while the king was blockading that town, wherein he says, "Je connois Prague, si j'y etois, avec la moitie des troupes, que le prince Charles y a actuellement je detruirois l'armee Prussienne."

IN this situation, when the empress-queen was on the brink of ruin, her grand army dispersed, and flying in small parties, her princes and commanders shut up in Prague, that capital on the point of surrendering, and the utmost favour the garrison could expect was being made prisoners of war, a general arose, who seemed destined by the hand of Providence to mark the vicissitude of human affairs, and who in return was to reduce his Prussian majesty to as bad a situation, as that in which the empress-queen at present found herself. Leopold count Daun, bred from his infancy in the camp, who had served under the greatest generals, and particularly had studied the art of war under the great Kevenhuller, was now put at the head of the Austrian army, on which depended the fate of the empire. Born of a noble family, and possessing the greatest abilities, he owed not his preferment to servile court policy, but rose slowly and silently from the rank of a subaltern to that of commander-in-chief, by mere dint of superior merit. Arriving within a few miles of the city of Prague, the day after the late defeat, he halted to collect the straggling and dispersed parties of the Austrian army.

Frederic, apprehensive that this army, which now amounted to above 40,000 men, and was continually upon the increase, might not only disturb his operations before Prague, but likewise, by some manœuvre, give the Austrians an opportunity to slip out of that place, judged it necessary to check its farther progress, and prevent its becoming too formidable. For this purpose he detached the prince of Bevern, with about 25,000 men, to attack the Austrian army.

Cautious, subtle, and penetrating to a degree, Daun was too prudent to risk an action in his then circumstances, which, if attended with a defeat, would have put the finishing hand to the ruin of the empress-queen. Besides, he considered his troops as dispirited, sunk with disgrace, and overcome with fatigue. He considered, that such an army was by no means fit to cope with one flushed with success, confident of victory, and fighting under the eye of their sovereign; he therefore retired as the Prussians advanced, encamped at Kolin, and fortified himself strongly, where he was daily joined by numbers of recruits sent to his army. His situation was such, that he could not possibly be attacked but at an evident disadvantage; and by this means he divided the Prussian forces, one half of whom was drawn off from Prague, in order to watch his designs. Here he harassed the enemy, by cutting off their convoys; and restored, by degrees, ardour and confidence to his troops. He was no stranger to the enterprising disposition of the Prussian monarch, and the discipline and bravery of his army, and wisely provided against every contingency. His situation, he was sensible, would prove irksome and embarassing to the enemy, and therefore he improved it to the best advantage.

His Prussian majesty, finding that the count's army still increased, and that it might soon be in a condition to raise the siege, the place being still defended with the utmost bravery, resolved to dislodge the Austrians from their strong post at Kolin, with one part of his army, while the other should continue the blockade at Prague. Marshal Keith endeavoured, with all the reasons he could urge, to dissuade the king from so hazardous an attempt, advising rather to raise the siege entirely, and attack the count with the whole united Prussian force, or wait until he should get possession of the city, or the Austrians quit their advantageous post. By following either of these measures, a certain advantage would accrue. By the first, he might very probably defeat the count; and, by keeping within his lines, the Austrian general might perhaps attempt to raise the siege, by which means he must lose his advantageous situation, and his majesty might then meet him upon equal terms.—But, notwithstanding this prudent advice, the king persisted in his resolution, and, on the 13th of June, left the camp before Prague, attended by a few battalions and squadrons, and joined the prince of Bevern at Milkowitz, not doubting but that the reputation of his late victories would strike a terror into the enemy's troops, and that in consequence they would become an easy conquest. The army of count Daun now amounted to 60,000, deeply entrenched, with a fine and numerous train of artillery. The bottoms of the hills were secured by difficult defiles, redoubts, and batteries, erected on the most advantageous posts, and every accessible part of the camp fortified with lines and heavy pieces of battering cannon.—The personal bravery of the king of Prussia, and his confidence in his troops, were never more conspicuous than on this occasion. With a body of horse and foot, not exceeding 32,000, he undertook to dislodge an army of 60,000, with all the advantages of situation and entrenchments above mentioned.

The king's army, on the 18th of June, came in sight of the Austrian camp, which he found fortified with the heavy cannon of Olmutz, and reinforced with several parties of troops from Moravia and Austria, which had joined them during his march from Prague. The Austrians were drawn up in three lines, on the high grounds between Genlitz and St. John Baptist. Notwithstanding the difficulties the king's troops had to encounter, they marched up to the attack with the most amazing firmness and intrepidity, amidst an incessant fire from the enemy's batteries, which swept away multitudes. The action began about three o'clock in the afternoon, when the Prussian infantry drove the Austrians from two eminences secured with heavy cannon; but, immediately after, in attacking a third eminence, they were taken in flank by grape-shot poured from the enemy's batteries, and, after a most horrid slaughter, thrown into disorder. The king, animating his troops by his presence, soon rallied them, and they returned to the charge, but without effect. They were a second time repulsed. Prince Ferdinand did every thing in the power of a great general, to retrieve the honour of the day, but to no purpose. Seven times did he lead the infantry on to the attack, and as often were they beat back.—Every manœuvre was put in practice to gain a settlement in the Austrian camp, and all were attended with the same want of success. The Austrian general, in all his operations, cautious, penetrating, and decisive, was every where present, and neglected none of those nicer strokes on which the fate of a day frequently depends. Intimately acquainted with the intrepid bravery and skilful conduct of his Prussian majesty, he exposed himself in every perilous situation, in order to infuse courage into his troops, who every where caught the fire of emulation from their general, and behaved with the utmost resolution.

When the Prussian infantry had thus been repeatedly drove back, a most furious attack was made by the cavalry, headed by his majesty in person, upon the enemy's left wing, who received them with amazing fortitude, and soon threw them into confusion.—At last, when the king saw no possibility of changing the fortune of the day, but loss following loss, and misfortune succeeding misfortune, he drew off the remains of his army in such good order as to prevent a pursuit, and likewise to protect his artillery and baggage from falling a prey to the enemy, and retreated to Nimberg.

Leaving the command of this shattered army with the prince of Bevern, although his majesty had been upon horseback the whole day, without taking any repose, he set off immediately for the camp before Prague, where he arrived next morning, bringing the first news of his own defeat.—He immediately gave orders for raising the siege, which was executed with so much secrecy and dispatch, that all his artillery, ammunition, and baggage were sent off, and the army on their march, before the garrison knew any thing of the battle. In this action, the loss on both sides was very considerable. The killed and wounded, on the side of the Prussians, amounted to between 8000 and 9000 men. Count Daun received two slight wounds, and had a horse shot under him. As soon as the garrison of Prague was informed of the retreat of the Prussians, a considerable body of Austrians, under the command of prince Charles of Lorraine, sallied out in pursuit; but, when they came up with their rear, they found it too well covered to hazard an attack, and therefore returned to Prague, leaving the Prussian army to pursue its route unmolested.

Thus ended the battle of Kolin, and siege of Prague; which, if we advert to consequences, may be reckoned the severest check his Prussian majesty received during the war. —By the loss of this battle, he found himself under the necessity of evacuating Bohemia, the conquest of which kingdom he was upon the eve of accomplishing. His army too, besides the loss sustained in killed and wounded, suffered greatly by sickness and desertion; and the Austrians, from their late success, and consequent junction, were become too powerful for further opposition. He was therefore obliged to take refuge in Saxony, until an opportunity should offer of retrieving his misfortunes, which, great as they were, he bore with a heroism only natural to the most exalted minds.

The king of Prussia has laid himself open to the imputation of rashness, and want of foresight, in the affair at Kolin. His principal error seems to have been, too much confidence in his own abilities, and too much contempt for those of his enemies. The necessity of his affairs sometimes prompted him to attempt things much above the means he had to accomplish them; and therefore no wonder that many of his projects, though in appearance plausible, wanted solidity, and consequently have not always been attended with success.—The conduct of Daun in this affair was perfectly uniform, and founded upon reasonable principles. His motions were always changed according to the circumstances; now slow and dilatory, now vigorous and active; and he permitted no blunder of the enemy to pass, of which he did not take advantage.

I HAVE been thus particular in the detail of the singular circumstances attending the campaign of 1757, in Bohemia, because I have been enabled to describe the circumstances, as they occurred, chiefly in the language of an eye-witness, and because the events of the year are peculiarly characteristic of the weakness and the talents, the courage and the rashness, the faults and the virtues of the king of Prussia.

THE French had this year sent two armies into the field; one under Soubize, of 25,000 men, who, after having taken possession of Cleves, Menrs, and Gueldres, crossed the Rhine, and joined the army of the empire; another, under d'Etrees, of 30,000 men, seized on Embden, and whatever else belonged to Prussia in East Friezland, and marched through Westphalia into Hanover, where the duke of Cumberland opposed them with 40,000 men, He fell back gradually as they advanced: at length he made a feeble attempt to repulse them at Hammelen, where it was thought that their superiority would be the least dangerous. Being forced from the field of battle, he retreated towards Stade, a situation which allowed him as little opportunity to retreat, as the number of his forces to advance, so that he was obliged to come to a capitulation, by which the only allies of Prussia that could give any effectual resistance laid down their arms, and were only made prisoners of war. This unfortunate event occurred at Hastenbak, where it was hoped the enemy would have the least opportunity of coming to general action. From the circumstances we have mentioned, they were therefore compelled to sign a capitulation, distinguished by the name of the treaty of Closter-Steven, by which the whole Hanoverian army, under the duke's command, were sent into quarters of cantonment, as prisoners of war on parole. Thus ended the operations of the army of observation.

PROUD of his rank, highly susceptible of flattery, and, though utterly destitute of education, entertaining an exalted opinion of his own acquisitions and abilities, the duke of Cumberland despised the salutary advice of his subordinate generals, and at the commencement of this campaign suffered the French to take every advantage, while he remained in his camp irresolute and inactive. Permitting the French army to pass the Weser was his first error; and instead of retiring by the way of Haberstadt to Magdenburgh, where, after a march of 100 miles, his army would have been in a place of safety, he marched 150 miles, successively retreating from Hamelen to Nienberg, Hoyd, Rothenberg, Selsingen, and finally to Stade. His operations in Germany being now at an end, he set off for England, where he arrived about the middle of October, and soon after resigned all his military offices, retiring, like another Cincinnatus, from the hurry and bustle of war, if not with equal glory, with a better fortune, and a better farm.

SUCH a multitude of enemies now threatened the king of Prussia on all sides, that to extricate himself from his present desperate situation, seemed almost beyond the power of human wisdom or valour. A numerous body of Austrians, having penetrated into Silesia, laid it under contribution, and besieged Schweidnitz, the key of that duchy, the original cause of the war. Twenty-two thousand Swedes penetrated into Prussian Pomerania, captured the towns of Anclaim and Demmain, and exacted heavy contributions. Richlieu, who now commanded the grand army of France, being freed from all opposition on the side of Hanover, by the treaty of Closter-Steven, turned his arms against Haberstadt and the old marche of Brandenburg, where, after he had chastised the whole country by severe exactions, he plundered the towns. The army of the empire, reinforced by one under Soubize, of 25,000 men, was in full march for Saxony, a circumstance which enabled marshal Daun to employ his whole force in the reduction of Silesia. General Haddick, who with the Austrians under him had penetrated to Lusatia, and taken Zittau, passed by the Prussian armies, and suddenly presenting himself before Berlin, obliged it to pay a large sum, to prevent the city from being plundered. The Russians, after a long delay, entered Ducal Prussia, and committed horrible cruelties and devastations. Lehwald, the Prussian general, was ordered to engage them at any hazard: with 30,000 men he attacked them, though double in number, and strongly entrenched in a very advantageous situation; and, though he was repulsed, he killed five times as many of the enemy as he lost of his own men, remaining more formidable after his defeat, than the Russians after their victory. They kept their post, however, and did not allow the king to derive any assistance from his army in that quarter; so that he was obliged, with what forces he had, to attack and to repel the enemy. Like a lion hemmed in on every side, he advanced sometimes against one army, and sometimes against another. His enemies fled before him; but while he pursued the fugitives, fresh troops pressed upon his rear: so that he was continually harassed and distressed, and regarded as verging to that destruction, which, a few months before, had menaced the house of Austria. The fatigues to which he was exposed, and the anxiety which preyed upon his mind, had reduced him to a skeleton; he was almost always on horseback, he often lay on the bare ground, and suffered greater distress than the meanest of his soldiers, who were now greatly reduced in numbers; since neither recruits, money, nor provisions could be procured, as he lay under the ban of the empire, and had lost the greater part of his dominions.

Notwithstanding this deplorable situation of his affairs, hope never deserted him; depending on his own conduct, and the courage and fidelity of his troops, he determined to strike a decisive blow, as soon as the winter came in, when it would be impossible for a discomfited army to reappear in the field. For this reason he allowed the combined armies of France and the emperor to advance into Saxony, and to threaten the siege of Leipsic, before he moved against them. At his approach they retreated; but being reinforced by numbers, marched against him, and he retreated in his turn. At length, after various movements, he resolved to call in his scattered detachments, and to give them battle. The enemy, though amounting to 50,000, retired with precipitation beyond the Saale, a river since distinguished by the retreat of Napoleon from Leipsic along its course; but he pursued them closely, with fewer than 25,000 men, and reduced them to the necessity of fighting. His troops called for the signal of battle. The French cavalry advanced with great spirit; but being repulsed, they gained an eminence, on which they repelled the attacks of the Prussians with vigour. At length they were totally routed, and their disaster dismayed the infantry, who made but a feeble resistance. The king, exposed to the hottest fire, led on his troops, who killed 3000 on the spot, took 6000, and dispersed the rest. They were seized with a panic; and night alone saved from entire destruction an army, that in the morning was so great and formidable.

While the Prussian arms were thus gloriously employed in Saxony, the Austrians were not idle in Silesia. Having reduced Schweidnitz, and made the garrison, consisting of 4000 men, prisoners of war, they joined their whole force, and attacked the prince of Bevern, who was posted with his army in a strongly entrenched camp, to cover Breslaw. The Prussians sustained their repeated attacks with singular intrepidity, and slaughtered prodigious numbers; but when one wing of their army had actually quitted the field, and the other was meditating a retreat, the Prussian general, by some unaccountable fatality, adopted the same resolution, and retired behind the Oder. Breslaw, therefore, with all its treasures and military stores, fell into the hands of the Austrians. The king was, in the mean time, hastening by rapid marches to the defence of Silesia; with those troops which he had collected from a hundred miles distance, to fight a superior army at Rosbach, he was traversing a country of 200 miles in extent, in order to fight an army still more formidable; proceeding from hardships to still greater hardships, and from dangers to dangers still more imminent. In his march there occurred an accident, which, while it added to the strength of his army, seemed to be an omen of success.

The escort which conducted the garrison of Schweidnitz to a place of safety, was but weak: the captives, hearing on their march of the victory of Rosbach, rose unanimously upon them, and, seizing their arms, directed their march, by the guidance of the same good fortune which enabled them to regain their liberty, to the king of Prussia's army. The Austrians, confiding in their numbers, left the Prince of Bevern's entrenched camp, and marched in search of the Prussians, who were no less eager for an engagement. They met at the village of Leuthen, and, though the Austrians, under count Daun, were twice as numerous as their enemies, and had felled many trees in the causeways which fronted their lines, the Prussians surmounted every obstacle, and put them to a total rout. Six thousand Austrians were left on the field, 15,000 were taken, and 200 cannon were left in the possession of the victors. Breslaw soon after surrendered, and the garrison, amounting to 13,000 men, were made prisoners of war. In consequence of these victories, nothing remained to the empress-queen, in all Silesia, except the foloru garrison of Schweidnitz. The Russians, intimidated by the king of Prussia's victories, and unable to procure subsistence in a country which they had desolated, retreated from Prussia, and left Lehwald at liberty to turn his arms against the Swedes, who performed nothing worthy of their antient glory. He stripped them of all their territories in Pomerania, except Stralsund, and subjected them to contribution. This succession of unexpected victory encouraged his only ally, the king of Great Britain, to resent the oppression of the French, in his electoral dominions, who, under the command of d'Etrees, committed every act of avarice and atrocity. Every article of the treaty of Closter-Steven was violated; while the gallant Hanoverians, by their regard to that treaty, were prevented from indulging their spirit of resistance, notwithstanding the enormous exactions of the French general, and the rapine and licentiousness of the soldiery. It was not till an attempt was made to deprive them of their arms, and thus to render them incapable of all resistance, that they openly defied the power of their invaders, and placing themselves beneath the command of prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, chastised and defeated the enemy. They took the town and castle of Harburg, by that event circumscribing the quarters of the French while his own were extended. Being joined by a body of Prussian horse, they began their operations about the middle of February, and compelled the enemy to retire before them. The French troops were now commanded by Clermont, the third general in the course of one campaign. He saw that it was in vain to collect his forces, or to oppose the Hanoverians in the field, while his troops were destitute of clothes, of discipline, of health; while the officers disgraced their rank, and the soldiers neglected their obedience; while his hospitals were full, and his magazines empty. He therefore determined to evacuate Germany, as the only probable means of preserving the remains of an army, once so formidable and so numerous. In the execution of this plan he found much difficulty. The enemy hung upon his rear; the hussars and light troops continually harassed and intercepted his parties; while no other modes of retaliation were within the reach of the French, than inhuman cruelties and brutalities exercised against the unarmed inhabitants. The only place where they made any considerable resistance was at Minden, of which the garrison, consisting of 4000 men, were made prisoners of war. Such were the courage, the fortitude, and the talent of the king of Prussia, that they retrieved, not only his own disasters, but those of his allies; and to his example England was partly indebted for that spirit of enterprise, and that immoveable self-confidence, which rendered her arms triumphant in every quarter of the globe.

It still remained, however, to the completion of the recovery of Silesia, that the Austrians should be dispossessed of the fortress of Schweidnitz. Frederic, therefore, prepared for the siege, in the midst of so severe a season, that some hundreds of the centinels dropped dead on their posts, while the army was employed in the blockade. How rarely are the courage and the genius of the warrior combined with the virtue of humanity? The most splendid achievements lose their lustre, when accompanied by such acts of deliberate and heartless inhumanity.

CHAPTER XIV.

GEORGE II.

Expedition to Rochfort—Capture of the Isle of Aix—Failure of the Enterprise—Trial of Sir John Mordaunt—Naval Exploits—Attempt on Louisburg—Its Failure—Disasters in America—Capture by the French of Fort William Henry—Successes in the East Indies—Recapture of Calcutta—Treaty with Serajah Doulah—Surrender of Chandanagore—Defeat of Serajah Doulah—His Assassination—Attack upon St. Maloe's—Capture of Cherburg—The English defeated at St. Cas—Fall of Louisburg—Defeat of the English at Ticonderaga—Naval Exploits—Proceedings of Ferdinand—Campaign of the King of Prussia.

THE French had at this time, in a manner, evacuated their own country, to fall upon Germany with their whole force. Exhausted of troops, the demands of service greatly exceeded the few that were left; and so vigorous an attention to the prosecution of the war on the continent, had diverted the attention of the government from maritime affairs. The English ministry, aware of these circumstances, projected an expedition, to which the situation of France was peculiarly favourable. To make a diversion in favour of the king of Prussia, and at the same time to give an effectual blow to the marine of France, were the objects of this enterprise. To effect this purpose, an attack upon one of her chief arsenals was determined; and private intelligence directed the views of the minister to Rochfort, a place little inferior to Brest in docks, yards, and magazines of naval stores. The dispatch required in an expedition of this nature was obvious, and Mr. Pitt used every endeavour to accelerate the sailing of the fleet; but such was the negligence of the contractors, that though the troops and ships of war were ready early in the month of August, they did not sail from Spithead till the 8th of September. This formidable armament consisted of sixteen ships of the line, seven frigates, two bomb-ketches, two fire ships, and fifty-five transports, on board of which were ten regiments of foot, two regiments of marines, and a formidable train of artillery. Sir Edward Hawke, with admirals Knowles and Broderic, commanded the fleet; and sir John Mordaunt, with generals Conway and Cornwallis, commanded the army.

THE destination of the armament was known only to the ministers and to the admiral. On the 23rd of September, about eight in the morning, the van of the fleet stood towards the isle of Aix, which lies in the mouth of the river leading up to Rochfort: the rest of the ships anchoring at two leagues distant from the island, captain Howe, in the Magnanime, led the van. About noon, the French fired at him from one of the forts, but did little execution. He continued his course with the greatest composure, without firing a single gun; till, having gained the length of the fort, he bore down, and dropped his anchors as close to the wall as the ships could come. He then began to return their salutations, and his fire became incessant. The fort, unable to withstand so dreadful a cannonade, surrendered in less than an hour, and part of the land forces were put on shore to take possession of the island.

THIS first conquest, however unimportant, gave animation and confidence to the whole fleet; and had the troops been landed that night, or in the morning, there is every reason to believe the enterprise would have succeeded in all its bearings. But, as if it had been intended to give the enemy time to recover from their confusion, and collect their forces, eight days were suffered to elapse, in holding councils of war, and making soundings along the shore.

The day after the surrender of the isle of Aix, sir Edward Hawke sent admiral Broderic, with three skilful captains, to reconnoitre the coast, and to fix upon a proper place for landing the troops which were intended to act against Rochfort. They reported, that there were two places at which the troops might be conveniently landed, and that there was a small fort at one of these places, which, according to the opinion of colonel Wolfe, might be easily silenced by a single ship. In consequence of these reports, the commander-in-chief seemed determined to proceed; but after much deliberation, and many fruitless discussions, the land officers, in a council of war, determined to return to England, having previously received a letter from sir Edward Hawke, declaring that he would set sail, unless the general officers should have further military operations to propose, of sufficient consequence to justify the detention of the squadron under his command. Their first resolution was changed, on the receipt of this letter, and in another council of war, composed of the same persons with the former, they unanimously resolved, that it was advisable to land the troops.

On the 28th of September, orders were therefore issued, that the troops should be ready to disembark from the transports at midnight. The difficulties attending these orders were obvious to the most unobserving soldier in the fleet. The distance of the ships was great, from the destined place of landing, and two distinct encampments were reported to be observed at a little distance from the shore. The courage, however, and enthusiasm of the seamen were so conspicuous, that the boats were filled before the time appointed. The night was cold and boisterous, and the boats, crowded with men, remained beating against the sides of the vessels for the space of four hours; at the expiration of which time they were ordered to return to their respective ships. The two following days were spent in blowing up the fortifications in the isle of Aix, and on the 1st of October the fleet, with the army on board, made the best of its way home, where they all arrived in safety on the 6th of the same month. The just expectations of the nation, from an armament so formidable, terminated in the most bitter disappointment. Sir John Mordaunt was brought to a court-martial, by which, from the uncertainty of the evidence against him, he was acquitted. But the public were far from satisfied. The contrast between the lenity of this sentence, and that of the unfortunate Byng, excited universal discontent; and, in the tumult of popular dissatisfaction, the failure of the expedition was even attributed to the fears of his Britannic majesty, lest the measures of his new and obnoxious ministry should be so successful, as to render their retention in power indispensible to the administration of government.

In the midst of these misfortunes and disappointments, some consolation still remained to the British nation, in the exploits performed by her naval heroes, and in the bravery and wisdom of her commanders in the East Indies. Captain Forest, having been detached, with three frigates, from admiral Coates's fleet, encountered, off cape François in the West Indies, four French men of war, and, after a hard-fought action of above two hours, forced them to take refuge in their harbour; after which he captured nine St. Domingo merchantmen, with a single ship. Several exploits were performed by the English privateers in the narrow seas. Captain Gilchrist distinguished himself by a gallant action with the Emeraude, which he captured; but the most singular engagement was that of captain Death, in the Terrible of 26 guns, with the Vengeance of 36. The latter having retaken a large French Domingo ship, which Death had captured, a battle ensued between the Terrible and the Vengeance, assisted by her prize, which was fought with desperate fury, till the English captain and nearly all his officers were slain. The enemy then boarded the Terrible, and for a crew they found 26 men alive, 16 of whom were disabled, and the other 10 wounded.

The consequences of the ill-conducted councils of the old ministry, still continued to spread their baneful influence over the British operations in America. Want of unanimity in our measures at home, had produced carelessness and inactivity in our commanders abroad. The spirit of party discord had pervaded the camp as well as the cabinet. Our commanders knew not to whom they should be accountable for their neglect of duty, or from whom they were to receive the reward of their services; and were consequently deficient in that firmness of purpose, and boldness of enterprise, without which the most splendid talents and the best intentions are inefficient.

An enterprise, which had been planned against Crown Point, was superseded by another, for the reduction of Louisburg in Cape Breton. Lord Loudon had collected a body of 6000 troops, with which he embarked at New York on the 19th of June, and arrived at Halifax on the 29th. Admiral Holbourne did not reach that rendezvous before the 9th of July. So much time having been lost, it was naturally imagined that the commanders would proceed immediately to action; but, as if delay had formed an essential part of their instructions, nearly a month was consumed at Halifax, in exercising the troops, and accustoming them to various manœuvres of attack and defence. When this formidable armament was ready to proceed to its place of destination, a circumstance occurred, which rendered the enterprise abortive. A packet, supposed to be sent out by stratagem, to deceive the English commanders, threw itself in the way of the English fleet, and was taken, after a chase of many hours, with all her dispatches. By the letters contained in this pretended packet, the naval strength at Louisburgh was stated at seventeen ships of the line and three frigates; and the land forces at 6000 Europeans, 3000 natives, and 300 Indians. It was likewise observed, that the place was well supplied with military stores, and that the people were desirous of nothing more earnestly than to be attacked. This intelligence immediately suspended the preparations against Louisburgh, and in a council of war, it was determined for the present to abandon the expedition. The commanders were determined to trust nothing to fortune or resolution. Every circumstance of difficulty or danger was weighed in the scale of rigid prudence, and nothing therefore was accomplished. Lord Loudon, with the land forces, returned to New York; and the admiral continued for some time cruising off Cape Breton, in expectation of drawing the French fleet to an engagement, or, if that was found impossible, to block up the harbour of Louisburgh. In both these expectations he was disappointed. The French, whose force was greatly inferior to his, were too prudent to attack him; and on the 25th of September a violent storm arose, which 1757. dispersed and scattered his fleet, one ship being lost, eleven dismasted, and the rest very much damaged. Leaving eight men of war to protect the trade, watch Louisburgh, and annoy the enemy, he returned to England.

The proceedings in America, during the remainder of the year, were a series of disgraces and disappointments. By taking Oswego the French became undisputed masters of the lakes, and the English were unable to prevent them from collecting from all parts, and compelling them to act in their favour. Instead of endeavouring to prevent this destructive alliance, we abandoned to the mercy of the enemy all the country of the five nations, the only body of Indians who preserved towards us even the appearance of friendship. Our forts were demolished, our frontier invaded, by the French and their savage allies, who destroyed all the settlements on the Mohawk's river, and the German flats, and at length commenced the siege of fort William Henry, on the southern edge of lake George. In this fortress was a garrison of 2500 men, and general Webb, with about 4000 men, was posted in its vicinity. The northern provinces having been exhausted of troops, for the expedition against Louisburgh, the frontiers were left exposed to the designs of the French, who prepared to take advantage of their absence. On this occasion the activity and vigilance of M. Montcalm were eminently conspicuous. No sooner was it known that the troops were embarked for Halifax, than he assembled an army of 8000 men, including Canadians, and Indians drawn from Crown Point, Ticonderaga, and the adjacent posts. The assembling of these forces was not conducted with so much secrecy, but that an early account of it was transmitted to general Webb. That commander gave no credit to the report, believing it impossible that the French could collect a force, sufficient to dispute the possession of the fort with him and the garrison. His incredulity was attended with the most fatal effects No care was taken to collect the militia; or to render effectual his actual means of defence. On the 2nd of August, Montcalm appeared on the lake, which so intimidated Webb, that he marched away early the next morning, leaving the defence of the fort to colonels Young and Monro.

Montcalm, informed of Webb's retreat, summoned the garrison to surrender; but was given to understand from colonel Monro, that the fort would be defended to the last extremity. The garrison behaved with skill and courage, and resisted for four days all the efforts of the enemy; but their cannon and mortars having burst, in consequence of previous neglect; being left without any prospect of succour; and a letter from general Webb, exhorting them to surrender, being intercepted by M. Montcalm, and sent into the fort, they capitulated on the 9th of August. They engaged not to serve against the French for eighteen months, and obtained the favour of marching out of the fort with their arms and baggage. The savages accompanying the French army paid so little regard to the terms of capitulation, that they plundered the English soldiers as they marched out, scalped the Indians and blacks who had been in the garrison, and practised many other inhumanities, from which the French pretended to restrain them, but without effect. They demolished the fort, and carried off all that could be conveyed: thus terminating a disgraceful and inglorious campaign, in which an army of 20,000 men, exclusive of provincials, provided with every requisite of successful warfare, was permitted to loiter away a year in total inactivity; while the French, with inferior numbers, succeeded in every enterprise which they were animated to attempt by the fatuity of their enemies.

It was in the East that success began first to dawn upon the British arms. No sooner did intelligence of the fatal disaster at Calcutta arrive at Madras, than admiral Watson, with colonel Clive and several regiments of infantry, sailed to take revenge for the cruelties practised on their countrymen by the nabob. After a tedious voyage, he arrived at the port of Belasore, in the kingdom of Bengal, on the 5th of December. Entering the Ganges, he proceeded to attack the fort of Busbudgia, which opened a passage to Calcutta, the scene of the deplorable sufferings of so many Britons. After a short resistance, he made himself master of the fort, the soldiers and sailors vieing with each other in their determination to revenge the death of their countrymen, and to restore the honour of England. Proceeding up the Hughly branch in the beginning of January, the admiral anchored before Calcutta; and after a faint resistance from the Indian garrison, and a few discharges of artillery, accompanied by an attack from the troops under Clive and Coote, the fortress was reduced. Advancing up the river, they with equal ease made themselves masters of the town and fortress of Hughly, of which the acquisition was rendered more valuable, by the immense quantity of stores, ammunition, and provisions, which had there been deposited by the nabob.

The nabob was now convinced of the necessity of providing a more respectable force to oppose the progress of the British arms, than the feeble garrisons of inexperienced Indians. Aided by French officers, engineers, and gunners, he assembled an army of 1000 horse and 15,000 foot. With this numerous body he took the route of Calcutta, and on the 2nd of February passed the English camp, at the distance of a mile, and pitched his tents on an advantageous piece of ground near Calcutta. Notwithstanding his great superiority of numbers, the British had too frequently experienced the imbecility and cowardice of an Indian army, to hesitate respecting the policy of an immediate conflict. A detachment of 600 sailors was draughted from the several ships, to join colonel Clive, with the purpose of driving the nabob from his camp. On the 5th of February, about five in the morning, the British army advanced towards the enemy, and notwithstanding his superiority of numbers, defeated him with great slaughter; and compelled him to accede to a treaty, in which he agreed to restore the company's factories; he permitted the English to fortify Calcutta in whatsoever manner they should think expedient; allowed them to coin gold and silver in a mint of their own; exempted all merchandize, passing with their passports, from tax, fee, or imposition; acceded to the possession of thirty-eight villages, of which a grant had been obtained by the emperor in 1717, and confirmed all the privileges which had been granted to them by former emperors, since their arrival in the province.

The English commanders were well aware that nothing would effectually enforce the performance of this treaty or prevent Serajah

Doulah from seizing the first opportunity of affording succours to the French, but the conviction that they were unable to contend with the power and courage of the English; they committed to Mr. Watts full powers, as an agent at his court of Muxadavad, and proceeded to invest Chandernagore. The fortress was garrisoned by 600 Europeans and 300 sepoys. But the British forces, now strengthened by three ships under admiral Pococke, carried on their operations with so much spirit, that the governor was compelled to surrender, after a siege of seven days. The perfidy of Serajah Doulah was turned against himself. Being apprised by Watts, that several of the chief men in his court and army were disposed to revolt, the British general employed that agent to intrigue with Meer Jaffier, the nabob's general, and by his intervention and that of Omichund, whom he made the dupe of his artifice, he concluded a treaty with the traitor, by which he engaged to assist with all their forces in raising him to the nabobship of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa, on condition of his devoting himself to the service of the company, and joining strenuously in the wars with Serajah Doulah and his allies.

The admiral, therefore, engaged to garrison Chandernagore with his seamen, while colonel Clive took the field with an army of 1000 Europeans and 2000 Indians, besides 50 seamen to be employed as gunners, and in directing the artillery. He advanced towards Plassey, where the nabob's army, consisting of 50,000 foot and 18,000 horse, with 50 pieces of artillery, was posted to guard the passage along the Hughly to Muxadavad. However lightly the British commander might estimate the Indian troops, it appeared rash and desperate to march up to the mouths of so numerous an artillery, which was placed in a commanding situation, and under the direction of French gunners. A fortunate circumstance relieved him from this embarrassment. A heavy shower of rain induced the enemy to draw their cannon for shelter into the camp. Clive immediately availed himself of this circumstance, and placed a detachment in such a position as to prevent them from being again brought into action. Three well directed attacks were made upon the enemy's trenches, all of which were attended by success; the nabob's army was completely routed, and forty-two pieces of cannon fell into the hands of the victors, whose loss was inconsiderable.

Such was the facility with which the most important conquests were obtained over a weak, effeminate, and unwarlike people. The customs, habits, and opinions of the Asiatics, all tend to enfeeble the body, and debilitate the mind. Let us conceive a numerous army led on to battle, in long silken garments, with no other courage than what they possess from the inspiration of opium, with the same views whether defeated or victorious; their general mounted on an elephant, and consequently a more conspicuous object of aim; their artillery drawn by oxen, impatient and furious on the slightest wound.—If we reflect on all these circumstances, we shall not be surprised at their most numerous armies being defeated by a handful of European troops, hardened by discipline, and animated by honour.

Meer Murdeen, the general in whom the Serajah placed the greatest confidence, being among the slain, he adopted the pusillanimous and desperate resolution of retreating towards his capital. Being pursued and harassed by the English, he made his escape, with 2000 horsemen, to the city. Immediately on the appearance of victory in favour of the English, Meer Jaffier Ali Kawn, and the other conspirators, declared themselves openly against their defeated sovereign, and hastened to secure Muxadavad, whither they were soon followed by the British army. In a few days, Jaffier was acknowledged by the English as nabob of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa. Serajah Doulah, amidst all the insignia of Asiatic luxury, surrounded by eunuchs and courtezans, was filled with terror at the approach of the confederate army. Destitute of resources, he attempted to escape in a boat, but was betrayed and brought back to Muxadavad. Presenting himself before Meer Jaffier, who had already taken possession of his palace, he prostrated himself before the traitor, who had owed his advancement to the patronage of Serajah and of his uncle Allaverde, and with tears implored his life. When he was withdrawn, Meer Jaffier affected to hold a council respecting his fate. His doom was not pronounced; but a tyrant's will, on such occasions, is easily conjectured, and is most acceptably executed by those who, penetrating the veil of clemency, by which he would appear to shade his cruelty, anticipate his orders. The unfortunate Serajah Doulah fell by the hands of a band of ruffians, in one of the apartments of the palace.

The advantages derived from this revolution in Bengal were great and extensive. The French were prohibited from settling in the three provinces of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa; the company's territories were greatly enlarged; their privileges were confirmed; two millions sterling were granted, as an indemnification to the sufferers at Calcutta; a lease was granted to the company of the salt-petre at Patna; and the army and navy were rewarded with a present of £625,000, besides immense riches in jewels bestowed on the officers. The public exultation at these advantages was, in some degree, repressed by the death of admiral Watson, who fell a victim to the unwholesomeness of the climate, after having established a lasting reputation for his wisdom, his courage, and his humanity.

During these transactions in Bengal, hostilities had been re-commenced in the southern provinces, and had been carried on with various success. Monsieur de Bussy, availing himself of the diversion of the British forces in Bengal, made himself master of several factories in the province of Rajah Mundrum, on the Coromandel coast. On the other hand, the presidency of Madras, being afraid lest their enemy should establish himself in Madura, where he was negotiating with the Jemautdars, dispatched captain Calliaud, with the troops which he commanded at Tritchinopoly, to attempt its reduction. That officer, after several ineffectual attempts to reduce it by force, obtained it by capitulation. In the mean time, the French force, under Monsieur d'Anteuil, had been defeated by Calliaud, in an attack on Tritchinopoly; and the English detachments under the respective commands of colonels Ford and Aldercorn, were foiled in their attempts on the fortresses of Nellore and Wandewash.

So deep and so general was the consternation excited by the failure of the expedition against Rochfort, that even the ministry had almost yielded to despair of the future progress of the war, and had nearly determined to leave the king of Prussia to his fate. It was supposed that no military efforts could save him, and that the only hope remaining was to make the best terms possible with his victorious enemies. The king of Great Britain was actually meditating a negotiation of this nature, when his distressed ally expostulated with him to the following purpose: "Is it possible that your majesty can have so little fortitude and constancy, as to be dispirited by a slight reverse of fortune? Are our affairs so ruinous that they cannot be repaired? Consider the step you have made me undertake, and remember you are the cause of all my misfortunes. I should never have abandoned my former alliances, but for your flattering assurances. I do not now repent of the treaty concluded between us; but I entreat that you will not ingloriously leave me at the mercy of my enemies, after having brought upon me all the powers of Europe." In this terrible situation, the ministry of Britain determined, from motives of generosity rather than of interest, to support his declining cause; and success, which had so long forsaken her arms, began to return with redoubled splendor.

At the close of the last year, the parliament having agreed to the vigorous prosecution of the war, the unprecedented sum of £10,486,457 was granted for the expences of the state. An augmentation was voted of the troops; the national militia was called into the field, while the regular troops were sent abroad; an adequate sum was voted for the purpose of relieving the distresses of Hanover, and a fresh treaty, renewable as occasion might require, was concluded with the king of Prussia. 1758.

Our exertions in the cause of that monarch did not relax the vigour of our operations in other quarters. On the 1st of June, two squadrons sailed from Portsmouth. The greater, under lord Anson, bore away for the bay of Biscay, in order to spread an alarm, and to watch the French fleet in the harbour of Brest; the less, under commodore Howe, arrived with the transports near St. Maloe's, where the troops were landed without opposition. The want of artillery, and the trifling number of the forces, rendered the reduction of the town impracticable, though it was but indifferently fortified. Several magazines, however, and a hundred sail of ships were burnt. The forces being safely re-embarked, made an attempt to land near Cherburg; but the violence of the wind, the want of provisions, and the sickness of the soldiers, determined the commanders to return to a British port, and the fleet arrived at St. Helen's, on the 1st of June.

The duke of Marlborough, grandson to the celebrated hero, having been ordered to command the British forces, which had been sent to Germany to reinforce prince Ferdinand. Lieutenant-general Bligh was appointed to command the army of invasion, which was encamped on the Isle of Wight, but did not amount to more than 6000 men. The armament, so much reduced in its strength and numbers, sailed from St. Helen's on the 1st of August, and on the 6th came to an anchor before Cherburg, into which a few bombs were thrown during the night. Early in the morning the fleet was moored two leagues west of the town, where it was resolved to land the troops. The enemy had executed several entrenchments, and planted a few batteries along the coast, and there appeared about 2000 regular troops besides militia, who threatened to oppose the landing of the British forces. On the 7th, at two in the afternoon, the grenadiers and guards, commanded by general Drury, landed without opposition under an incessant fire from the fleet. Forming his troops on the beach, he marched immediately towards the enemy. He received their fire, and then attacked them with so much resolution, that they soon fled with considerable loss and in the utmost confusion. The remainder of the forces being landed, general Bligh encamped at the village of Erville. In the morning the army proceeded towards Cherburg, in two columns, which they entered without opposition. The inhabitants, confiding in a promise of protection from the general, received their hostile visitors with politeness and hospitality. But their confidence was abused; the soldiers indulged in rapacious pillage; and it was not till after the perpetration of many outrages, that they were restrained by the authority of the general, who now proceeded, according to his instructions, to demolish the harbour and basin, while the light-horse scoured the country, and had frequent encounters with the enemy.

Having taken hostages for the contributions levied on the town, the troops evacuated Cherburg, and re-embarked without any interruption. The fleet weighed anchor on the 18th of August, and steered for St. Maloe's, but were obliged by contrary winds to run for the English coast, and it was the 4th of September before it came to an anchor in the bay of St. Lunaire, about two leagues west of St. Maloe's. The troops were immediately landed, with no other misfortune than the upsetting of one of the boats; and four companies of grenadiers, under the command of sir William Boothby, were detached to destroy the shipping in the harbour of Briac, a place near St. Maloe's. The bay of St. Lunaire, where the commodore's fleet rode, was so rocky and dangerous, that he found it expedient to move up to the bay of St. Cas, three leagues to the westward. The fleet being thus separated from the army, the latter was obliged to follow; but as no attack was apprehended, a resolution was adopted, to penetrate farther into the country. They soon discovered that their conclusions were fallacious. The duke d'Aiguillion, with twelve battalions and six squadrons, supported by two regiments of militia, arrived unexpectedly within six miles of the main body. This circumstance, however, produced no effect on the general's conduct. The army proceeded slowly in a single column toward St. Cas; and the march of three miles to that position was distinguished by circumstances and incidents more puzzling and unaccountable than that of Hannibal over the Alps. When the head of the column had attained the heights which environ the bay of St. Cas, about half a mile from the sea, they had orders to halt, and the regiments formed the line as they advanced in succession; but before the grenadiers in the rear reached the ground, the youngest brigade was ordered to march down to the beach. In the mean time, the frigates which were intended to cover the embarkation, and the boats, gradually approached the land. The grenadiers marched deliberately down to the beach, and there rested on their arms, while the battalions were conveyed to their transports in the flat-bottomed boats. The enemy continued to advance, and their artillery began to play upon the boats with great effect. Our troops assuming a bold countenance, (the only resource left,) re-advanced up to the hill to meet the enemy. They sustained the attack with a bravery worthy of better fortune, and did not retreat to the boats till their ammunition was entirely expended. Unhappily the boats then on shore were insufficient to receive half the number of men, who now crowded to the beach; and they were immediately so much overloaded, that most of them were aground. In this dreadful condition, exposed to the fire of a numerous army, they sustained a destructive carnage. Many of them rushed into the water, and in that element met their fate. General Drury, the second in command, was drowned. Sir John Armitage, a volunteer, was shot through the head. Several officers of distinction fell. At length, commodore Howe ordered himself to be rowed on shore, and took in tow one of the flat-bottomed boats. Animated by his example, the rest of the fleet imitated his conduct, and about 700 men were brought on board. Of the remaining 700, many were shot and drowned, but the greater number were made prisoners. The failure of this attempt, which was justly attributed to the unnecessary advance of the English general into the country, and to the communication of his nocturnal motions by beat of drum, excited a degree of despondency in the minds of the English people, more than proportionate to the misfortune actually sustained. The French forgot the alarm and the disgrace of continual insult upon their own shores, in the exultation of temporary triumph; and the misplaced rejoicing, and unjustified despair, of both nations, were converted into opposite feelings by the next arrival of intelligence from America.

An enterprise had been projected against Louisburg, and confided to admiral Boscawen, who had a fleet of 23 ships of the line under his command, with 12,000 land forces, commanded by general Amherst, brigadier-general Wolfe, and other officers of distinction. The governor, Drucour, having long expected this attack, had strengthened his fortifications by a breast-work, which was lined with 3000 men, in front of which were trees thrown across; and had raised batteries wherever a landing was deemed possible. The harbour was guarded by six ships of the line and five frigates, three of which were sunk across its entrance, to render it inaccessible. A violent surf, which the wind raised on the shore, added much to the difficulty of landing. These obstacles, from which the enemy hoped to derive security, only served to display the dauntless valour of British troops, when commanded by officers to whom they are attached. General Wolfe, leading the way at the head of his division, leaped from his boat into the water, amidst a heavy fire from the artillery, and drove the enemy from their batteries. These being followed by the other two divisions, the place was regularly invested. So gallant was the defence made by Drucour and his garrison, that the siege had been carried on for six weeks before any regular impression was made. The enemy did considerable execution by their sallies. When all the ships in the harbour were destroyed, except the Prudent and the Bienfaisent, captain Laforey was sent, with a body of seamen, to set them on fire, and executed his commission with coolness and intrepidity. On the ensuing day, the governor, at the earnest entreaty of the townsmen, submitted to a capitulation, by which the garrison were made prisoners of war. Thus was his Britannic majesty, by the singular merit of his forces, put in possession of Louisburg and Cape Breton, the loss of which was severely felt by the French court, not only on account of its intrinsic value, but for its importance to the preservation of Canada.

The operations in America were not confined to the siege of Louisburg. It was judged necessary to expel the French from Ticonderago, their most impregnable pass on the continent of America, and Crown Point, which commands Ticonderago. General Abercrombie, who had succeeded lord Loudon as commander-in-chief of the forces in America, embarked, July the 6th, on lake George, with about 16,000 troops, regulars and provincials, aided by a numerous and well-provided artillery, and on the following day effected his landing without opposition. The tract of country, over which he was about to pass, had never been trodden by any human beings, but the savage and thinly scattered natives. The British troops had no direction for their march but the quarters of the heavens, and even these were intercepted by the darkness of the woods through which they were obliged to pass. The officers and men of the contending parties lost their way; and their advanced guards accidentally fell in with each other. A skirmish ensued, in which 300 French were killed, and 148 taken prisoners. But this rencontre cost the English dear, for on that day they lost the gallant lord Howe.

The British army, which had marched in four columns, appeared before Ticonderago on the 28th of July. The fort is situated on an isthmus, between lake George and a cut which communicates with lake Champlain. The French, having been apprised of this expedition, had omitted nothing that might render the pass impregnable. It was accessible only in front, where a large morass was to be passed, of which the vacuities were supplied by a fortification ten feet high, well provided with cannon, and lined by about 10,000 men.

The engineer reconnoitred the ground, according to general Abercrombie's order, and reported that he thought the entrenchments practicable by musquetry alone. On this unfortunate representation it was determined not to await the arrival of the artillery, which, on account of the badness of the ground, could not be immediately brought up. The attack was made with the vigour and intrepidity natural to British troops; and they performed every thing but impossibilities. The pass was defended by immense trees, felled with their leaves towards the assailants, so as at once to conceal and to protect the enemy. They marched up to the attack with undaunted resolution, and sustained with great intrepidity a most destructive fire. The enemy, secure in their entrenchments, deliberately directed their fire, and the carnage of the British troops was horrible. The general perceived, when too late, that it was vain to persist. In order to save the remains of his army, he ordered a retreat. Two thousand men were missing. With a forbearance equal to his former rashness, the general, when joined by his artillery, refrained from resuming the attack, and gained on the same evening his former camp to the south of lake George.

To compensate in some measure for this disgraceful overthrow, colonel Bradstreet was sent, with 3000 provincials, against fort Frontenac. After a long and tedious march, the colonel arrived at Oswego, embarked for lake Ontario, and on the 25th of August appeared before fort Frontenac, which adjoins the communication between that lake and the river St. Lawrence. The fort was taken without loss, after a weak resistance, with nine armed sloops, and large quantities of provisions, which had been amassed for the use of the French colonies. General Forbes was equally successful in the reduction of fort du Quesne, which with great propriety received the name of Pittsburg. In Africa our arms were equally triumphant. Commodore Keppel, assisted by colonel Worge, captured Goree and other French settlements on the river Senegal, by which we became masters of the gum trade, and other valuable branches of commerce. In the Mediterranean, the squadron of admiral Osborne gave a violent blow to the enemy's marine. He had been for some time watching the Toulon fleet, and on the 28th of February he fell in with Monsieur du Quesne in the Foudroyant of 80 guns, attended by the Orphée of 64 guns, the Oristamme of 50, and the Pleiade of 24, as they were sailing from that port, to reinforce a French squadron at Carthagena. Osborne, observing that they dispersed and steered different courses, dispatched several ships in pursuit of them. Of these, captain Storr in the Revenge captured the Orphée. The Foudroyant was taken by captain Gardiner's ship, the Monmouth, of 64 guns, after a desperate engagement, in which that officer was slain, and the Oristamme was driven on shore. As captain Tyrrel was cruising with the Buckingham of 64 guns, and the Weasel frigate, he descried a fleet of nineteen merchantmen, under the convoy of the Florissant of 74 guns and two frigates. Disregarding the disparity of force, he gave them chace, and brought them to an action, which was fought with desperate fury till night came on; when the Florissant escaped under cover of the darkness, and with difficulty reached Martinique.

The councils of France were at this period not only divided, but imbecile and wavering. All reciprocal confidence had been lost between her court and parliaments, and the ablest of her ministers had with indignation retired from public business. The slightest testimony of condescension, however, on the part of their king, inspired the French people with joy and confidence; and even the losses they had suffered excited them to redoubled vigour and activity, with the hope of repairing them. The duke of Belleisle, already distinguished by his political wisdom and his military exploits, was pointed out by the public voice, as the only minister who could retrieve the national disgrace, and he was accordingly placed at the head of the war department, to the general satisfaction of all ranks of society

The extensive and vigorous operations so successfully conducted beneath the auspices of the English ministry, did not prevent them from sending an adequate force to oppose the French armies in Germany. Prince Ferdinand, in order to compel the prince of Soubize to abandon an enterprise projected against the prince of Hesse-Cassel, crossed the Rhine in the presence of the French army. Astonished at the boldness of this passage, they retired towards Meurs, and at length made a stand at Crevelt, with their right towards the village of Vischelon, and their left towards Anrath; Crevelt lying in the front of their right. Notwithstanding the strength of this position, they were entirely defeated, with the loss of 7000 men; but, being on their own frontiers, were speedily and strongly reinforced, so that they were soon in a condition, not only to resist the Hanoverians, but to reinforce their army beyond the river. The prince, however, willing to improve his advantage to the utmost, appeared with a detachment before Dusseldorf, and by a severe bombardment compelled it to capitulate. This acquisition multiplied his posts and communications, and rendered the prosecution of his original plan more easy. But while he continued to act with as much spirit as his situation would permit, he received intelligence that the united forces of Soubize and Broglio had defeated the Hessians near Sangershausen. The only resource now left him was to fight the enemy, or to repass the Rhine. The former was impracticable, without great and obvious danger, as they industriously avoided a battle; and the latter was an enterprise of considerable difficulty, as the heavy rains had made the road almost impassable, and had swelled the river to such a degree, that the bridge at Rees was useless.

Monsieur de Chevert, the most active and intelligent of all the French generals, had formed a plan, which, had it succeeded, would have reduced the allies to a state of the utmost perplexity. Baron Imhof was posted at Meer, in order to cover the bridge of Rees, to secure a considerable magazine, and to keep open a communication between the main army and the English reinforcements which were approaching, under the duke of Marlborough. Chevert determined, if possible, to dislodge Imhof, to burn the bridge, to make himself master of the magazine, and to render the junction of the English troops with the Hanoverians impracticable. Imhof, apprised of his designs, aware that it would be vain to expect reinforcements from prince Ferdinand, and that the enemy, by turning his camp, might become master of Meers, 1759. formed a resolution worthy of a consummate officer, and marching out of his entrenchments with only 3000 men, resolved to attack the enemy by surprise. Fortune proved favourable to his daring enterprise. As the enemy were marching into difficult ground, he ordered a small party posted in a coppice to fall upon their left, which he observed to be uncovered. The fire of this detachment was the signal for the rest to advance, and attack with fixed bayonets. An assault so spirited and unexpected impressed the French with a panic, from which all the efforts of their officers could not recover them. They gave way in less than half an hour, leaving the field of battle covered with their dead, and took refuge under the cannon of Wesel.

This signal advantage, over great superiority of numbers, was not more gallantly obtained than skilfully improved. Imhof immediately joined the English, and led them towards the main army, which prince Ferdinand conducted back into Westphalia, with as little difficulty and obstruction as he had left it in the spring.

The operations on both sides now languished for a considerable time. Prince Ferdinand acted entirely on the defensive. The grand army, under M. de Contades, found it impossible to disturb the admirable disposition of his army along the Lippe; and the prince of Yssenburg, with the few forces he had under him, maintained his posts upon the Weser; so that the French had hitherto made little progress against Hesse or Hanover. Sensible that an attack upon the whole body of the allies would prove a dangerous attempt, the French resolved to strengthen the army of the prince de Soubize, so as to enable him to dislodge the prince of Yssenburg from the Weser, and to open a passage into the Landgraviate. Prince Ferdinand was aware of their intention, and sent a detachment to the assistance of the prince under the command of general Oberg; but even after these troops had joined him, all the force of the allies remaining in Hesse did not exceed 15,000 men. They were attacked on the 30th of September, at Lanwerenhagen, by the prince de Soubize, at the head of 30,000 men, and were defeated and driven to take shelter in some strong grounds, covered with woods. Prince Ferdinand flew to their relief at so critical a moment, that the prince of Yssenburg was enabled to join him at Rheda. This movement, however, necessarily exposed the electorate to the incursions of the enemy, whose late troops penetrated even to the gates of Hanover.

The British forces had few opportunities of signalizing themselves in the course of this campaign; but they suffered greatly by the severity of the climate and the season, and their commander, the duke of Marlborough, died of a dysentery at Munster. By his death the command of the troops devolved on lord George Sackville.

The affairs of his Prussian majesty were never in a more critical situation than at present. The Russians had penetrated into the New Marche of Brandenburg, where they were besieging Custrin, and a few days would have led them to the defenceless gates of Berlin. The Swedes had gained ground upon the Prussian generals, Wedel and Manteufel, in Pomerania; and the army of the empire, with a body of Austrians, under general Haddick, were not only possessed of many strong posts on the frontiers of Misnia, but began to circumscribe the quarters of prince Henry of Prussia, who lay at Diepoldswald, with about 20,000 men. Marshal Daun, neglecting all other objects, was intent upon recovering Saxony from the Prussians. Through his natural caution, he had several times altered the plan of his operations; sometimes pointing them towards pursuing the king of Prussia into Silesia, sometimes against Berlin; but at last, leaving the generals Harsch and de Ville on the southern frontiers of Silesia, to amuse the Prussians, he began his march, through Zittau, Gorlitz, and Bautzen, towards Dresden. By crossing at Meissen, he might have cut off all communication between Dresden and Leipsic; and by attacking prince Henry, who was now encamped at Secdelitz, he might have put him between two fires, that of his own army, and that of the army of the empire. But the vigilance of prince Henry, who secured a communication with his brother, and took care to keep Dresden at his back, frustrated, for that time, all the schemes of that cautious general.

In the mean time, his Prussian majesty, notwithstanding all the interruption given him by the Austrians, marched by Wisoca, Politz, and Landshut; and on the 20th of August he reached Francfort on the Oder. Here he joined the troops under count Dohna. The Russians had, ever since the 15th, been throwing bombs and red-hot balls into Custrin, by which the place was set on fire, and the inhabitants reduced to the most deplorable state that imagination can form; and to complete their misfortune, their principal magazine had blown up.

Frederic hastened to avenge himself on those destroyers of his dominions. On the 23rd, he passed the Oder with his whole army, about twenty miles to the north-east of Custrin. The Russians, on his approach, marched from before Custrin, and took post between the villages of Zwickau and Zorndorf. The king had now to cope with an enemy, with whom he had never been personally engaged before. The greatest generals have their failings; and that of his Prussian majesty was, perhaps, a too great disregard for his enemies. He considered the Russians as barbarians, without reflecting, that they were barbarians who never knew how to yield; and that they were commanded by officers of experience, who knew how to turn that barbarism, which he affected to despise, into steady courage and military discipline, so as to baffle all the efforts of more active valour.

His Prussian majesty at first attempted to put in practice one of those military motions, in which he had been often successful, by turning the left flank of the enemy, and attacking them in the rear. The Russians, foreseeing his design, had thrown themselves into a kind of hollow square, which presented him every way with a front fortified with artillery and chevaux de frize. It was therefore necessary for the king to attack them with his artillery. The cannonading began at nine in the morning, with a dreadful discharge of great and small artillery, in which the Prussians were greatly superior, and which did amazing execution upon the Russians, who stood as if they had been invulnerable, and supplied every vacancy in their ranks with unparalleled readiness and alacrity

This behaviour was new to the Prussians, who, seeing the enemy, in a manner, court death, made a pause; which the first line of the Russians, having exhausted their shot, improved into a panic, by breaking in upon them with their swords and bayonets, and which forced the hitherto impenetrable body of the Prussians to recoil. This change in the fortune of the day, effected by their broken and defeated battalions, was so unexpected by the Russian generals, that they made no disposition for supporting their infantry with their cavalry. Had this been done, this day had probably been the last of the Prussian greatness.

FREDERIC, whose presence of mind never failed him, was not so negligent. He instantly brought the whole of his cavalry, under general Secdelitz, to the centre, and they made head against the fatigued Muscovites, while the Prussian infantry, recovering from their disorder, and stung with what had happened under the eye of their sovereign, formed behind them, and made so dreadful a charge upon the unsupported Russian battalions, that they recovered the field. When the Russians are beat, they never fly; but they grow stupid, unless they are under the command of generals, in whom they have great confidence. At present they were under no command; and, unable to advance farther, they remained where they were, plundering their own baggage, and drinking brandy wherever they could find it. To increase their confusion, the wind blew the dust and smoke directly in their faces, while their cool enemies, by their king's directions, improved every advantage. It was now no longer a battle, but a horrid and undistinguishing carnage. Still the Russians, amidst this inconceivable slaughter, kept their ground. At last their cavalry, as yet unbroken, fell upon the left wing of the Prussians, now fatigued with conquest and carnage, and favoured the broken infantry so far, as to give them an opportunity of forming anew, and marching to a more advantageous ground. The loss of the Russians in this battle amounted to 21,000 men, in killed, wounded, and prisoners; amongst whom were 939 officers. Ten thousand were killed upon the spot, and the wounds of above 6000 more proved mortal. The Prussians did not lose above 2000 men in the whole; and the Russian military chest and a noble train of artillery fell into their hands.

THE Russian generals, having collected the broken remains of their army, gave orders for a retreat, and they marched to Landsberg on the frontiers of Poland, while their general-in-chief, Fermor, requested the king of Prussia for leave to bury the dead.

THIS victory, glorious and complete as it was, gave no relief to his Prussian majesty. Laurels and thorns grew on every side of him. He made dispositions for improving his victory; but danger called him towards Saxony, where marshal Daun, whom, it seems, nature did not fit for offensive measures in the field, unless he was called to them by necessity, or invited by a certainty of success, was encamped at Stolpen, to the eastward of the Elbe. This situation, in which there was more safety than glory, served, however, to cover the operations of the Austrian arms, under the generals Harsch, de Ville, and Laudohn.

THE resolutions of the Imperial court, in all matters of war, are taken with the utmost secrecy; and every minister and Aulic counsellor there, is either a general or a judge of generals. It was therefore difficult to pronounce, whether Daun's, not proceeding to offensive operations, in the absence of his Prussian majesty, against prince Henry in Saxony, over whom he had so great a superiority, did not proceed from the selfishness of the court of Vienna. They had promised the king of Poland, and all their allies, that the recovery of Saxony should be the chief, if not the only object of the campaign; but it is presumed, they would have been much better pleased to have recovered Silesia.

WHILE Daun overawed prince Henry, and his Prussian majesty was employing his army against the Russians, Laudohn lay upon the borders of Brandenburg, with the apparent intention of drawing the Prussian troops to the northern; while Harsch and de Ville acted in the southern parts of that province. The strong fortress of Sonnestein, in the neighbourhood of Dresden, which had long overawed Daun, surrendered in a very unaccountable manner, to the Austrian general, Macquire, on the 5th of September. Upon this, Daun proposed to execute the plan he had formed in the beginning of the campaign; that of passing the Elbe, and putting prince Henry between his fire and that of the army of the empire, and thereby cutting off the communication between the prince and Dresden. But his Prussian majesty was by this time on the borders of Saxony. The terror of his approach obliged Laudohn to forego his advantages in the Lower Lusatia, and to fall back upon Daun, who was so far from executing his grand plan, that he retired to Zittau, so as to have Bohemia at his back; while the army of the empire remained inactive in the strong post of Pirna, which they had seized.

THOSE glorious successes of the Prussian monarch, who in the space of fifteen days had defeated a superior body of his enemies, in one extremity of his dominions; and baffled, without fighting, another superior body, in another extremity, gave him respite rather than security. The Swedes, on hearing of his victory at Zorndorf, had retired in disorder; but they still kept their arms in their hands, without evacuating his dominions. The Russians had still a strong footing in the most populous parts of his territories; and he had no superiority in Saxony, but that of generalship and reputation. In short, his affairs were still in a most critical situation; and the least error or neglect threatened still to plunge him into an abyss of calamity and misfortune.

DAUN still kept possession of his almost impregnable camp at Stolpen; and the Prussian monarch had taken post at Bautzen, a situation by which he was enabled to act as he pleased, on the side either of Misnia or Lusatia, his right wing extending to Holtzkirchen. By this position of the two armies, it appeared, that the marshal intended to cut off the king's communication with Silesia, and the king to cut off that of the marshal with Bohemia. The situation of his majesty, was, however, upon the whole, the most advantageous of the two. A battle seemed inevitable; and it was evident, from the situation of both armies, that the aggressor would have the disadvantage. It will, perhaps, be ever a secret, by what means Daun came to have intelligence that the Prussians were more carelessly encamped, and more remiss in their quarters, than usual. He had before concerted measures with the prince of Deux-Ponts, who commanded the army of the empire, for a general battle; and in the dead of the night, on the 14th of October, he ordered his army to decamp in three columns, and to march by different ways, with the utmost silence, so as all the three divisions should meet together near the Prussian camp, at five in the morning.

DAUN's orders were obeyed with astonishing secrecy and precision. The divisions, in falling in with one another, formed a regular line of battle, and almost instantaneously attacked the Prussian camp towards Holtzkirchen, where it was weakest. Considering the bravery and discipline of Daun's army, and the advantages under which this attack was made, it is astonishing that a single battalion of the Prussians should escape. Not a shot was fired by any of the Prussian outguards; and their enemies were in the midst of their encampment, while they imagined them to be lying at Stolpen.

FIELD-MARSHAL Keith had the day before pointed out some weaknesses in the Prussian encampment, and had even remonstrated to his majesty on that occasion. He was the first general officer who got upon horseback, and gave the alarm to his quarter; and to his vigilance and activity was it owing, that the whole army was not cut off; for the small party under him gained time for their fellow-soldiers to put themselves under arms. The marshal, however, was killed on the spot, by two musket-balls; and the head of prince Francis of Brunswick was carried off by a cannon-ball, as he was mounting his horse. The death of those two great officers, the next in command, as in merit, to the king himself, seemed to portend the entire loss of the army; but his majesty had by this time assembled some troops, and in person gave play to the Austrians, till others were formed. Frederic, perhaps, had never so difficult a part to act. The contest was not now for victory, far less for glory, but for safety. He flew from post to post, with that inconceivable presence of mind and rapidity, which so strongly mark his character. As his right wing was in greatest danger, he reinforced it with some battalions from the left; and endeavoured to recover the important post of Holtzkirchen, from which his troops had been driven in the beginning of the attack.

THIS reinforcement enabled him, after four bloody charges, to retake that post; but the Austrians, who well knew its importance, recovered it with an amazing slaughter. General Retzow, who commanded the left wing of the Prussians, with great difficulty repulsed the enemy from that quarter. At last his majesty, after maintaining the fight for five hours, and losing, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, about 7000 of his best men, ordered a retreat behind his artillery, which was placed in the middle of his camp; and which, with the help of his cavalry, put a stop to all pursuit from the Austrians, whose loss in killed and wounded amounted to above 5000. All the further consequences of this bloody action were, that his Prussian majesty still kept possession of Bautzen, but extended his right wing towards Wussenburg. The occasion of this unfortunate disaster cannot, till this day, be accounted for. Certain it is, that his Prussian majesty's extricating himself from such a dreadful dilemma, conveys a more exalted idea of his military talents, than the most splendid of his victories.

THE Russians had been so severely handled at Zorndorf, that they remained in the camp near Landsberg, without making any motion, till the 21st of September, when they began their march towards Pomerania, and there laid siege to the town of Colberg. This place, though inconsiderable in itself, was of infinite importance to the Russians, by its being a sea-port, from whence they might receive provisions and reinforcements, without being exposed to the danger of starving Brandenburg, or to marches insupportably long and laborious. Hitherto his Britannic majesty had ordered his minister at the court of Petersburg, to omit nothing that the czarina could reasonably expect or desire, to buy off her inveterate enmity towards Prussia; and he was not without hopes of success. But the siege of Colberg proved, to all Europe, not only that she was immoveable in her purpose, but that the empress-queen was determined to sacrifice the safety of Germany, and even of her own dominions, to her resentment; since nothing had, at all times, been deemed more impolitic, in the Germanic system, than to suffer the Russians to get footing by sea in the empire. It was now more than suspected, that her Russian majesty had far greater views than that of assisting her sister-empress; and that she intended to take and to hold. Colberg, though poorly garrisoned, and still more weakly fortified, held out under major Heydon, its governor, for twenty-six days, against an army of 15,000 besiegers, who were at last shamefully obliged to quit their enterprise; but they revenged their disgrace by perpetrating, wherever they went, the most unheard-of inhumanities upon the defenceless inhabitants; for the several stages of their marches were marked by fire and desolation.

THE insincerity of the court of Vienna appeared now more glaring than ever. Daun, instead of pushing the advantages he had gained at Holtzkirchen, by attempting the relief of Saxony, through his inactivity, and the few motions he made, plainly evinced, that all he intended was to cover the operations of the Austrian generals in Silesia, where they had already besieged Neiss, a city twenty miles south-west of Breslau, and lying near the confines of the Austrian Silesia. The point was embarrassing to his Prussian majesty, whether he should hazard a battle, leave Saxony exposed, or march to Silesia. He was not long in determining. Having received large reinforcements from his brother's army, he left his camp at Dobreschutz, the night of the 24th of October, and, without opposition from the enemy, reached the plain of Gorlitz; where he defeated a party of Austrians, who wanted to fortify themselves there. This march eased him of all apprehensions from Daun's army; and, in fact, blasted all the laurels the latter had acquired at Holtzkirchen.

DAUN, ashamed to be thus outwitted, sent Laudohn to harass his Prussian majesty, with 24,000 men, and strong reinforcements to the generals Harsch and de Ville, who had not only besieged Neiss, but blockaded Cosel. Frederic, notwithstanding all these impediments, continued his march; and Daun, seeing that he could not prevent the relief of Silesia, on the 6th of November passed the Elbe at Pirna, and advanced towards Dresden, from which the Prussian army, weakened by the detachments the king had drawn from it, had been obliged to retire to the westward. Before Daun, however, could cut off their communication with that city, as the army of the empire had cut it off from Leipsic, they threw themselves into Dresden all at once. Thus, notwithstanding the advanced season, three great sieges were undertaken in Saxony; that of Dresden by Daun, that of Leipsic by the Imperial army, and that of Torgau by detachments from both.

Frederic was now approaching towards Neiss, the garrison of which had defended themselves with incomparable bravery, ever since the 4th of August. On the 1st of November, he obliged the Austrians to raise that siege and the blockade of Cosel, and to fall back upon Bohemia and the Austrian Silesia. He now hastened to the relief of Saxony, where Daun had besieged Dresden with 60,000 men. Count Dohna and general Wedel, who had rid themselves of the Swedes in Pomerania, defended Torgau, and had driven the Austrians from it as far as Eulenburg.

Count Schmettau commanded in Dresden, with an army of 12,000 men. The electors of Saxony had long been the patrons of ingenious arts and manufactures. Their subjects had rivalled the antients, in many curious works of the chisel, the furnace, the laboratory, the needle, the loom, and the pencil; and they had greatly exceeded the Easterns, even the Chinese themselves, in their boasted productions of porcelain. The soil of the country, and the genius of the inhabitants, were wonderfully well adapted to the improvement of every manual art; and a long series of internal tranquillity, while the flames of war raged around, had rendered Saxony the paradise of Germany. Even the expences of its court, the most luxurious of any in Europe, contributed to enrich the inhabitants, who gave specimens of their wealth in the magnificence of their buildings. The suburbs of Dresden, where the nobility, merchants, and manufacturers reside, formed in themselves a most superb city, and greatly superior to that which lies within the walls. Unfortunately the builders of the houses had not reflected, that it was possible, some time or other, that Dresden might be besieged; for the platforms of the suburbs looked down upon the battlements of the city.

Schmettau was sensible of the advantage this circumstance presented to Daun, and that the suburbs were untenable. He therefore gave Daun his option, either to see them in flames, or desist from his operations. The Austrian general threatened him with the consequences of so barbarous a proceeding, and so contrary to the rules of war. Schmettau justified himself by necessity, which supersedes all other considerations; and by the duty he owed to his master, to whom alone he was accountable. Daun threatened to make him personally answerable to himself. Upon which Schmettau replied, that he would not only burn the suburbs, but, if the city was attacked, he would defend it street by street, and at last take refuge in the castle, where the royal family resided, and defend that likewise. This answer, being made public, brought the magistrates and principal inhabitants on their knees before the Prussian governor; and the royal family implored him, with all the moving eloquence of distress, to change his resolution, which, if executed, would leave them destitute of a habitation. Schmettau's answer was, that Daun, and not he, could grant their request; and instantly ordered the houses of the suburbs to be filled with combustible materials, and at three in the morning, November the 10th, they were fired; and the houses in which they had been deposited were reduced to ashes.

Though no arguments can justify this horrid transaction, far less reconcile it to the dictates of common humanity; yet if we admit the casuistical reasonings of politicians, and allow the necessity of war, it must be acknowledged, that Schmettau did no more than what he was compelled to. His conduct likewise admits of many alleviations. He communicated to the magistrates and inhabitants the time and manner in which he was to proceed, assisted them in removing their goods, consulted with them upon the most favourable way of executing his disagreeable orders, which was done so gently, that not above 250 houses were consumed. All these circumstances appeared afterwards from authentic evidences, judicially given by the magistrates of Dresden, and the parties themselves, who were the chief sufferers, and which were published by his Prussian majesty's command, to refute the exaggerated representations of the court of Vienna, and its allies, on this occasion.

It was in vain for Daun, while the flames were thus raging, to renew his threats, as he did, against Schmettau. Perhaps they proceeded not so much from concern for the sufferers, as from his conviction that he would now find it extremely difficult, if not impracticable, to take the city. He accordingly, upon the approach of his Prussian majesty, decamped from before Dresden on the 17th of November; and the king, on the 20th, after joining his troops under count Dohna and general Wedel, made a kind of triumphal entry into that city.—Thus, by the valour and activity of the Prussian monarch, his generals, and officers, six sieges were raised almost at the same time; namely, those of Colberg, Neiss, Cosel, Torgau, Leipsic, and Dresden.

The Austrians retired to winter-quarters, and disposed their forces so as to form a chain of amazing length, from the frontiers of Moravia, passing through Bohemia, all along the skirts of Silesia, and the borders of Saxony; where they were joined by the army of the empire, which continued the chain through Thuringia and Franconia; where it was united to the quarters of the prince de Soubize. The king of Prussia, in order to break this extensive chain, sent some bodies of his troops into Thuringia, where they dispossessed the army of the empire of several of their posts.

Though the events of this campaign were not so splendid and brilliant as the last; yet we shall find, on examination, that the conduct of the different commanders was more artful and refined, their movements more judicious, and their marches were performed with more celerity and vigour. The vicissitudes of fortune, which his Prussian majesty experienced, are remarkable; and the fortitude and skill with which he stemmed the torrent of adversity, and rose superior to his evil fortune, are altogether without example. We should have been happy to have had an opportunity of extolling his moderation, as well as his courage; but, in this particular, impartiality obliges us to condemn his conduct. Exasperated at the persecuting spirit of his enemies, the dangers and labours he had undergone, the blood and treasure he had expended, and the incessant toils to which he was daily exposed, but above all at the exhausted state of his finances, he retaliated upon the unfortunate inhabitants of Saxony; and persecuted a suffering and unoffending people, in the spirit of revenge against the injustice and rapacity of their rulers.

CHAPTER XV.

GEORGE II.

[1759.]

Unanimity of the Parliament—National Exultation—Movements of Prince Ferdinand—Battle of Minden—Conduct of Lord George Sackville—Transactions in the East Indies—Enterprise of Lally—His Disasters—Naval Operations in the Indian Seas—Prince Henry's Expedition into Bohemia—Prussians defeated at Meissen—Expedition against Martinique—General Amherst takes possession of Ticonderago and Crown Point—Battle of Niagara.

THE successes of the English arms, the valour of our naval and military commanders, and the activity and vigour of the ministers, had changed the despondency, which had so long depressed the spirits of the community, into one general feeling of exultation and confidence. The addresses of the two houses of parliament contained the most animated assurances of their willingness to concur in the effectual prosecution of the war; £3,120,000 were granted for the pay of 60,000 seamen and marines, £1,256,131 for the pay of 52,343 land forces, in Great Britain, Guernsey, and Jersey, £1,238,177 for the expence incurred by the foreign troops in the pay of Great Britain, £60,000 for enabling his majesty to fulfil his engagements with the landgrave of Hesse, and £670,000 for the payment of the Prussian subsidy. These, with various other sums appropriated to different purposes of state, and one million for enabling the king to defray any extraordinary expence of the war, during the current year, amounted collectively to £12,761,310.

The allied troops under prince Ferdinand, strengthened by additional reinforcements from Britain, and augmented by German recruits, were supplied with every convenience and necessary required by active warfare. They were in some measure deprived of these advantages, by the injustice of the French in seizing Francfort, a neutral city. By this proceeding, the French army secured the course of the Maine and the Rhine, and could without difficulty or danger receive every kind of reinforcement and supply. Sensible of their advantageous situation, the great object of prince Ferdinand was to drive the French from Francfort. Having therefore assembled all his forces, to the amount of 40,000, he 1759. came in sight of the enemy on the 13th of April, whom he found strongly encamped around the village of Bergen, between Francfort and Hanau. The attacking a superior force, thus situated, did not deter the allied general from his enterprise. Having detached 12,000 men, for the defence of his Hanoverian frontier, he marched with 30,000 men towards Francfort. The grenadiers, supported by some battalions under prince Yssenburg, made an attack on the village of Bergen, which covered Broglio's right wing; where eight German battalions were posted, and seven brigades of French troops; but were repulsed, and the prince of Yssenburg was slain. The good conduct and military knowledge of prince Ferdinand were eminently displayed in this engagement. Finding that little impression was made upon the French posts, and that his own troops suffered greatly, it became his chief consideration, how to retreat with honour in the sight of a superior army. Night was the only means to cover such a retreat, and the day was not yet far spent. In this embarrassment, his royal highness made such movements as indicated a resolution to renew the battle with redoubled vigour. By this means the French were amused during the remaining part of the day, and night secured to the allies an easy, safe, and regular retreat to Windeken. He was compelled to remain for some time on the defensive near the banks of the Weser, while the French retained possession of Francfort; and their armies effected their desired junction at Corbach in Hesse-Cassel, where they were amply supplied with provisions.

The French army, elated by their success at Bergen, advanced with great rapidity; and prince Ferdinand, finding himself inferior to the united forces of the enemy, retired as they advanced, after having left strong garrisons in Lipstadt, Retburg, Munster, and Minden. The progress of the French arms was but little retarded by these obstacles. Retburg was surprised, Lipstadt blockaded, and Minden taken by assault. General d'Armientieres made himself master of Wesel; where the garrison of 4000 men were made prisoners of war. The progress of the French was so rapid, that the conquest of Hanover was regarded as inevitable. The archives, and most valuable effects of the electorate, were sent to Stade; and the disposition of the French army near Minden, was such as encouraged them to boast and to believe, that the allied army under Ferdinand would lay down its arms without a stroke.

The French army was strongly posted near Minden; the main body being on the west of the Weser, and Broglio's division on the east. Ferdinand was encamped at Petershagen, about nine miles from the French. A battle was the only means of preventing the enemy from taking up their winter-quarters in Hanover; and to attack them in their present situation was impracticable. Stratagem was necessary to supply the place of strength, and it must be admitted, that the operations of Ferdinand were masterly. On the 28th of July, he detached the hereditary prince of Brunswick, with 6000 men, to take a circuit round the enemy's left flank, and to cut off their communication with Paderborn. On the 29th, the prince forsook his camp on the Weser, and marched to the right; leaving a strong body of troops, under general Wangenheim, intrenched on the borders of that river, and supported by a considerable artillery. The allied army was now divided into three bodies, and it was evident, that the defeat of any one of them must decide the fate of the other two. The French generals were completely deceived by this arrangement. Nothing appeared more easy than to defeat the body under Wangenheim, by which Ferdinand must be cut off from all communication with the Weser, and be therefore compelled to surrender at discretion. This was deemed the more practicable, as Ferdinand, with the division under his command, was then supposed to be at Hillen, a village at a considerable distance, by which position the enemy were in hopes of cutting off his communication with Wangenheim's corps. Early on the 1st of August, the French left their advantageous post near Minden, and advanced in eight columns to attack the allied army. Broglio came to the west of the Weser, and crossed the Werra, a small marshy river which falls into it above Minden. Their whole army was then arranged in three divisions, sixty squadrons of cavalry forming the centre. But when Broglio, who commanded the advanced guard, had attained the summit of an eminence, which had intercepted his view of the allies, he found to his surprise, the main army of his enemy confronting him; the prince, after he saw that his artifice had succeeded, having suddenly rejoined Wangenheim's division. The French generals now perceived the error into which they had been drawn, but it was too late to correct it; and they displayed a want of promptitude in making the attack, which gave the prince time to complete his movements. The battle was begun with a brisk firing of artillery on both sides, in which the count de Buckeburg, who commanded that of the allies, did great execution. Ferdinand then commanded his infantry in the centre to advance against the enemy's cavalry; a movement that was performed, with such wonderful intrepidity, by six regiments of British and two of Hanoverian troops, in defiance of a heavy cannonade and a furious charge of the French horse, who anticipated their attack, that they forced them at last to give way. Broglio, who had in the mean time been repulsed, in an attack on the left wing of the allies, then brought up his division to cover the retreat of the cavalry. This was the most critical moment of the battle. The prince dispatched general Winzingerode, his aide-de-camp, to lord George Sackville, who had succeeded the duke of Marlborough in the command of the British troops, and was at the head of the cavalry on the right, with orders for his lordship to advance, through the thin part of the wood on his left, to the rear of the infantry, and to support them in their pursuit. But instead of fulfilling this order with the exactness and promptitude which the emergency required, lord George appeared to misunderstand the route he was ordered to take, and instead of taking the road through the thin of the trees on the left, he prepared to move forwards in a direct line. His delay in about eight minutes occasioned another order, to a similar purport with the former. His lordship then drew his sword, gave the word of command, and moved a few paces forward; but was told by captain Ligonier that he was to march to the left. At this instant a third aide-de-camp came up to his lordship, and delivered an order that he should advance to the left with the British cavalry alone. His lordship replied, that the orders he received were contradictory. But the latter remarked, that they only differed in numbers, and that their destination was the same—to the left. Colonel Fitzroy, one of the aides-de-camp, offered to lead the column himself, through the wood on the left. After much altercation, and while the urgency of decision was extreme and obvious, his lordship, with a singular degree of coolness and inattention to the demands of the moment, resolved to leave his division, and to ride in quest of the prince, to have the order explained. But as he followed colonel Fitzroy to the prince through the woods, finding them less impassable than he had conceived, his lordship sent back captain Smith, one of his aides-de-camp, to bring up the British cavalry. His royal highness, convinced of the necessity of immediate support to the infantry, to complete the success and glory of the day, thought it expedient to send the same orders to the marquis of Granby, before lord George came up.

Lord Granby, who commanded the second line of cavalry, did not hesitate a moment. He took his route to the left; and, while lord George was taking the prince's orders, shewed him the line of cavalry coming through the wood. His royal highness then gave his lordship final orders to form the cavalry on the heath, and to support the infantry, which lord George proceeded to put in execution, came up with his division, and placed himself at its head, after it had got through the wood, and conducted it to the rear of the infantry; but it was then too late for the purposes intended. Broglio was enabled by this delay to make his retreat in good order; the left wing and centre crossing the rivulet, and the right taking refuge under the cannon of Minden. Eight thousand of the enemy were killed or wounded, while the loss of the allies did not exceed 1000 men. On the same day, the detachment under the hereditary prince of Brunswick defeated a large body of the French, under the duke de Brisac, and compelled it to take refuge in Minden, by which event the enemy lost their advantageous position on the Weser, and were obliged to resign the glories of the campaign.

THE cause of the mutual misunderstanding between prince Ferdinand and lord George Sackville, (afterwards lord George Germain) has never been traced to any authentic source; but it is imagined, that the superior talent and the inquisitive spirit of the English general were by no means agreeable to his superior in command, whose cupidity was excited by the hope of obtaining certain pecuniary advantages, which the other was unwilling to permit. Lord George was immediately recalled, in April of the next year tried by a court martial, found guilty, and declared incapable of serving his majesty in any future command.

THE consequences of the battle of Minden were by no means correspondent with the valour of the allied troops, or the skill of the general. The French were obliged to retire towards Cassel, but it was the 11th of September before the inconsiderable castle of Marburg surrendered to the allies. Munster still remained in the hands of the enemy, and general Imhof, being detached by prince Ferdinand to besiege it, was frustrated in that design by d'Armentieres.

THE transactions of the war in the East Indies were chequered with various success. The French had sent a considerable reinforcement, under the command of general Lally, an officer of Irish extraction, whose enterprising spirit was well calculated to give effect to sudden efforts, but who wanted the judgment and composure of mind requisite to the command which he was about to assume, whose haughty and impetuous temper peculiarly disqualified him for the service of a commercial company, and whose avarice rendered him the object of equal jealousy and fear. A new armament was likewise fitted out under M. d'Aché, who commanded their marine.

ADMIRAL Pococke, on the death of admiral Watson, who had merited the esteem of the English company, by his eminent services and fidelity, succeeded to the command. On receiving intelligence of d'Aché's arrival, he immediately put to sea with his fleet, consisting of seven ships of the line, and finding his rival, who had nine ships under his command, off the Coromandel coast, he brought him to an action which continued two hours, and terminated in a decisive victory on the part of the English; the French having sustained more than double the loss of men, having retired from the scene of action, and one of their ships having been driven on shore and lost. Three of admiral Pococke's captains behaved, during this engagement, in a manner unworthy of their country. They had acquired, during their sojourn in India, immense riches, and were unwilling to hazard the loss of their treasures by too close and enterprising a contest with the enemy. 1759.

LALLY, in the mean time, had landed his troops at Pondicherry. Entering immediately on action, before his enemy had leisure to make preparation for resistance, he in three days reduced the fortress of Cuddalore. Advancing to the siege of St. David's, he made himself master of it, after seventeen days open trenches. The small fortress of Davi Cotta submitted to him without resistance; after which he returned victorious to Pondicherry. Encouraged by these successes, Lally would willingly have proceeded to the siege of Madras, while his men were flushed with victory. To provide himself with pecuniary supplies, the want of which was his grand obstacle, he demanded 72 lacks of rupees from the rajah of Tajore, by virtue of an agreement between that prince and the French governor, during the late war. On his refusal of compliance, Lally marched a body of troops into Tanjore, and after plundering the opulent town of Nagore, invested the capital. He had been some weeks before the city, which was well defended by the garrison, aided by some English forces from Tritchinopoly, when the intelligence of a design, formed by the English, for an attack on Pondicherry, compelled him to return to its defence. This movement counteracted his enemy's purpose; but a misunderstanding subsisting between him, Monsieur de Bussy, who still commanded in the Deccan, and Moracin, who was stationed at Masulipatam, was of much prejudice to the service. Lally complained of the want of strenuous support from these officers, as well as from d'Aché. On the other hand, his recal of the troops from the Deccan and Masulipatam, to cooperate in the siege of Madras, which he invested in the month of December, was proved to be injudicious by the event; for the French forces were so reduced in the Deccan, that colonel Ford, with a detachment from Bengal, was enabled to dispossess the French of several fortresses in that country. On the 14th of December, Lally advanced, with his whole force, to the attack of Madras. A desperate sally was made by the English, under the command of colonel Draper, which, if it effected no other object, tended to dispirit the besiegers. The enemy's batteries played vigorously against the town, but the fire of the garrison was more skilfully directed. The French acted with a timidity and want of judgment, by no means conformable to their national character. It was in vain that Lally attempted to lead on his men to a breach that had been practicable for several days, it continued open for a fortnight, and no one dared to venture on the assault. To add to his embarassments, he was ill-supplied with provisions, in consequence of his misunderstanding with the government; and he learned that the garrison had received a reinforcement. Despairing of success, he raised the siege on the night of the 17th of February, leaving behind him thirty-six pieces of cannon, and retreated to the neighbourhood of Arcot.

THE English generals, availing themselves of the disasters of their enemy, entered upon active hostilities in every quarter. Lawrence, Draper, and their subordinate officers, taking the field with the forces which had so gallantly defended Madras, possessed themselves of Conjeverem and Chingelpet, two fortresses which commanded the adjoining country in the Carnatic. They were repulsed in an attempt on Wandewash; but before the close of the campaign, Mr. Pigot, seizing the opportunity afforded by the absence of Lally on an expedition to the south, dispatched colonel Coote, with a strong body of troops against it. That officer in a few days made himself master of the fortress, with the garrison of 900 men, and 40 pieces of artillery, and afterwards reduced Carangoly.

LALLY, alarmed at this unexpected success, determined to risque a general engagement, or to retake Wandewash, which he besieged with 2200 Europeans, and between 9000 and 10,000 sepoys. He prosecuted the siege with the utmost vigilance, but colonel Coote arrived with his army, consisting of 1700 Europeans and 3000 sepoys, at the moment when Lally was about to storm the breach he had made. A long and obstinate engagement ensued, in which the French sustained an entire defeat, with the loss of 1000 men, their cannon, and all the implements of the siege. The English lost no time in pursuing their victory; they marched directly to Chitiput, which they captured, and then laid siege to Arcot, which surrendered in an early part of the succeeding year. (1760)

THE uninterrupted success of the campaigns of 1758 and 1759, were, in a great measure, to be attributed to the ability and vigilance of admiral Pococke. D'Aché, whose fleet had been augmented to eleven ships of the line, ventured, after an absence of thirteen months, to return in September from the Isle of Mauritius, to dispute the sovereignty of the Indian seas. The English admiral, with nine ships, immediately sailed in quest of him, and brought him to an action. The battle which ensued was fought with much spirit for two hours, when the French fleet retired towards Pondicherry. Pococke, having repaired his masts and rigging, endeavoured to provoke d'Aché, as he was lying at the mouth of the harbour, to renew the conflict, but without effect; and the superiority of the English navy was still further confirmed by the arrival of admiral Cornish, with a squadron of four ships of war.

UNDER pretext of reinforcing their garrisons in Bengal, the Dutch equipped an armament of seven ships, which was ordered to sail up the Ganges, and rendered their fort at Chinchura so formidable, as to exclude all other nations from the salt-petre trade, carried on there, and to monopolize the sale of that commodity. Colonel Clive complained to the nabob, and remonstrated with the Dutch commodore, and not receiving a satisfactory answer, dispatched a small squadron against him, which gained a decided advantage in an action near the mouths of the Ganges. Colonel Ford was sent with a military force against the fortress, and was so successful in his operations, that the Dutch directors were glad to avoid the farther prosecution of hostilities, by engaging to make reparation for the damages which the English merchants had sustained.

The armies under the direction of his Prussian majesty, proceeded in their operations with vigour. On the 23rd of February, his general, Wobersnow, marched into Poland with a strong body of troops, destroyed several vast magazines, belonging to the Russians, and returned without any loss into Silesia, on the 18th of April.

In the mean time, prince Henry commanded in Saxony; and his army entered Bohemia in two columns, with great success. General Hulsen, who commanded one of the columns, defeated a large body of Austrians at Pasberg, and made about 2000 prisoners, with the loss of only 70 men; while the other column penetrated as far as Loboschutz, under Lecmentz; and both returned to Saxony with hostages for the contributions they had exacted. Soon after this the prince entered Franconia by the way of Hott, and defeated a body of Austrians and Imperialists, under general Macquire. The bishoprics of Bamberg and Wurtzburg were laid under contribution. In taking possession of Bamberg, the Prussians were guilty of some unjustifiable irregularities, which were productive of loud complaints, and, in due time, of a severe retaliation. During prince Henry's absence in Franconia, a body of Austrians had penetrated into Saxony.

The Russians were too formidable to be attacked by count Dohna, who contented himself with observing their motions, and harassing their march. The king of Prussia thought this conduct too timid and cautious, considering the emergency of affairs; he therefore gave that general leave to retire for the benefit of his health, and conferred his command upon general Wedel, with positive orders to attack the Russians. He marched against them in two columns, and on the 23rd of July attacked them at Zullick; where, after a bloody and obstinate engagement, he was repulsed with great loss. General Wobersnow was killed, and general Mantcuffel wounded; the Prussians passed the Oder without molestation; and the Russians, in a few days, made themselves masters of Francfort.

The king of Prussia and count Daun had been, for some time, employed in observing each other's motions; but the attention of the former was chiefly directed against the Russians, whose progress was now become very alarming. Receiving intimation of Wedel's defeat, he marched with 10,000 of his best troops, in order to take upon him the command of Wedel's army, and to drive this formidable enemy from his dominions. The remainder of his forces were strongly encamped under prince Henry, who had joined him previous to this event.

Daun was not ignorant of the king's intentions; and knowing that the Russians were very defective in regular and firm cavalry, he detached a body of 12,000 horse, together with 8000 foot, under the command of general Laudohn, one of the ablest officers in the Austrian service. These troops penetrating, in two columns, through Silesia and Lusatia, with some loss, arrived in the Russian camp at a very critical juncture.—By this time, the king of Prussia had joined general Wedel at Muhlrose, and assumed the command of the army; but finding it greatly inferior to the enemy, he recalled general Finck, whom he had detached some time before with a body of 9000 men, to oppose the progress of the Imperialists in Saxony. Thus reinforced, his army amounted to near 50,000; that of the Russians exceeded 90,000. They had chosen a strong camp at the village of Cunnersdorf, the natural strength of which they had increased by intrenchments, mounted with a numerous artillery. To attack them was difficult and hazardous; and, in any other circumstances than the present, the attempt would have been rash and ridiculous. But there was now no room for hesitation. The affairs of his Prussian majesty required a desperate effort; and, in his present situation, the most rash attempt could not be rejected by the most rigid prudence.

1759. On the 12th of August, about two in the morning, his Prussian majesty put his troops in motion; and, having formed them in a wood, advanced towards the enemy. The action began, about eleven, with a severe cannonade; which having produced the effect he desired from it, he charged the left wing of the Russians with his best troops, disposed in columns. After an obstinate conflict, the enemy's entrenchments were forced, with prodigious slaughter, and 72 pieces of cannon were taken. A narrow defile was afterwards passed; and several redoubts that covered the village of Cunnersdorf were taken by assault, one after the other. The Russians made a firm stand at the village; but they were overborne by the impetuosity of the Prussians, who drove them from post to post, quite to their last redoubts. As the Russians never quit their ground, till they are hewn down in their ranks, this success was attended with inconceivable slaughter. After a furious contest of six hours, fortune seemed to declare in favour of the Prussians. The enemy had been driven from all the ground they had occupied before the battle, and more than half of their artillery was taken. In those circumstances, Frederic dispatched the following billet to the queen at Berlin:

"Madam,

"We have beat the Russians from their entrenchments. In two hours, expect to hear of a glorious victory."

This news arrived at Berlin just as the post was going out; and the account of his Prussian majesty's success was circulated throughout Europe. But this intimation was premature, and subjected him to the ridicule of his enemies. The Russians had been severely handled, but were not defeated. Count Soltikoff rallied his troops, and formed them under cover of a redoubt, which was erected on an eminence, called, The Jews' burying-ground. A situation more advantageous could not well be conceived, and, to an army already fatigued with the service of six hours' slaughter, it might justly be deemed impregnable. The day was excessively hot, and the strength of the enemy still greatly superior to that of the Prussians. Frederic was far from being discouraged by those circumstances. His courage was always in proportion to the danger he had to encounter, and he could not bear to be a conqueror by halves. He resolved, therefore, to drive the enemy from their advantageous posts, which was the only thing wanting to render his victory complete. His generals, it is said, represented to him the madness of such an enterprise, and used every argument that could be suggested, to dissuade him from so difficult and dangerous an attempt. This salutary advice was rejected, and he resolved once more to put all to the hazard. The infantry began a new attack, which being much beyond their strength, they were repulsed with great slaughter. They were again rallied and brought to a second attack; they were a second time repulsed, and their loss redoubled. The infantry being quite exhausted, the cavalry succeeded to the attack. They made several spirited but unavailing attempts; the horses, as well as their riders, being entirely exhausted At this critical moment, the Russian and Austrian cavalry, who were quite fresh, fell in among the Prussian horse, broke their line at the first charge, forced them back upon their foot, and threw the whole into irreparable disorder. Being thus put into confusion, the Prussian army was seized with a panic, and in a few minutes totally defeated and dispersed. The personal efforts of the king, who hazarded his life in the hottest parts of the battle, were of no avail. He led on his troops three times to the charge, two horses were killed under him, and his clothes, in several parts, were perforated with musket-balls. Nothing but the approach of night could have saved the Prussian army from total destruction.—This was by far the most bloody action that had happened since the commencement of hostilities; and perhaps modern history cannot furnish the narrative of a more desperate engagement. The Prussians lost upwards of 20,000 men, in killed, wounded, and taken prisoners. General Patkammaer was killed on the spot, and the generals Leidelitz, Itzenplitz, Hulsen, Finck, and Wedel; and the prince of Wurtemburg and five major-generals were wounded. Of the enemy 10,000 were killed. The Prussians lost all their artillery and baggage.

When his Prussian majesty found himself obliged to quit the field, he dispatched another billet to the queen, couched in these terms :

"Remove from Berlin with the royal family. Let the archives be carried to Potsdam. The town may make conditions with the enemy."

It is much easier to conceive than to describe the horror and confusion which this intimation produced at Berlin ; horror the more aggravated, as it seized the people in the midst of their rejoicings, occasioned by the first dispatch. The terror was still more dreadfully augmented by a subsequent indistinct relation, importing that the army was totally routed, the king missing, and the enemy in full march to Berlin.

Next day the king retreated over the Oder, collected the scattered remains of his army, and saw, with joy and astonishment, the enemy remain inactive in their camp. He improved this interval with equal spirit and sagacity. He furnished his camp with cannon from the arsenal at Berlin, which likewise supplied him with a considerable number of recruits. He recalled general Kleist, with 5000 men, from Pomerania, and in a little time resumed his former importance.

Count Soltikoff marched into Silesia, and, with part of his army, joined that of the Austrians in Lusatia, under Daun. The army of the empire having entered Saxony, where they had reduced Hall, Wittemberg, Leipsic, Torgau, and at last Dresden itself, the king detached 6000 men, under general Wunch, to check the progress of the Imperialists in that electorate. Perceiving that the Russians intended to besiege Great Glogau, he, with the rest of his army, took post between them and that city, so as to frustrate their design. This movement, while it prevented the Russians from taking winter-quarters in his dominions, unavoidably cut off all communication with the army of prince Henry. Finding that he could not co-operate with his brother on the side of Silesia, prince Henry directed his march towards Saxony, with the view of recovering possession of that country, and to draw the attention of Daun towards it, so as to disable him from assisting the Russians. The country, through which this projected march lay, was in a manner overspread by the enemy. On the 23rd day of September, the prince quitted his camp at Hornsdorf, and, after a rapid and almost incredible march, arrived at Hoyerswerdd, where he surprised a body of 4000 men, commanded by general Vehld, killed 600, and made twice that number prisoners, including the commander himself.

Soon after this atchievement, the prince joined the troops under Finck and Wunch, which obliged M. Daun to leave his camp, and to make a forced march to cover Dresden ; which city, it was probable, prince Henry had resolved to attempt.—Three armies were now encamped on the banks of the Oder ; the Russians at Franstadt, general Laudohn, with a body of Austrians, at Schlightingskeim, and the king of Prussia at Koben. On the 29th of October, the duke d'Aremberge, with 16,000, was encountered and defeated by general Wunch, who took 1200 prisoners, some cannon, and great part of their tents and baggage.

The affairs of his Prussian majesty, notwithstanding his repeated disasters, were once more in a respectable condition. He was at the head of a gallant army of 60,000 men, in high spirits, ready to perform the most desperate of his orders ; and there still remained hopes, that the campaign might be concluded to his advantage. It was now obvious, that Daun would be obliged to retire into Bohemia, to abandon Dresden, and in short to give up all the advantages resulting from his former victories. Frederic was not satisfied with the slow and progressive mode of distressing an enemy ; he was for actions of greater moment and more decision. The passes into Bohemia were exceedingly difficult ; and the king thought that, by some posts properly chosen and strongly guarded, the retreat of the Austrians might be prevented ; and that Daun, after all his caution and prudence, would be compelled to hazard a battle at an evident disadvantage, as he would then have no resource but in victory. With this view he detached general Finck, with nineteen battalions, and thirty-five squadrons, to take possession of the defiles of Maxen and Ottendorf, through which alone it seemed possible for the Austrians to penetrate into Bohemia. This was done with great success. Daun retired to Plauen, and the king advanced to Willsburg, imagining that he had effectually succeeded in his design.

However plausible this project might appear, there was evidently some mistake or oversight in its execution. Finck had no sooner taken post near Maxen, than Daun, after having reconnoitred his situation, resolved to attack him, with his corps de reserve, under the baron de Sancere. The baron marched his troops in four columns through the woods, and the Prussians were entirely surrounded before they had the least intimation of their approach. They had penetrated too far into these defiles, and had neglected to secure a retreat, or any sort of communication with the main army. Their situation was the most desperate that could well be imagined. To retreat was impossible; and the only consolation arising from resistance was the hope of selling their lives dear. They defended themselves, for the whole day, with the greatest resolution. But all their efforts were ineffectual. Overpowered by numbers, they were driven from eminence to eminence, until, by favour of the night, they made their last retreat to Falkenhayn. The Austrians were employed the whole night in guarding, with double strength and vigilance, every avenue, through which it was possible for the Prussians to escape.

The morning presented a dreadful and discouraging sight to the Prussian army. The hills on every side of them were covered with great bodies of the enemy, and every defile presented a hedge of bayonets, through which it would have been madness to attempt to penetrate. In this alarming condition, fatigued with the hard service of the preceding day, in which they had exhausted almost all their ammunition, stripped of the greatest part of their cannon, surrounded on all quarters, without the least prospect of relief, it is not to be wondered that the Prussian army lost all hope and all spirit. General Finck was well-acquainted with the rigour of his master; and he felt the thousand embarrassing circumstances that every man of honour and of spirit must feel at such a juncture. The apparent shame of a surrender was great; but the absurdity of throwing away the lives of so many brave men on a forlorn hope, while there was a possibility of reserving them for better occasions, was, in his opinion, sufficient to counterbalance it. He therefore sent a trumpet to count Daun, to demand a capitulation, which was granted in one single article, importing, that he and eight other Prussian generals, with the whole body of troops they commanded, should be received as prisoners of war. To this he was obliged to submit; and his whole army, consisting of 20,000 men by the Austrian account, (and above 12,000 by the Prussian,) 64 pieces of cannon, 50 pair of colours, and 25 standards, fell into the hands of the Austrian general.

This was a severe stroke upon his Prussian majesty; and it was the more mortifying, as it implied a censure on his conduct, for having detached such a numerous body of troops to a situation where they could not be sustained by the rest of the army.—The Austrians exulted in this cheaply obtained victory, which they considered as catching their enemy in the snare that had been laid for themselves; and they looked upon it as a full indemnification for the capture of the Saxon army, which had surrendered very near this place in the year 1756.

This disaster was succeeded by another. General Diercke had been stationed on the banks of the Elbe, opposite to Minden, and being recalled, was obliged to transport his troops in boats, the floating ice preventing the use of his pontoons. Whilst he struggled with these difficulties, his rear-guard was attacked by a strong body of Austrians, who, after an obstinate defence, took prisoners himself and his men, amounting to between 3000 and 4000.

By these two successive defeats, occurring at the close of an unfortunate campaign, his Prussian majesty was so weakened, that he would hardly have been able to maintain his ground at Freyberg, had he not at this time been reinforced by the body of troops under the hereditary prince of Brunswick. Daun, far from being elevated at the advantages he had gained, adhered strictly to his usual cautious management. Instead of pursuing the blow, when it was more probable than at any other period of the war, that one vigorous effort would have crushed his Prussian majesty, and put an end to the troubles in that part of Germany, he quietly occupied the strong camp at Pirna, that he might be at hand to succour Dresden, and maintain his communication with Bohemia. Frederic, finding it impossible to bring the Austrians to an engagement, was obliged at last to desist, and to suffer the shattered remains of his army to repose in winter-quarters.

Four bloody campaigns had now been fought in Germany, without any prospect of either of the parties being obliged to submit. Never, since the ages of ignorance and barbarity, were the lives of men squandered away with such profusion as in the course of this German war. As if the common method of carrying on hostilities was not sufficiently destructive, winter campaigns were introduced; and the troops were lavishly exposed to the rigour of that inclement season, in despite of nature, and contempt of humanity. In vain the confederate powers of Austria, Russia, France, and Sweden, united their efforts to crush the Prussian monarch. He had been defeated; he had been out-generaled; but it was evident that nothing but the most desperate necessity, nothing but being conquered in the most absolute sense, could ever induce him to submit.

The success of the last American campaign had excited a desire in the British ministry of improving it. Instead of employing the whole strength of the British arms against one object, it was proposed to divide the forces, and to make impressions on different parts, so as to distract and weaken the enemy. In order to render success more certain, the different expeditions were planned in such a manner, as to co-operate with each other, and even to join occasionally. An attempt against the French Caribbee Islands constituted part of this comprehensive plan. In the end of the preceding year, a squadron of nine ships of the line, with sixty transports, containing six regiments of foot, were sent thither. The land forces were commanded by general Hopson, an officer, whose age and infirmities, as well as natural caution, disqualified him for such a service; and the sea-force was under the command of commodore Moore, then in the West Indies. Martinico, the most considerable of all the French islands, was the place of their destination.

On the 16th of January, the troops were landed near Port Royal, without meeting with any considerable opposition. The natural strength of the country, however, proved a much greater obstruction to the British army, than the force of the enemy. The attempt proving ineffectual, after repeated efforts, the troops were re-embarked. There appears to have been some difference between the commanders, which might occasion the sudden abandonment of the attack. It was then determined to proceed to St. Pierre. When they arrived before that place, new difficulties arose, a council of war was held, and the attempt against Martinico was finally abandoned. Unwilling to return with the disgrace of having done nothing worthy of the greatness of the armament, and the expectation of their country, the commanders resolved to proceed against the island of Guadalope, an object of as much importance as Martinico, though of less popularity.

On the 23rd of January the fleet arrived before the town of Basse-terre, the capital of the island, and defended by a strong fortress, which, in the opinion of the chief engineer, could not be reduced by the shipping. The commodore was of a different opinion, and brought the ships to bear upon the town and citadel. About nine in the morning, a dreadful cannonade began, which continued with the utmost fury till five in the evening, when the fire of the citadel, and all the other batteries, was effectually silenced. In the mean time, the bombs, which were continually showering upon the town, set it on fire in several places. Nothing could exceed the horror of this scene. The heavy and unremitted fire of so many great ships and batteries, and the blowing up of the powder-magazines, were heightened by a continued and permanent line of flames, which extended along the shore, and formed a suitable background to so terrible a picture.

Next day, the troops landed without opposition, took possession of the town and citadel, and displayed the British colours on the walls. The island, however, was far from being reduced. The nature of the country, abounding with passes and defiles, rendered it easy to be defended; and the inhabitants, who had retired to the mountains, seemed determined to resist to the last extremity.

On the 27th of February, general Hopson, who, though unfit for this service, was a worthy man and a good officer, died, and his command devolved upon general 1759.

Barrington ; a circumstance which contributed not a little to the subsequent reduction of the island. It is not consistent with my limits to enter into a detail of the skirmishing operations of the troops, which were drawn out to a considerable length. The inhabitants pursued the most sensible plan that could be adopted in their situation. Instead of hazarding a general engagement with regular troops, they resolved to weary them out with continual alarms, and to harass and distress them with perpetual skirmishes ; a plan which the unhealthiness of the climate, and the want of provisions among the British troops, rendered but too likely to succeed. Hostilities were protracted in this manner from the 24th of January till the 1st of May, when the inhabitants thought proper to capitulate ; and the whole island and its dependencies were subjected to the British crown. Scarcely was the capitulation signed, when M. Bompart, general of the French Caribbees, landed at St. Ann's, a port belonging to Guadaloupe, with 600 regulars, 2000 buccaniers, and a vast quantity of arms and ammunition. But this body, hearing of the capitulation being signed, immediately disappeared ; though, had they landed a day sooner, the subjection of the island to the British arms must at least have been doubtful. On the 25th of May, the island of Marigalante surrendered, upon the same terms as had been granted to Guadaloupe.

THE operations of the British arms, on the continent of America, were directed to different objects. To fall, as near as possible at the same time, upon Crown Point, Niagara, and the forts to the south of lake Erie, whilst a great naval armament, and a considerable body of land forces, should attempt Quebec, by the river St. Lawrence, was the plan proposed. The army under general Amherst, destined against Ticonderago and Crown Point, was the first in motion. The reduction of those forts would naturally lay open the lake Champlain, which has a communication with the great river St. Lawrence. Having established a sufficient naval force on this lake, the general was to proceed to Quebec, in order to form a junction with general Wolfe and admiral Saunders, who, having entered the river St. Lawrence at the opposite quarter, would probably have commenced the siege of Quebec by the time of his arrival.

FROM the impediments that were thrown in general Amherst's way, the summer was pretty far advanced before he could transport his forces across lake George. They landed on the 21st of July, and reached the field, where, in the preceding year, the British troops had suffered so terrible a disaster. The French, after a feeble show of resistance, abandoned Ticonderago, and retreated to Crown Point. The only loss attending this acquisition was that of colonel Townshend, who was killed, in reconnoitring, by a shot from the fort. He fell near the spot where the gallant lord Howe was killed ; to whom, in the circumstances of his birth, qualifications, and character, he bore a strong resemblance. Previous to their retreat, the enemy had, in some measure, dismantled their fortifications ; and the first care of the general was to repair them, as upon the possession of this important post, not only the success of his offensive operations depended, but a secure retreat in case of a reverse of fortune.

WHILE Amherst was thus employed in repairing Ticonderago, and endeavouring to render his naval force upon the lake respectable, he received intelligence from his scouting parties, that the enemy had retired from Crown Point. He immediately detached a party to take possession of the place, and soon after arrived there with the rest of his troops.—The enemy had retired, with about 3500 men, to the bottom of lake Champlain, and were posted at the Isle de Noix. They were well provided with artillery ; and their force upon the lake was such as justified them in hoping to be able to prevent the farther progress of the British army. Amherst, sensible of the advantages attending a superiority on the lake, had given orders for the building of several vessels with the utmost expedition. These being furnished, victualled, and manned, he embarked with the whole army on the 10th of October, and proceeded a considerable way upon the lake. The general, in his zeal for the service, and anxiety to join general Wolfe, from whom he had not received the least intelligence, seems to have forgotten the advanced season of the year, and that it was impossible to contend with so severe and tempestuous a climate. Finding it impracticable to proceed, he prudently postponed his operations till another year, and returned with the army to Crown Point. In the mean time, his little squadron upon the lake exerted itself with great activity. Three of the French vessels were driven into a bay; two of which were sunk, and the other run aground. General Amherst, having opened communications between Ticonderago and the governments of New Hampshire and Massachusetts, disposed his troops in winter-quarters.

THE forces appointed to act against Niagara, under general Prideaux, arrived at that place, without meeting with any obstruction. The fort was invested about the middle of July, and the operations were carrying on with great vigour, when general Prideaux was unfortunately killed in the trenches, by the bursting of a cohorn. General Amherst being informed of this disaster, immediately sent brigadier-general Gage, to assume the command of that army. In the mean time, it devolved upon sir William Johnson, who entered into the views, and pursued the measures of the late general, with the greatest spirit. Apprehensive of losing a place of such importance, the French resolved to exert their endeavours for its relief. They collected together all their regular troops and provincials, with a large body of savages, amounting in all to about 1700 men, in order to give battle to the English, and to raise the siege. General Johnson, having received intelligence of their approach, ordered the light infantry and piquets, supported by some grenadiers and regular foot, to post themselves to the left, on the road leading from the falls of Niagara to the fort, by which the French were to pass. The Indians were placed on the flanks; and another regiment was posted in such a manner, as to secure the trenches from a surprise during an engagement.

ABOUT eight in the morning, the enemy was seen advancing. The Indians in the English service offered a parley with their countrymen in the French army; but it was rejected. The action was introduced by the horrid cry, called the war-hoop; which was said to have been one of the principal causes of general Braddock's defeat, by the panic which it struck into his troops. But it had now lost its effect, and was no longer dreadful. The enemy began to attack with great resolution; but they met with so warm a reception, from the troops in front, and the Indians on their flanks, that in less than an hour, their whole army was routed, and their general, with most of his officers, taken. The pursuit was continued through the woods, for several miles, with great slaughter.

THIS battle, fought in the sight of the fort, contributed in a great measure to its speedy reduction. The general sent in a list of the prisoners, and exhorted the commandant to surrender, before more blood would be shed, while he had it in his power to restrain the Indians. The capitulation was signed that night. The garrison, consisting of 607 men, surrendered prisoners of war, and were conducted, with all their baggage, to New York. The taking of Niagara broke off effectually the communication between Canada and Louisiana; and one of the capital political designs of the French was defeated in its direct and immediate object.

CHAPTER XVI.

GEORGE II.

[1759.]

Proceedings in Canada—Siege and Capture of Quebec—Death of Wolfe—Naval Operations—Defeat of the French off Logos by Boscawen—Military Operations in Germany—Disasters and Exploits of the King of Prussia—Capture of Berlin.

HOWEVER interesting the reduction of Crown Point and Niagara might be considered, they were only intended to be subservient to the conquest of Quebec, the grand object of all our operations. The scheme, by which the two armies, employed against those forts, were to join and co-operate with the northern armament under general Wolfe, was too refined and complicated to be put in execution; and had success depended entirely on that circumstance, the French flag might yet have continued to wave from the fortress of Quebec.

ADMIRAL Saunders commanded the fleet; and the operations by land were entrusted to the conduct of major-general James Wolfe, whose military genius was so eminently displayed at the siege of Louisburg. His subordinates in command were brigadiers Monckton, Townshend, and Murray.

ON the 26th of June, the whole armament arrived at the isle of Orleans, a few leagues from Quebec, after a prosperous navigation. By the assistance of some excellent charts taken from the enemy, the admiral experienced none of those difficulties, with which the navigation of the river St. Lawrence was said to be attended. Next day the troops were landed on the island, which is about twenty miles in length, and seven in breadth, highly cultivated, and abounding with people, villages, and plantations. It extends quite up to the bason of Quebec; and its most westerly point approaches so nearly to another on the continent, called Point Levi, that the harbour of Quebec appears to be land-locked on all sides. The possession of these two points was of the utmost importance; and the first operation of general Wolfe was to secure them, which was done with little difficulty.

THE city now appeared in full view, and presented to the British troops at once a tempting and a discouraging sight. Nature seems to have peculiarly studied the defence of Quebec, and the French had left nothing undone which might add to the natural strength of the country. Their troops, amounting to 12,000 men, and commanded by M. Montcalm, an able and hitherto fortunate general, were encamped in a very advantageous situation, along the shore from the river St. Charles to the falls of Montmorenci, every accessible part being deeply entrenched.

To attack a place possessed of so many advantages, with such a handful of men as the British army consisted of, was not only deviating from the established maxims of war, but was in all appearance a rash and fool hardy attempt. Wolfe was well-acquainted with the difficulties he had to encounter; and, though of a temper highly sanguine and adventurous, he began almost to despair. He was resolved, however, to leave nothing unattempted; he was not without hope of being joined by general Amherst, and he knew that while the British squadron maintained its station in the river, he should always have it in his power to retreat in case of emergency. The west point of the isle of Orleans, and that of Levi, being secured, batteries were erected upon the high ground, which fired continually upon the town.

Admiral Saunders was stationed in the north channel of the isle of Orleans, opposite to the falls of Montmorenci; while admiral Holmes proceeded up the river, beyond the town, which not only diverted the enemy's attention from the quarter on which the attack was intended, but prevented their attempts against the batteries already erected by the English.

The fleet being thus judiciously disposed, general Wolfe caused the troops to be transported over the river St. Lawrence, to the north-east of Montmorenci, with a view, after he had crossed the latter, of moving towards the enemy's flanks, and enticing them to an engagement. Every means was used for this purpose, but without effect. M. Montcalm was well apprised of the importance of his situation; and, though superior in numbers to the English, was resolved to risk nothing, and to rely entirely on the strength of the country.

Meanwhile the fleet was exposed to the most imminent danger. A violent storm had caused several transports to run foul of each other, many boats foundered, and several large ships lost their anchors. The enemy, taking advantage of the confusion which they imagined this disaster must have produced, sent down seven fire-ships from Quebec, at midnight, among the British fleet, which lay so thick as to cover the whole surface of the river. This scheme, though well contrived and seasonably executed, was entirely defeated by the skill and vigilance of admiral Saunders, and the dexterity of his mariners, who resolutely boarded the fire-ships, run them fast aground, and prevented them from doing the smallest damage to the British squadron.

Wolfe, finding that every endeavour to draw the enemy to an engagement was unsuccessful, and sensible that the approach of winter would soon terminate all military operations in that northern climate, formed a resolution of attacking them in their intrenchments, on the side of Montmorenci. There was a redoubt, situated close to the water's edge, and to appearance without gunshot of the entrenchment on the hill. The general foresaw, that if the enemy should suffer this fort to be reduced, he could afterwards reconnoitre their situation at leisure, and determine the place at which they could be most easily attacked; on the other hand, should they endeavour to support it, he would be enabled to bring on a general engagement. This plan, judicious and practicable as it may appear, failed, from one of those accidents which can neither be foreseen nor prevented.

On the 30th of July, in the forenoon, the troops destined to this attack were embarked in boats, in order to be transported across the channel. To facilitate their passage, the Centurion ship of war was stationed in the channel, to check the fire of the lower battery, which commanded the ford; a numerous train of artillery was placed upon the eminence, to batter the left of the enemy's entrenchment; and two flat-bottomed armed vessels were run aground near the redoubt, to favour the descent of the forces. The confusion which these manœuvres produced among the enemy, determined the general to storm the entrenchment immediately. Orders were issued for the brigadiers Monckton, Townshend, and Murray, to put their troops in motion at a certain signal, which was accordingly given at a proper time of the tide. Several boats, however, were run aground, which caused a considerable delay, during which the troops were exposed to a severe fire from the enemy. In the mean time, the general in person sounded the shore, and pointed out the place where the troops might be landed with the least difficulty.

Thirteen companies of grenadiers, and 200 of the second American battalion, were the first who landed. They had orders to form upon the beach, and to wait for the corps that were to sustain them, before they began the attack. Instead of attending to this necessary injunction, they rushed with an impetuous ardour towards the enemy's entrenchments, in the most tumultuous disorder. This confusion was increased by a severe and steady fire from the entrenchments, which forced them to take shelter under a redoubt, which the enemy had abandoned on their approach. In this distressful situation they remained a considerable time, unable to form under so hot a fire, notwithstanding every effort of their officers. Night was now drawing on, and a violent tempest was gathering. For these reasons, the general judged it not advisable to persevere in so dangerous an attack, as a second repulse might render the retreat of the troops hazardous and uncertain. He therefore ordered them to retreat, and to form behind Monckton's brigade, which was now drawn up on the beach in good order. The whole repassed the river without molestation; the general exposing his person with that intrepidity for which he was distinguished, both during the attack and the retreat.

The loss which attended this mortifying check was very considerable. Above 500 men, and many brave officers, were killed or wounded; but though the army was considerably weakened, the general was resolved to proceed with vigour, as long as there remained a possibility of success. Admiral Holmes's squadron, which had returned to assist in the late unsuccessful attack, was ordered to move up the river, attended by brigadier Murray, with 1200 men. Nothing of great moment was effected by this detachment. Several magazines of the enemy were destroyed, but they could not come near their men of war; so that they returned to their former station. By some prisoners taken in this expedition they learned, that the fort of Niagara was taken, Ticonderago and Crown Point abandoned, and general Amherst employed in making preparations to attack the corps under M. Burlemaque, at the isle de Noix.

The ill fortune which had hitherto attended all his operations, made a deep impression on the mind of general Wolfe. He had planned, he had attempted, he had executed every thing that might insure success; he had faced every danger in person, and braved every difficulty and fatigue; but the prospect of victory and conquest was yet far distant. He well knew that the want of success, in all military expeditions, was oftener attributed to misconduct than misfortune; and the thought of returning without having performed any thing worthy of himself and the public hope, was more terrible to him than death. He was often seen to sigh; he was often heard to complain; and the tumult of his mind, added to the fatigues of body he had undergone, disordered his whole constitution, which was naturally delicate and tender. He was seized with a violent fever, which for some time totally disabled him. In this feeble condition, he begged of the general-officers, to consult together for the public utility; and the result of their deliberation was, that 4000 or 5000 men, conveyed above the town, might be able to draw the enemy from their situation, and to bring them to a general engagement.

It was at this period that general Wolfe dispatched an express to England, with an account of his proceedings. In this elegant and truly military letter, though written in the style of despondency, we may discover the scholar, the philosopher, the warrior, and the politician. It may be exhibited as a standard of military eloquence; and would have ranked the author among our best writers, had not his military exploits placed him among our greatest commanders.

Agreeably to the plan which had been formed, for a regular assault, the general and admiral reconnoitred the town; and concluded, from their own observation, enforced by the opinion of the chief engineer, that such an attack could not be hazarded, with any prospect of success. The scheme, therefore, of drawing the enemy to a general engagement, was now finally adopted. The troops quitted the camp at Montmorenci, were re-embarked and landed at Point Levi; and admiral Holmes's division made movements up the river, in order to draw the attention of the enemy as much from the town as possible. This was attended with a better effect than before; for though Montcalm still maintained his advantageous post, he detached M. de Bougainville, with 1500 men, to watch the motions of the English admiral.

Admiral Saunders, who still remained in his first position, was ordered to make a feint, with every appearance of reality, as if the troops intended to land below the town, and attack the French intrenchments on the Beauport shore. On the 12th of September, about one in the morning, the general embarked the troops aboard the transports, and proceeded three leagues farther up the river than the intended place of landing. They were then put into boats, and began to fall down with the tide to the place of disembarkation. The boats glided gently along, unobserved by the French centinels posted on the shore; but by the rapidity of the current, and the darkness of the night, they overshot the mark, and were carried a little below the intended place of attack. The ships of war followed them, and, by a well-conducted navigation, arrived just at the time concerted to cover their landing.—When we consider the danger and difficulty attending this enterprise, we cannot but admire the dexterity with which it was performed. The stream was rapid, the shore shelving, the bank above lined with centinels, and the landing-place so narrow as to be easily missed in the dark. When the troops were landed, the heights of Abraham appeared before them; which rise abruptly, with a steep ascent, from the banks of the river. A little path slanted up the hill from the landing-place, so narrow that two could not go abreast; and even this was intrenched and defended by a captain's guard. These difficulties, however discouraging and perplexing, served only to animate the troops. The light infantry and the highlanders, under colonel Howe, ascended the precipice with admirable courage and activity. They were obliged to pull themselves up by the stumps and boughs of trees, which covered the declivity. The captain's guard, which defended the pass, was soon dispersed, the whole army mounted, without further molestation, and were drawn up in order by the general as they arrived.

Montcalm could scarcely credit the intelligence he received, of the British forces having gained the heights of Abraham, which he had confidently deemed inaccessible; but finding it but too true, and being conscious that the British fleet might destroy the low town, while the high town was attacked by the army, he resolved to hazard a battle; and quitting Beauport, passed the river St. Charles, and formed his troops opposite to ours.

General Wolfe, perceiving the approach of the enemy, began to form his own line, which consisted of six battalions, and the Louisburg grenadiers. The right of this body was commanded by brigadier Monckton, the left by brigadier Murray, and the rear was protected by the light infantry under colonel Howe. As the enemy discovered an intention of flanking the left of the English, general Townshend was sent thither with the regiment of Amherst, which he formed en potence, that is, in a body which presented two faces to the enemy. His numbers were soon increased by two battalions, and another battalion was drawn up as a reserve, formed in eight subdivisions, with large intervals. The right of the enemy was composed of half the colony troops, supported by two battalions of regulars, and a body of Canadians and savages; their centre consisted of a column formed by two other regular battalions; and the remaining half of the colony troops, with one battalion, were posted on the left. The bushes and corn-fields in their front, were filled with detachments of Indians, and the best marksmen, who, previous to the engagement, kept up a galling, though irregular, fire upon the British troops.

About nine in the morning, the enemy advanced to the charge, with great spirit, and in good order; but their fire, from its beginning too soon, was irregular and ineffectual. The British troops, on the contrary, reserved their fire until the French had approached within forty yards of their line, when they poured in a most dreadful and effective discharge. This fire was continued with great deliberation and spirit, and the enemy began to give way on all sides. At this critical time, general Wolfe, who stood conspicuous in the front of the line, where the attack was the most warm, received a ball in the breast, under which he sunk, and was carried behind the ranks. While his surrounding friends expressed the utmost anxiety for his misfortune, his sole anxiety was directed to the fate of the battle. A messenger arriving, he asked, How are the troops? The enemy are visibly broken, was the reply. Almost faint, he reclined his head on the arm of an officer, when his faculties were revived by the distant sound of, They fly! Starting up, he exclaimed, Who fly? The French. What? said he, do they fly already? then I die happy. With these words he expired in the arms of victory. General Monckton, the second in command, fell immediately after, and was likewise conveyed off the field of battle. The command now devolved on general Townshend, who shewed himself equal to so arduous a duty. Notwithstanding the discouraging circumstance of losing two generals, the troops preserved their spirit; and every regiment seemed to exert itself with a view to its own peculiar character. The grenadiers pressed on with their bayonets, and soon broke the centre of the enemy; when the highlanders, drawing their broad-swords, fell in among them with irresistible impetuosity, and drove them with great slaughter into the town. Colonel Howe, with his light infantry, maintained his station on the left, during the whole action, and entirely prevented the attempts of the Indians and Canadians upon that quarter.

DEATH OF GENERAL WOLFE.

London, Pub. Sept. 1st 1789 by Rob.t Fenn, Warwick Square.

Baddeley sc.

Victory had scarcely declared in favour of the British forces, when a new enemy appeared, which threatened to deprive them of the consequences of their previous bravery. M. Bougainville, who had been detached up the river, had turned back on being informed that the British troops had gained the heights of Abraham, and now appeared in the rear, with a body of 2000 men. Fortunately he arrived too late to have any share in the battle. The main body of the French army was broken and dispersed; and general Townshend established his rear so effectually, that Bougainville, after a feeble attempt, thought proper to retire among woods and swamps, whither the British commander wisely declined to follow him.

Montcalm was mortally wounded in the engagement, and conveyed into Quebec. His second in command likewise received a wound, of which he afterwards died on board an English vessel.

Immediately after the action, admiral Saunders, who had all along spiritedly cooperated with the land forces, to the advantage of the service, sailed up with an intention to attack the lower town, while general Townshend was preparing to assault the upper. This double attack was anticipated by a proposal of capitulation from the town; which, after mature deliberation, was accepted and signed on the 18th of September. The terms were honourable to the garrison, and advantageous to the inhabitants, who were allowed the free exercise of their religion, and the possession of their civil rights, until a general peace should decide their future condition. The fortifications were in tolerable order; but the houses were entirely demolished. General Murray, with a garrison of 5000 men, was left to defend the place; and the remainder returned to England with the fleet, which sailed soon, lest it should be locked up by the frost in the river St. Lawrence. Brigadier Monckton was conveyed to New York, where he happily recovered of his wound.

Thus was the conquest of Quebec completed; an enterprise, which proves that perseverance and intrepidity will overcome obstacles apparently insurmountable. When we consider the strength of the country, the numbers of the besieged, and the advanced season at which the attack was commenced; the success which attended it is calculated to excite the greatest astonishment. Every manœuvre displayed the judgment and genius of the general, and the bravery of the troops. It is but justice to the navy to observe, that they co-operated with an unanimity, ardour, and perseverance, never enough to be commended.

About 1000 of the enemy, including a great number of officers, were taken prisoners; and about 500 were slain on the field of battle. If we except the death of general Wolfe, and reflect on the importance of the victory, the loss of the British troops was quite inconsiderable. It did not amount to above 500 men.

The death of this great general was a national misfortune; and perhaps our loss that day was greater than the conquest of Canada was advantageous. Never was honour more firmly established upon the principles of virtue, than in him. He seemed formed by nature for military greatness. His memory was retentive, his judgment deep, his comprehension quick and clear, and his capacity extensive. His passion for glory prompted him to acquire every species of military knowledge that study could confer, or actual service illustrate or confirm. With the true fire of the soldier, he possessed the milder qualifications of the man. He was generous, gentle, complacent, and humane. Contemning every little art for the acquisition of wealth, he scorned to prolong a burdensome war, to enrich himself with the spoils of his country. His rank in the army was owing to no parliamentary interest, nor family connexions; to merit alone he was indebted for his command, and to the discrimination of that great man, whose genius directed the operations of the war. He had long discovered his abilities, and "marked him for his own." If we view his fate with the eye of a soldier, it was of all others the most to be envied. He had happily effected the enterprise in which he was engaged, fully satisfied the expectations of his country, and, expiring in the arms of victory, left to future times an heroic example of military skill, discipline, and fortitude.

The news of this important conquest arrived in England but a few days after the express, which general Wolfe had sent off after the affair of Montmorenci. The despondency occasioned by the latter was great.

The conquest of Canada was ardently desired by the people; and, from their high opinion of Wolfe, they were almost assured of success; but when he began to doubt, they thought that they had just reason to despair. It is difficult to describe the various and mixed emotions with which every one was affected, when intelligence was brought of the capture of Quebec, and the death of Wolfe. The sudden transition from such dejection to the highest joy, mixed with grief and pity for the fate of the general, was singular and affecting. The rapture and riot which the news excited among the populace, were blended with the praise of the gallant general; and the mournful triumph which every where manifested itself, while it did honour to the memory of Wolfe, exhibited the generous and humane feelings of the people.

The French army, soon after the surrender of Quebec, retired to Montreal and Trois Rivieres, the only places of any consequence they had left in Canada. The country along the river was laid waste for a considerable extent, to deprive the French troops of subsistence, and to render any attempt in the winter, for recovering Quebec, abortive; a measure which, however repugnant to humanity, was judged to be absolutely necessary.

Though the French were equally unsuccessful in Asia, Africa, and America, they were now meditating a blow, which, had it succeeded, would have amply revenged all their losses. A masterly and powerful invasion of Great Britain was projected, and their ports were filled with preparations for carrying it into execution. Three embarkations for that purpose were arranged. M. Thurot, an intelligent and enterprising adventurer, humane in his manners, and fortunate in his undertakings, was appointed to command a squadron of men of war, destined against Scotland. From being captain of a merchant-vessel, he had become a commander of a privateer, and was now a commodore in the French service. His birth was obscure; but his opinions, at a time when a total degeneracy of the French commanders prevailed, rendered abilities illustrious, which in England could not have entitled him to a lieutenantcy on board a ship of war. The second embarkation was to have been performed at Havre de Grace, and the other sea-port towns of Normandy, and was designed immediately against England. The third embarkation, destined against Ireland, was to be made at Vannes, in Lower Britany. The land forces were commanded by the duc d'Aguillon, while a powerful squadron, under M. Conflans, was to cover and secure their landing. These appearances were alarming; but they were greatly diminished by the excellent measures adopted by the British government. The Brest fleet, under Conflans, was blocked up by Hawke, who at the same time detached some ships to watch over Vannes; while commodore Boys was stationed before Dunkirk, and admiral Rodney bombarded Havre.

In the mean time, admiral Boscawen, who had succeeded admiral Osborne in the Mediterranean, effectually maintained the honour of the British flag. The French had assembled a considerable armament at Toulon, under the command of M. de la Clue; some imagined it to be destined against America, while others supposed it intended to reinforce the Brest fleet, and to co-operate with it in the designed invasion of the English coast.

Boscawen, having in vain attempted to bring the enemy to an engagement, ordered three ships to advance and burn the French vessels lying close to the mouth of the harbour. In executing this order, the ships met with a warm reception from some batteries, which had not been before perceived; and a calm ensuing, they received such considerable damage, as rendered it necessary for the English admiral to return to Gibralter to refit. M. de la Clue seized this opportunity for sailing, and proceeded with great diligence to the straights. Boscawen had notice of his approach, before he reached Gibralter; and, though his ships were not perfectly ready to sail, he used such expedition, that in two hours they were out at sea. At day-light, he descried seven large ships of de la Clue's squadron; the other five, and three frigates, having been separated in the night. The English vessels, being newly refitted, proved better sailers, and soon came up with the enemy near cape Lagos, in Portugal. After a brisk engagement, in which the coolness and intrepidity of the British admiral were equally conspicuous, the French fleet was totally defeated. The Ocean and Redoubtable, two of the best ships in the French navy were run ashore and burnt; the Centaure and the Modeste, two other of their capital ships, were taken; and the rest, with great difficulty, obtained refuge in the harbour of Cadiz.

This event, however severe and discouraging, did not deter the French from their intended descent on Great Britain. They seemed to take courage from despair; they also supposed that the winter storms would compel the English ships to take shelter in their own harbours, and so give them an opportunity of slipping out to sea, and putting their design into execution. In this expectation they were not disappointed; a violent storm drove the English squadrons off the French coasts. Thurot, availing himself of this circumstance, immediately put to sea, and was as immediately pursued by commodore Boys. He had the good fortune, however, to escape to Gottenburg, in Sweden, where he was laid up till after Christmas by the severity of the weather, and the want of necessaries.

When the storm subsided, the French admiral, perceiving no enemy upon the coast, put to sea. Admiral Hawke, who had taken shelter in Torbay harbour, sailed on the very same day, the 14th of November. He directed his course for Quiberon bay, where he expected the French fleet would rendezvous; and, after meeting with several disappointments from contrary winds, on the 20th he discovered the headmost ships of the enemy, bearing northward, between the main land of France and the island of Belleisle. The fleets, on both sides, were the most powerful of any employed in the course of the war. The British consisted of 23 sail of the line, and the French of 21; but in number of men, and weight of metal, they were nearly equal.

The ardent wishes of the British admiral were now completed. The French fleet was within his reach, and a general engagement apparently inevitable. He overlooked the difficulties he had to encounter, though sufficient to check the bravest commander. The coast was full of shoals, sands, shallows, and rocks, as strange to the English, as familiar to the French pilots. The wind blew little less than a storm, and the waves ran mountains high; to which may be added, the increased dangers of a short day, a dark night, and a lee shore. Animated with the love of his country, and sensible of the importance of the service he was engaged in, he disregarded every danger and obstacle, rather than not encounter an enemy, on whose destruction the public safety depended.

The conduct of the French admiral was timid and injudicious. It was in his power either to fly or to fight; but he followed neither of these plans. Before he could resolve how to proceed, he allowed the British ships to come up with him; and then crowded his sail, when it was too late to escape. The action began at half past two, and was maintained with great fury for two hours. Hawke's great aim was at the Soleil Royal, the most capital ship in the French service, and commanded by Conflans in person. He ordered the master of his own ship to pass all the other ships of the enemy, and to lay him alongside that of the French admiral. The master remonstrated on the violence of the storm, and the danger of the coast. You have done your duty, said Hawke, in pointing out the danger; you are now to obey my orders, in bringing me alongside the Soleil Royal. His wish was gratified; and the Royal George ranged with the French admiral. Just as Hawke was about to discharge his reserved broadside, the Thesée, a French 70 gun ship, nobly interposed, received the whole fire, and was sent to the bottom. The Superbe shared the same fate, and the Formidable struck her colours. Had not the French been favoured by the night, their whole fleet must have been destroyed or taken. Seven of their ships, after throwing overboard all their guns, escaped into the river Villaine, and about as many more made for other ports.

The night which succeeded this action was dreadful; it blew a complete hurricane, and nothing was to be heard, on all hands, but signals of distress; friends and enemies blended together in one common danger. Humanity would have prevailed on the English to have assisted even an enemy amidst such indiscriminate distress; but they perceived that all efforts of that kind were impracticable, and would only hasten their own ruin, without affording any relief to the French. They therefore waited till the next day; and then they found that the French admiral had run his own, and another first-rate ship, the Heros, on shore. His own ship was burnt by himself, and the Heros by the English.

Thus ended this memorable and decisive engagement, upon the issue of which the fate of the two kingdoms seemed to depend. The English sustained little loss, but what was occasioned by the weather. The Essex and Resolution unfortunately ran on a sand-bank, called Lefour, where they were irrecoverably lost, notwithstanding every assistance that could be given; but most of their men, and some part of their stores, were saved. In the whole fleet, no more than one lieutenant and thirty-nine seamen and marines were killed, and 202 wounded. The loss of the French must have been great. Four of their best ships were destroyed, one taken, and the rest of their fleet disabled, shattered, and dispersed. It was remarkable, in this engagement, that no French captain was accused or even suspected of misbehaviour or cowardice.

A circumstance occurred at this period, which deserves to be commemorated, as it characterizes the spirit of the British navy. Admiral Saunders happened to arrive from the expedition against Quebec a little after Hawke had sailed. A long voyage, and the severe duty he had undergone, could not deter him from immediately setting sail to share in the glory and danger of this engagement. His good fortune was not equal to the generosity of his intentions. He arrived too late to give any assistance; but his resolution was deserving of praise, and entitled him to the honours of victory.

It was expected that this engagement would have been decisive of all future maritime operations, between the English and the French The French ministry, however, thought proper to palliate their last misfortune. They published an account, in which they exaggerated the strength of the English, represented their own loss as inconsiderable, and concluded with asserting, that so trivial a misfortune would soon be repaired. This partial misrepresentation was absolutely necessary to support the spirit of the people, which had been so deeply depressed by their successive defeats.

Besides the actions of the fleets, many gallant exploits were performed by the captains of single ships. The Vestal, captain Wood, engaged the Bellona, a French frigate greatly superior in men and weight of metal; and, after an obstinate contest, took her, and brought her safely into port. The Southampton and Melampe, two English frigates, commanded by captains Gilchrist and Hotham, gave chace to the Danae, a French ship of 40 guns and 330 men. The Melampe came up with her before the Southampton, and with admirable gallantry maintained a combat against a ship of double her own force. As they fought in the dark, captain Gilchrist was obliged to lie by till he could distinguish the one from the other. At day-break, he bore down on the Danae; and, after a brisk engagement, in which she had 40 men killed, and many wounded, obliged her to surrender. This victory, however, proved fatal to the gallant Gilchrist, He received a wound in the shoulder, which, though it did not deprive him of life, rendered him incapable of future service. On the 14th of April, the Achilles of 60 guns, commanded by captain Barrington, encountered, to the westward of cape Finisterre, a French ship of equal force, called the Count de St. Florentine, under the command of the Sieur de Montay. After an engagement of two hours, in which the French captain was shot, and 116 of his men killed or wounded, the Count de St. Florentine struck her colours. She was so much damaged, that it was very difficult to bring her into Falmouth. The Achilles had only 25 men killed or wounded. On the 27th of March, captain Faulkner of the Windsor, of 60 guns, discovered four large ships off the rock of Lisbon, to which he gave chace. On his approach, they formed the line of battle a-head, a cable's length asunder. He engaged the sternmost for upwards of an hour, which, having given a signal to the others to edge off, struck her colours. She proved to be the Duc de Chartres, pierced for 60 guns, but she carried only 24; and belonged, as well as the other three that escaped, to the East India Company.—Many other actions were fought by the English cruisers in different parts of the globe, in which the French were mostly unsuccessful.

At the opening of the last campaign, the affairs of his Prussian majesty wore a disastrous aspect; in this they seemed altogether desperate. Independent of his more formidable enemies, the Swedes began to be exceedingly troublesome to him. They had suffered but little; and the people, being bent on recovering the countries that were dismembered from the crown of Sweden, served with cheerfulness, though under the disadvantage of being badly commanded. The king of Poland, elector of Saxony, would willingly have appeared to decline any share in the war; but he was obliged, by the queen of Hungary, as well as by his own family, and the empress of Russia, to suffer a body of Saxons to serve in their armies. The duke of Mecklenburg, Schwerin, though a protestant prince, entered into all the schemes of France and Austria, for which he was severely chastised by his Prussian majesty.

FREDERIC had, in the beginning of the war, boasted, (and with great justice) that he had seven generals under him, who were not to be paralleled in Europe: but in a few years all of them were cut off, without a possibility of their being replaced; for though one genius may succeed another, practice alone can supply experience. He, however, still kept up a creditable appearance, and from time to time published such accounts of his resources and troops, as gave the world a very high idea of his power. His successes were not answerable to those reports. The Swedes, the French, the Russians, and the Austrians, were still in the field, in the beginning of the year 1760; and though singly they were no match for his troops, yet he sustained great losses by the continued repetition of their attacks.

THE Swedes invaded the open country of Pomerania; the Russians directed their views upon Colberg, because it afforded them a port in the Baltic, and the possession of it would have saved them the march of many hundred miles. His Prussian majesty had all the extensive countries of Saxony and Silesia, which border upon the almost inaccessible mountains of Bohemia, to cover, while the eastern part of his dominions was next to defenceless. Silesia is a strong and fertile country; but his manners and maxims were far from being of a conciliating nature, to a people who, for many centuries, had been taught to look upon the house of Austria as their lawful sovereigns.

SUCH was the situation of that prince in the beginning of the year 1760; and a more uncomfortable one can scarcely be conceived. He had nothing but empty fame, and the praise of news-writers, to counterbalance those dangers and disappointments to which he was every hour subjected, except the immense subsidy he obtained from England. This subsidy was the occasion of all his subsequent misfortunes; for he depended too much upon it for the continuance of a war, to which his powers were by no means adequate. He seemed himself somewhat sensible of this, for he formed a plan of operations, entirely defensive. His brother, prince Henry, commanded an army about Francfort on the Oder, in order to protect Silesia, the New Marche of Brandenburg, and Berlin, which, considering its importance, was one of the most defenceless places in Europe. He himself, in the mean time, lay in a camp, most judiciously chosen, between the Elbe and the Mulda, in an almost impregnable situation, with 250 pieces of cannon in his front. The conveniency of this position was the greater, enabling him to exchange succours with his brother.

HIS Prussian majesty, however, was deceived in all his designs. The Austrians were superior to him in force, and almost equal to him in discipline and courage. Laudohn, a general who had hitherto made but an indifferent figure, was, by the policy of the court of Vienna, set up as a rival to count Daun, whom the empress-queen considered as a great general, notwithstanding his inactivity, his caution, and his want of enterprise. The character of Laudohn was the reverse. His Prussian majesty had placed one of his generals, Fouquet, in whom he had great confidence, near Glatz, to serve as an intermediate assistance either to himself or his brother, prince Henry, according as circumstances should present themselves. Laudohn imposed upon his Prussian majesty and all his generals, by his mysterious manœuvres; Fouquet, supposing he intended to besiege Schweidnitz, left Glatz uncovered; upon which Laudohn made himself master of Landshut. Fouquet immediately abandoned the protection of Schweidnitz, and proceeded to Landshut, from whence he drove the Austrians.

THIS was what Laudohn had foreseen and expected; and, in the mean time, he secretly made such dispositions, that Fouquet was in effect surrounded, without the possibility of being relieved, while he was obliged to detach 2000 of the 15,000 he commanded, to preserve his communication with Schweidnitz. It happened at this time, that the Austrians were animated with a more than ordinary resentment against the Prussians; nor could all the precautions, which Fouquet had taken to fortify his camp, withstand it. The Austrians were aware of the masterly dispositions their general had made, and that for success they had to depend upon their own courage. Their behaviour seconded their high expectations, and it is hard to say whether the attack or the resistance was the more glorious; but the Austrians were superior, not in number only, but in condition. The Prussians had lain long on the defensive, had been but poorly supplied with provisions, and were consequently in low spirits. The Austrians, on the other hand, had lived in free quarters, and needed nothing that was capable of yielding strength or courage. Notwithstanding all their disadvantages, the Prussians behaved with admirable resolution, and maintained their posts, till, by main force, they were driven from one entrenchment to another; 4000 of them being killed, the remainder, which amounted nearly to 8000, surrendered themselves prisoners of war, 58 pieces of artillery, besides colours, were taken; the loss, however, of the Austrians, was computed at 12,000 men.

It is remarkable, in this war, that his Prussian majesty, who, I have some reason to suppose, superintended the accounts of his campaigns, found means to exaggerate the losses of the enemy, and to extenuate those of his own; so that the true statement of his affairs can be collected only from the consequences. But the defeat of Fouquet could neither be concealed nor palliated, and its effects were evident in every department of the war. Laudohn took one part of Glatz by storm, and the other by capitulation, though defended by 2000 men and 100 brass cannon. This perhaps was not the greatest loss. The important situation of the place, and the prodigious magazines it contained, were irretrievable; and now Silesia lay open to the Austrians.

Thus the city of Glatz was to the Austrians the first fruits of their complete victory. His Prussian majesty had no idea of the serious loss he had sustained, till he heard that Laudohn was going to besiege Breslau, the capital itself of Silesia, and by far too capacious for its fortifications and garrison. But his genius, and that alone, could enter the lists with his ill-fortune. He determined to pursue a plan similar to that of Laudohn, but still more mysterious, suggested by his own mind, ever fertile in expedients. All Europe gave him up for lost; and the discontented in England began, notwithstanding the public prepossessions in his favour, to complain that we had gone too far in supporting him, as his system, both of defensive and offensive war, was equally impracticable; and that our perseverance in his cause would injure us, without being of any benefit to him.

They were soon undeceived. As it was natural to expect that he would endeavour to retrieve his affairs in Silesia, the defence of which was his main point, he made preparations for that purpose. Daun, who commanded, not only his own army, but, in fact, the army of the empire, had no doubt of his intentions; and leaving general Lacy in Saxony, followed his Prussian majesty through Lusatia. In this march, the great foresight and penetration of his Prussian majesty eminently appeared. Daun's great object was to outmarch him. He had taken the south road; and the king, after passing the Elbe, and going through a woody country, was on the northward; so that he had the disadvantage of Daun, in their race to Silesia. Daun knew this, and availed himself of his success by accelerating his motions; so that he gained full two days march of his Prussian majesty, and, after reaching Gorlitz, proceeded with great rapidity to Lauban. This was what his Prussian majesty expected and wanted; and he had the admirable address to appropriate to himself the advantage of Daun's two day's march; for he instantly fell into the route by which Daun had advanced, and passing the Spree at Bautzen, he appeared before the gates of Dresden; so that the war now assumed another aspect.

Frederic, though he could not cope with Daun's, the Imperial, and Lacy's army together, yet was superior to the two latter; so that the first was obliged to retreat, and the other to change its situation: and the king of Prussia being joined, according to previous but eventual orders, by his generals Hulsen and Ziethen, left prince Henry, who was at Glogau, at liberty to act as occasion might require, while he himself formed the siege of Dresden.

It is necessary to observe, that at this period every plan concerted by the court of Vienna was like the laws of the Medes and Persians, unalterable; and deviation from it, if not attended with success, however rational the motives, had often proved fatal to their generals. The empress-queen, to please her sister of Russia, and out of mere decency, had instructed Daun to make, in the campaign, the preservation of Dresden his capital object. He was then in Silesia, where he durst not, for these reasons, pursue his advantages; and astonished as he was at his Prussian majesty's masterly conduct, he found himself, against his better judgment, obliged to return to Saxony, that he might preserve Dresden; and his return gave prince Henry, an opportunity of moving towards Silesia. All the motions of this campaign had hitherto been so skilful, that the reader, who understands the game of chess, can scarcely fail to find out the similarity. The king of Prussia made the more surprising and the finer moves; but Daun shewed himself the surer player. His return from Silesia was much more quick than was expected, from his phlegm and regularity; for on the 19th of July, he and his army appeared within a few miles of Dresden.

His Prussian majesty, however, did not fail to avail himself to the utmost of the start he had gained. He besieged Dresden, which was defended by general Maquire, an officer of courage and experience. The operations of the siege, unless we were to recount particulars, can convey no new instructions to the reader; who can imagine, on the one side a most determined attack, and a most intrepid defence on the other: and the ruin of the finest buildings any city in the universe contained, by the incessant fire from three batteries of cannon and mortars, while each party practised every possible art and manœuvre. The approach of count Daun served to redouble the fury of the Prussians, and at the same time increased and confirmed the intrepidity of the besieged; especially when Daun found means to throw into the place no fewer than sixteen battalions in the night of the 21st. After such a reinforcement, and while three armies were in the neighbourhood, (for the army of the empire and the army under Lacy had returned by this time) it would have been more than madness for his Prussian majesty to continue the siege; and therefore he raised it, but without molestation from his enemies.

Thus ended this mighty trial of skill between great genius and great sagacity, and each supported by a proportionable degree of courage and experience. The conduct of the Prussians was brilliant, that of the Austrians exemplary; but, in the main, if any advantage were gained, it was on the side of the king, though the result of the contest was still precarious.

Laudohn, who was all this while in Silesia, trusted to his being joined by the Russians; but, through their unwieldiness and irregularity, they did not arrive in time to make the campaign decisive on that side. Being still, however, in hopes of their junction, on the 1st of August he had his cannon and mortars in condition to play from their batteries upon Breslau. Count Fauenzein commanded for his Prussian majesty in that city. A kind of military ceremonial at first passed between the two generals. Laudohn, partly in civility, partly in compassion, observing the weakness of Fauenzein and that of the place, employed various arguments to induce him to accept of an honourable capitulation. Fauenzein was too obstinate and too unpolite to believe one word he said; and thus having fought through all the weapons of soldier-like courtesy, they drew the sword; and nothing was wanting that could do honour to the besieged or the besiegers. Laudohn returned from hostilities to compliments, and was answered only by reproaches, for doing the same thing to Breslau that his Prussian majesty was doing to Dresden, that is, ruining the town, without injuring the fortifications. Meanwhile, no approach of the Russians appeared; and an account arrived, that prince Henry was then, the 5th of August, within five leagues of the Austrian camp; a report which induced Laudohn to break up the siege.

The most busy part of the campaign approached. Though prince Henry had obliged Laudohn to retire from Breslau, that general, with a powerful army, blocked up Neiss and Schweidnitz, and waited to form a junction with the Russians; a junction which his Prussian majesty had long dreaded. The Swedes, amounting to 22,000, had begun their operations; and Daun, his principal opponent, was lying in wait to terminate his hopes.

In this discouraging and distracted condition, Frederic had recourse to expedients, which necessity alone can suggest, and success justify. Finding that he could effect nothing in Saxony, he, on the 30th of July, decamped, and took the route of Meissen. He marched, in five days' time, near 200 miles, at the head of an army encumbered with artillery and 2000 waggons. He passed the Elbe, the Spree, the Neiss, the Queiss, and the Boher, with one Austrian army on one side of him, under general Reid, near Bautzen; another behind him, under general Lacy; and a third in front, under general Beck; and all this without opposition. After this astonishing rapidity, it may perhaps be unnecessary to add, that he gained many, not inconsiderable advantages, over the Austrian generals.

Count Dann, as we have mentioned, was still at Bautzen, with an intention to penetrate into Silesia and join Laudohn; in which case would have been effected, the often-attempted junction between the Austrians and Russians. Laudohn, whose army was every day receiving strong reinforcements, had been, for some time, with difficulty kept in play by prince Henry; but the delay of a few days must have made the match unequal, as the Russians were hourly advancing. Dann was astonished at the escape of the king of Prussia, and prepared to follow him. His majesty encamped at Lignitz; but found himself in danger, after all, of missing his great aim, which was that of engaging Laudohn before the armies of Dann and Lacy could arrive to his assistance, which they did before his majesty could find that opportunity. But still Dann and Laudohn occupied different camps; the one on his front, the other on his rear. They had taken possession of an extent of very strong country, no less than 30 English miles, along the Katsbach, from Parchwitz to Coffendau, and had filled it with lines and redoubts; so that the whole appeared as one continued fortification. Frederic, with all his skill, could find no means of attacking one army, without being exposed to be ruined by the other. He was again in one of those situations, which had so often distressed him. It is yet unknown, whether he owed his deliverance on this occasion to his own wonderful sagacity, which suggested what he himself would do, had he the same advantages, or whether he was favoured by private intelligence. Both might be true. Daun was tempted by the occasion which presented itself, and resolved to become the aggressor. He concerted a plan, with Laudohn and Lacy, for attacking his Prussian majesty; while the Russians, to the number of 24,000 men, having thrown bridges over the Oder, were to pass it that very day, under count Czernichew. His Prussian majesty saw that his enemies could not surround him, without making one of those movements he had so long desired. On the very night when the Austrians had proposed their most important stroke, he privately decamped from Lignitz, and removed to a strong pass, by which he knew Laudohn's division had to march.

Every thing succeeded to his wish. Daun executed his part of the plan with profound silence, in the night, but found the enemy decamped; and soon had certain indications that they were engaged with Laudohn. It was thought, especially at his own court, that if he had made a vigorous attack upon the rear of the Prussian army, it would have been totally defeated. But this opinion probably did him injustice; for his Prussian majesty, foreseeing such an attack, had guarded his rear with very strong entrenchments. In the mean time, Laudohn had passed the Katsbach, and proceeded as far as Psaffendorf, in his march to Lignitz, where he was in hopes of assisting at the mortal blow his Prussian majesty was to receive. The break of day, and the dissipation of a very thick fog, presented to his eyes the dreadful prospect of the whole Prussian army, drawn up in battle array, with a strong artillery on its front, and posted to great advantage. This was the morning of the 15th of August. But the astonishment of Laudohn neither daunted his courage, nor disordered his judgment. Finding he could not retreat, he formed his army with admirable presence of mind; and a tremendous battle ensued, in which his Prussian majesty was in person equally exposed with the meanest soldier; his clothes being bored in several places, and a horse shot under him. He fought not for glory or dominion, but for safety. Nothing, perhaps, but his own personal intrepidity could have gained him the victory. His veteran generals were all dead or killed; and his troops were but newly raised, yet brave and faithful. His example animated their efforts; and Laudohn, without losing any of his military reputation, retreated to the Katsbach, with the loss (as the Austrians themselves acknowledged) of 6000 men, killed, wounded, and taken prisoners; the Prussians, however, reckoned the loss at 10,000. Two generals and 84 officers were among the prisoners; and the trophies which fell to the victors were 82 pieces of cannon, and 123 pair of colours. The loss of the Prussians was said to amount to 500 killed, and 1200 wounded.

THOUGH the loss of the battle must, as has been hinted, have proved fatal to his Prussian majesty, it did not prove so to the Austrians, whose generals received daily reinforcements and encouragement from their sovereign. Daun, though he could not succeed in Silesia, turned his arms against other objects. He detached prince Lavenstein and general Beck, with part of his army, to encourage the Russians to advance. But the terror of the battle of Psaffendorf had made such an impression upon them, that they had repassed the Oder, and were marching northwards. This did not hinder Daun from blockading Schweidnitz; and his Prussian majesty, having by this time joined his brother at Newmarche, detached general Goltze to observe the motions of the Russians, while he himself defeated the corps of Austrians under general Beck, and obliged Daun to raise the siege of Schweidnitz, and to retreat precipitately to the heights of Landshut.

IN Saxony, general Hulsen, on the 20th of August, had an action with part of the Imperial army, who attacked him with great fury, in order to cut off his communication with Torgau. The engagement was hot, and Hulsen discovered great military abilities; for, besides that a number of the enemy were killed, he took, with little loss to himself, 41 officers, and 1200 privates, prisoners. But he could not take the advantages of this victory; but was obliged to retreat, lest the grand army of Imperialists should cut off his communication with the Elbe. By this retreat he forfeited his intercourse with the king, whose mind was distracted, like his army, amidst a variety of objects. The Russians were now marching through the Lower Silesia; the Austrians found no resistance in Lusatia; and Saxony, notwithstanding every effort of Hulsen to defend it, was upon the point of being lost to the king. Such was the state of his Prussian majesty's affairs towards the close of the campaign. He had defeated his enemies, without finding their numbers lessened. He had gained victories, but he reaped no advantages; and all the prodigies of valour he had displayed barely rescued him from the jaws of perdition.

A GREAT body of Russians, under count Czernichew, had now entered the New Marche of Brandenburg; and 15,000 Austrians, under the generals Lacy and Brentano, proposed to meet them at the gates of Berlin; the whole amounting to 40,000 men. The Prussian generals, Hulsen and Werner, after a number of rapid marches and artful movements, endeavoured to cover that capital; but their whole force did not amount to 16,000 men; so that all they could do was to make a faint opposition to the advanced body of the Russians, under count Tottleben, and to retreat; after throwing into the city three incomplete battalions.

THUS his Prussian majesty's capital, the proud, the envied seat of arms and arts, adorned with all the improvements and beauties that a long series of wise princes could bestow, the populous residence of the popish as well as of the reformed religion, was in a manner abandoned to the power of inveterate enemies, and barbarous conquerors, who were pleased with the near prospect of plundering one of the finest cities in the world. The inhabitants were manufacturers, shopkeepers, and artists; they knew nothing of arms, and gave themselves up to a total despondency. The garrison was weak, and surrendered prisoners of war; and the poor inhabitants had now nothing to depend upon, to save them from the worst of fates, except the mediation of the foreign ministers residing at Berlin. This proved far more effectual than had been expected. A free exercise of religion was granted to the inhabitants; they were to be protected in their persons and effects; and it was agreed, that the Russian irregulars were not to enter the city. Notwithstanding those favourable terms, great excesses were committed. The regulars, who marched in, destroyed the magazines, the founderies, and all the warehouses of military stores, of which they seized immense quantities, besides artillery and arms. The contributions that were demanded amounted to a regular kind of plunder. Eight hundred thousand guilders were ordered to be immediately paid down; a further contribution of 1,900,000 German crowns was imposed; and it was with the utmost difficulty that the officers were able to preserve a tolerable degree of moderation among the barbarians.

Considering the exasperated state of the Austrians, it was surprising that the inhabitants of Berlin suffered so little as they did. This may partly be accounted for, by the great indulgences and freedom they enjoyed in it, being the residence of strangers of all religions, and from all parts of Germany; so that it is easy to be conceived, that the Austrians, (officers as well as soldiers) who entered it, had many friends and relations there. This account is the more probable, as both Austrians and Russians were guilty of the most ungenerous and unmanly depredations upon the royal palace. Like true descendants of the Goths and Vandals, they plundered the royal palace of Charlottenburg, destroyed the furniture they could not carry off, defaced the paintings, and broke to pieces the noble collection of antique and other statues, that had belonged to the Brandenburg family, and particularly the museum of the famous cardinal Polignac. The queen's castle of Schonhausen, and that of the margrave Charles Fredericksfield experienced the same treatment.

Amidst the numerous host of barbarians, a general was found who deserves a better epithet. This was prince Esterhasi, who took possession of the palace at Potsdam, his Prussian majesty's famous Sans Souci. All the ravage there committed was, that the prince, in viewing the apartments, took into his custody the picture that he was told bore the greatest resemblance to his Prussian majesty, and two German flutes, on which he usually played.

On the 13th of October, Berlin was evacuated, after suffering four days, under the scourge of the Austrians and Russians, who left Brandenburg little better than a desart; having destroyed the country, and carried off all the horses and cattle they could find. The consequence of this blow upon his Prussian majesty was, that, having no army in Saxony, his enemies, after leaving Berlin, recovered all that electorate; while Stainville, at the head of a detachment of Broglio's army, laid Hulberstadt under contribution; and the Russians laid siege to the sea-port of Colberg. The Swedes were advancing in the Western Pomerania, and in Silesia. Laudohn invested the fortress of Cosel.

Upon the whole, the affairs of his Prussian majesty seemed now more desperate than ever. When his enemies took the cities of Wittemberg, Meissen, Leipsic, and Torgau, he lost all his immense magazines of stores; and he himself was closely watched by a far superior army, under the most vigilant general of his age, count Daun, without knowing where to take his winter-quarters; so completely had his enemies ravaged his dominions. He had made some movements towards the relief of his capital; and upon its being evacuated, he and Daun passed the Elbe on the 25th of October. Soon afterwards, his majesty was joined by his generals, Hulsen and prince Eugene of Wirtemberg; but found himself under circumstances, from which he could only obtain relief by the most desperate exertion.

CHAPTER XVII.

GEORGE II.

[1760.]

Attempt of the French to recapture Quebec—Their Failure—Military Enterprises and Ultimate Triumph of the King of Prussia—Movements of Prince Ferdinand—Battles of Colbach and Wesel—Death of George II.—His Character.

NOTWITHSTANDING the boasted skill of the French in defending fortifications, and their still more boasted bravery, the loss of Quebec had brought an indelible stigma both on their conduct and courage. Retaking it, therefore, was a favourite point of their generals commanding in Canada, as nothing less would serve to efface the reproach occasioned by their pusillanimous surrender of that place. Accordingly, early in the spring, Monsieur de Levi, having mustered an army of about 12,000 men, and being well provided with every necessary, took the field with the resolution of besieging that town. He began his march on the 17th of April, and appeared on the heights of Abraham in ten days after, within three miles of Quebec.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL Murray, who had been left to command the garrison, had put the place in the best posture of defence it was capable of receiving. He had originally only 6000 men under his command, and no provisions during the winter, except what could be spared by the fleet before their departure. Owing to the severity of the weather, and living on salt provisions, (even these being scarce) the army had suffered greatly. Upwards of a thousand men had died of the scurvy; and an equal number were sick and incapable of doing duty. The French had six frigates upon the river St. Lawrence, of from 44 to 26 guns, without one British ship to oppose them. There was no probability, therefore, of the arrival of any immediate relief.

IN these distressful circumstances, general Murray formed the resolution of marching out, and giving the enemy battle, rather than awaiting them in an extensive fortification, where famine and disease were devouring his little army. By doing so he had a chance of success; and if he failed, he had still the town to retreat into, which in that case he was determined to hold, as long as it was tenable. In pursuance of this resolution, he marched out on the 28th of April, at the head of 3000 men, all that could be spared from the town, to meet an enemy four times their number; but his troops were eager and confident, and he could depend upon their bravery; circumstances, which he considered as placing them nearly on an equality with the enemy.

WHEN general Murray came in sight of the enemy, he found their van advantageously posted on an eminence covered with trees, and their main body extended, in one column, in the valley below. He immediately ordered their van to be attacked; which was done with so much fury, that it was instantly broken, and driven in the greatest disorder upon their main body, which nevertheless stood firm, and received the British with so close and well-directed a fire, as threw them in their turn into some confusion. The French endeavoured to take advantage of this circumstance, and extended themselves semicircularly, in order to surround them, and cut off their retreat. This, however, by the good conduct of the officers, and the spirit and intrepidity of the men, was happily prevented.

At last, after an obstinate struggle, in which the British lost about 1000 men, it was thought advisable to order a retreat, which was effected in good order, without being immediately pursued by the enemy, who had suffered considerably in killed and wounded.

This misfortune, instead of damping the spirit of the British troops, seemed rather to inspire them with fresh courage. They were no sooner within the walls of the town, than they began to labour at the fortifications with redoubled ardour. Although the French opened trenches before the place on the very evening of the battle, yet so slow were they in their operations, that it was the 11th of May before they could bring a battery to bear. This gave the garrison time to make the best preparation they could for a defence. Accordingly 132 pieces of cannon were mounted upon the ramparts, though a great part of them must have been useless, owing to the want of hands to manage them; and general Murray, notwithstanding his bravery, and that of his troops, must have been at last obliged to submit, had not an unexpected reinforcement come to his relief.

On the 9th of May, a frigate arrived in the harbour of Quebec, with the agreeable news, that lord Colville and commodore Swanton, with the squadrons under their command, had entered the river St. Lawrence; and on the 15th, a ship of the line and another frigate likewise arrived. The two frigates were instantly sent against the French squadron, anchored above the town, and, in the space of a few hours, sunk, dispersed, or took the whole of them. Mons. de Levi no sooner received intelligence of this disaster, than he imagined, that there was a strong fleet at hand to support these frigates; and, on the evening of the 18th, fled with the utmost precipitation, abandoning all his provisions and artillery.

General Murray, who intended to make a vigorous sally next day, and had ordered the garrison to be in arms early in the morning, having been informed of the enemy's retreat, immediately directed a pursuit; but being unable to overtake them, he returned and took possession of their camp, which they had left standing, with a great quantity of baggage, stores, &c.

Montreal was now the only place of consequence remaining in possession of the French in Canada. Here M. de Vandreuil, lieutenant-general and governor of the province, commanded, and thither the remains of the French army retired. General Amherst had projected the conquest of this place, which would make him master of the whole province; and had issued the necessary orders to carry his plan into execution. As he knew the whole French force was assembled at Montreal, his design was, by making the British army take different routes, so to hem the enemy in, as to cut them off from any chance of escaping, to make a stand in any other part of the country. In the prosecution of this design, he ordered colonel Haviland, with the troops under his command, to march from Crown Point, and take possession of a small island in the lake Champlain, and thence to take the shortest way to the banks of the river St. Lawrence. General Murray, at the head of what troops could be spared from the garrison of Quebec, was ordered to advance by water to Montreal; while general Amherst himself was to proceed directly thither from New York, with the main body of the asmy, consisting of about 10,000 men, by the Mohawk river, to the lake of Ontario, and thence down the river St. Lawrence.

After a most difficult and dangerous passage down this river, in which several boats and men were lost, the British army arrived at Montreal, and landed on the 6th of September, having, in their way thither, taken the fort of L'Isle Royale, after a slight resistance, and without any loss.

The spirit of the French seemed, at this crisis, entirely to have forsaken them. The British forces were suffered to land without opposition; and, on the day following, (the 7th of September,) general Amherst received a letter from the marquis de Vandreuil, with proposals for a capitulation. The plan projected by general Amherst had succeeded to his utmost wish; and the French were entirely cut off from a retreat. General Murray had landed on the island; and colonel Haviland had just arrived on the south side of the river opposite to Montreal. Notwithstanding the French were thus cut off from every hope of escaping, and the British general might have dictated his own terms; yet, as the surrender of this place finished the war in Canada, which was entirely under the subjection of Great Britain, and to prevent the effusion of human blood, more favourable terms were granted to the enemy, than in their present situation they had reason to expect. They were refused the honours of war, but not made prisoners; and were to be transported to France in British vessels, under condition of not serving against Britain during the continuance of the war.

A SMALL fleet, consisting of one frigate, two large store-ships, and nineteen smaller vessels, having on board troops and military stores, had been sent from France, for the relief of Montreal; but when they arrived at the mouth of the river St. Lawrence, understanding that the British squadron had got the start of them, they put into the bay of Chaleurs, on the coast of Acadia, for shelter. They were, however, discovered, and intelligence was sent Louisburg, where were several British men of war; one of which, commanded by the honourable captain (afterwards lord) Byron, immediately set sail in quest of them, and the whole fleet was either taken or destroyed. Captain Byron likewise demolished two batteries, which had been raised for their protection.

THE French were equally unsuccessful in every other part of America. Having, by means of their missionaries, a much greater influence, than the English, over the minds of the savages, they had drawn the Cherokee Indians into their interest; and there was reason to believe, that the Creeks, another very powerful nation, would follow their example. Philosophers and philosophical historians, have indulged themselves, in exhibiting flattering pictures of human nature, in its least cultivated state; but there is every reason to believe, from repeated experience, that the American Indians in general have no other sentiments than those of rapine, cruelty, and revenge, which they never fail to gratify; and that they can be awed only by force.

MR. Littleton, at that time governor of Carolina, knew this; and in October, 1759, he marched, with about 1100 regulars and provincials, 300 miles into their country, lying between Keeowee and Charlestown. The barbarians, seeing their persons and possessions thus exposed to instant destruction, humbled themselves before the governor, and agreed to all the terms he imposed. They even delivered such of their countrymen into his hands, as had been guilty of the most atrocious barbarities towards the English; and 22 hostages, to assure their due performance of all obligations.

MR. Littleton, reasonably thinking that he had been successful in his enterprise, returned to his government; but no sooner was he gone, than the very same savages blocked up fort Laudon, and attempted to take fort Edward. General Amherst, hearing of this, sent colonel Montgomery, (afterwards earl of Eglinton,) to relieve those two British forts, and to chastise the barbarians, with a regiment of highlanders, a battalion of royal Americans, some grenadiers, and the provincial troops. Upon his entering the country of the savages, he burnt one of their capital towns, containing about 200 houses; and, making war after their own manner, he spread terror and desolation wherever he came. He marched on to the middle Cherokees; and in his progress fell into an ambush, where he had 20 men killed, and 80 wounded. Though the enemy, in this skirmish, lost 80 men, besides a considerable town; yet the colonel, perceiving that every day, as he advanced, he had such encounters to expect, thought it expedient to retreat to fort George, whence he went to New York, to rejoin the grand army; leaving behind him 400 men, for the protection of the province. The garrison of fort Laudon, having consumed all their provisions, were obliged to come to a capitulation, on the 7th of August, with the savages, who most infamously broke it; butchering all the officers but one, and carrying the soldiers, whom they did not kill, into the most miserable of all captivities.

AT the commencement of the next campaign in Germany, marshal Daun, that he might cover Leipsic and Torgau, had fallen back upon the latter; and his Prussian majesty saw him encamped, at the head of 80,000 men, secured on the one side by the Elbe, on the other by the morasses, hills, and woods; with 200 pieces of cannon in his front, where alone he could be attacked. His Prussian majesty, undaunted by this formidable object, acquainted his troops in person, on the 3rd of November, that he would, on that day, teach them by his example to conquer or to die. 1760.

GENERAL Hulsen had the command of the right wing, with orders to take post in a wood to the left of the Austrians, and there to remain till the battle would begin. General Ziethen, with the left wing, was to attack the right of the enemy, whilst the king was to make the grand charge in the front. These dispositions directed Daun in his, and he made them in a masterly manner. Ziethen began the attack; upon which his majesty hastened his march. The situation of both armies, according to the accounts published at Magdeburg, was such, that either the Prussian right or left must take the enemy in the rear, and so prevent their affording any assistance to that part of their army, on which the main attack was to be made.

It is impossible to describe a battle so extensive and complicated as this, in which they who were present disagree in their several relations; it was allowed, on all hands, that his Prussian majesty, rapid and intrepid as he was, suffered, with great slaughter, three repulses; but general Ziethen, having defeated the right wing, took possession of several advantageous eminences, and, galloping up with a strong body of horse, to sustain the infantry, they were, notwithstanding their prodigious losses and fatigues, brought once more to the charge, and proved victorious. The enemy were routed in all parts. The engagement lasted from two in the afternoon till nine in the night, when the Austrians, after great slaughter, were obliged to repass the Elbe, which they did in excellent order.

This battle, the most important of those his Prussian majesty gained, cost him the dearest; but it was attended with the most wonderful and favourable circumstances. He had lost about 10,000 of his finest men, in killed and wounded, besides 3000 taken prisoners. The loss of the Austrians in men was not greater. The Prussians, however, made 8000 prisoners, among whom were four generals, and 216 other officers, and were in possession of a very great number of warlike trophies taken from the enemy. Both sides seem to agree, that the Prussians' victory was owing, next to their own valour, and that of their king, to a wound which count Daun received in the thigh, and by which he was obliged to quit the field of battle, and leave the command to general O'Donnel, who ordered the retreat. The pitchy darkness of the night was equally favourable to both armies, fatigued and exhausted as they were.

The court of Vienna was surprised, astonished, and ashamed, at this sudden reverse of fortune. In vain did the ministers of the queen, in publications of every kind, endeavour to extenuate their own loss, and to magnify that of the enemy. They did all they could to keep up the desponding spirits of their allies. They could not dissemble, that, besides all other disadvantages the Prussians lay under in the attack, they were inferior to the Austrians by 30,000. So that, by the common voice, the palm of discipline and generalship was adjudged to his Prussian majesty; he received a contusion in the breast, and, in the hottest of the battle, exposed his person, as if he deemed himself invulnerable. The consequences, indeed, indisputably determined the victory in his favour; having recovered all Saxony, except its capital, which he was not in a condition to attack, as count Daun had posted all his army in it, or in cantonments around it.

In the interim, the Prussian general, Werner, had, after the evacuation of Berlin, been sent with a body of troops into Pomerania, where he obliged the Russians to abandon the long-continued siege of Colberg; and, after defeating the Swedes in the western part of that province, he forced them to fall back upon Stralsund, and to abandon the whole of Prussian Pomerania.

On the side of Silesia, Laudohn was obliged to raise the siege of Cosel, to abandon Landshut, and to retire into the Austrian Silesia; while the Russians had entirely evacuated the other parts of his Prussian majesty's dominions, and the army of the empire, about the same time, retired into Franconia.

His Prussian majesty lost no advantage that could possibly be drawn from his victory at Torgau. Pretending to have received great provocation, he taxed the circle of Leipsic alone, not only in its ordinary revenues, and in vast magazines of provisions, but in two millions of crowns, for the ensuing year; a contribution which London itself, the richest city in the world, would have found it difficult to raise. All the other parts of Misnia were taxed in the same proportion; and estimating the Saxons as beasts of burden, he made the furnishing of 20,000 of them, to recruit his army, a part of their contributions. But no country suffered more from his Prussian majesty's successes, than the dominions of the dukes of Mecklenburgh, which were so unfortunately situated, with regard to those of Prussia, that they were deprived of relief from their allies. The treatment those princes met with, and the hardships inflicted on their subjects, were, perhaps, more than severe; and were said to have drawn from the pen of a young princess, who now fills the throne of England, a pathetic representation of her family's and country's sufferings, which affected even his Prussian majesty, but made much deeper impressions on the breast of the heir apparent to the crown of England, now George III., to whom the letter was communicated.

I HAVE already remarked the implacability of the contending powers in Germany; their accumulated distresses and disappointments seemed only to increase their mutual rancour. Whatever might be the sentiments of the British people, respecting the German war, they were unwilling to afflict their venerable monarch, by abandoning his electoral dominions, which were always the chief object of his anxiety. The successes of prince Ferdinand, though rather splendid than solid, had raised their opinion of his martial abilities; and they entertained flattering hopes, that every campaign would prove decisive in his favour. The ministry too endeavoured to enforce and improve this mode of reasoning; but it could not be dissembled, that the burden of the war devolved upon Great Britain, although she had very little immediate interest in the event. This consideration, too glaring to be concealed, induced the British ministry to open a negotiation; but, however sincere they might be, it is certain his Prussian majesty was by no means so when he complied with it. The two empresses and France, not to mention Sweden and Poland, though they could not flatly reject so plausible a proposition, were very little disposed to accept of it, and so artfully opposed all the expedients proposed by the neutral powers, particularly Stanislaus and the Dutch, that the overture came to nothing.

THE winter of the year 1759 was remarkably severe, and Germany suffered greatly from cold and scarcity of provisions; a circumstance which forced the poorer sort of inhabitants into the armies of their several masters; so that those of the empress-queen were now more numerous than ever. The British army in Germany having suffered greatly from the preceding campaign, six regiments of foot, commanded by major-general Griffin, were sent to reinforce it, and were followed by Elliot's light horse; so that, in the beginning of the campaign, the British army consisted of 25,000 men; a greater number of troops than had ever served before in one place, and at one time, under king William, the duke of Marlborough, or under any British general for two centuries before.

THE French were equally anxious to render the campaign decisive. M. Broglio continued to command, and his army was reinforced to the amount of 100,000 men, the finest troops in France; while the count de St. Germaine, with whom he was but on indifferent terms, was at the head of 30,000 on the Rhine, lest any ill consequence should arise from the misunderstanding of the generals.

THE death of the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, which happened in the beginning of the year, excited some apprehensions, with regard to the conduct of his son and successor. These fears were soon dissipated. The prince, notwithstanding the prepossessions against him, even exceeded the zeal of his father in the protestant cause, adding considerably to the number of his troops in the service of Great Britain.

THE operations of the two armies were by no means answerable to the preparations and reinforcements which both sides had made and received. The campaign did not open with any effect, till late in the season. Indeed, at the beginning, the object of both armies was to procure provisions, rather than to fight; and all the motions of their detached parties were devoted to the supply of provisions, rather than the pursuit of victory. A severe winter, an exhausted country, and a late spring, were calamities equally distressing to both; and each was impressed with a fellow-feeling for the other.

WHEN the rigour of the season abated, the superior providence of the French over the allies appeared. The former, while they lay in their cantonments, were supplied with provisions from the Rhine, the Maine, and the Moselle; while the latter were totally disabled, by their indigence, to undertake any design or enterprise of consequence. The only action worth mentioning was performed by the hereditary prince, who laid Fulda under contribution, and expelled the French from it, at the head of some British troops. The whole, indeed, of this campaign consisted of little detached expeditions, planned and executed by this gallant young hero. These actions, however unimportant in their consequences, demand a particular relation, as striking instances of intrepidity and military knowledge. The misunderstanding between the two French generals, Broglio and St. Germaine, was productive of consequences highly advantageous to the allies. Instead of the one advancing by Munster, and the other by the landgraviate of Hesse, and leaving strong posts to the eastward of the Weser, operations that might have proved fatal to the allies, their forces were united into one body. This proceeding, so discordant with the concerted plan of their operations, disgusted St. Germaine, an officer of true military genius, who retired from the service. Notwithstanding this, the French took Marburg and Dillenburg, and made the garrisons of both prisoners of war.

The inactivity of the German general, in this perilous situation, has never been clearly accounted for. The hereditary prince, at the head of some British troops, endeavoured to retrieve it. The French army had hitherto moved in two bodies, and the corps under St. Germaine was known to have advanced to Corbach; the prince resolved to attack him, and drive him from that post. By this time, however, the junction of the French troops was formed; and the prince, instead of encountering 10,000 foot, and seventeen squadrons of horse, fell in with the entire body of the French army, which attacked him with so much resolution, as to render his retreat almost impracticable. The French were fresh, numerous, and well formed. The British forces behaved with the greatest intrepidity; but the Germans gave themselves up, both horse and foot, to a despondency, which threatened a total rout; while the French were every moment pouring in reinforcements, chiefly of cavalry, to complete their destruction. In this desperate situation, the prince put himself at the head of Bland's and Howard's dragoons, who perfectly seconded his ardour. They soon checked the career of the French, covered the retreat of the Germans, and thus saved the army, at the expence of 900 men, killed, wounded, or taken prisoners, and 15 pieces of cannon, which were left on the field of battle. The prince received a wound, which, however, gave him less uneasiness than the mortification he suffered by this defeat.

The allied army, during this action, retreated towards the Dymel, and were now encamped at Saxenhausen. It was matter of astonishment to military men, that Broglio did not pursue his advantage; nor can the reasons of his inactivity be to this day accounted for. The hereditary prince unjustly charged himself with being the author of a defeat, which did him and the English so much credit, and formed a daring resolution to repair it. He knew that Glaubitz, a French general, was at the head of a considerable detachment, which was marched towards Ziegenhagen, a place of importance in the landgraviate of Hesse. In order to relieve this place, the prince put himself at the head of six German battalions, two brigades of Hunter's, a regiment of hussars, and Elliot's light horse. This last regiment had been raised only in the preceding spring and winter. Not a man amongst them had ever been before in the service; but they were speedily disciplined, and made an excellent appearance; so that the hereditary prince chose them to form part of his detachment; and the event justified his choice. He was at this time about sixty English miles from Glaubitz, who fancied himself in perfect security. The prince, however, led his detachment, unperceived, within sight of the enemy's camp; and, after reconnoitring it, he formed the plan of an attack, which was of a very singular nature. The situation of the enemy was such, as to be inaccessible on the left, except by making a detour of two leagues, through woody uneven grounds; and the right was secured by mountains. The prince undertook, in person, the attack of the left. He committed that of the right to the infantry, who were obliged to climb up mountains to come at their enemy. Both charges were vigorous, and both succeeded. The enemy were, in a manner, routed, before Glaubitz had time to form them; but they were routed with very little loss, and the advantage of their situation enabled them to retire from one wood to another in full body, while the prince was unable to bring up the fatigued and harassed infantry to the pursuit. It was on this occasion that Elliot's light horse performed services that would have done honour to the firmest veterans in Europe. The prince in person led them on, and they alone entered the wood, where their address and discipline were equal to their intrepidity.

THE enemy, unable to resist them, were charged and penetrated five times; by which a party of 500, separated from the rest, threw down their arms, and surrendered prisoners of war. Much, however, still remained to be done, before the victory could be complete. A regiment of the enemy's hussars was entirely cut to pieces; and the main body, which had taken post in a wood, found themselves surrounded, and were obliged, though not till after great slaughter, to give up their arms. The prisoners made on this occasion, besides Glaubitz himself, and the prince of Anhalt, were 177 officers, and 2482 private men; nine pair of colours, and six pieces of cannon were taken. Upon the whole, this engagement was, with regard to the captures, one of the most extraordinary which had occurred in the course of the war. The hereditary prince lost no more than 79 men; but of those 71 were of Elliot's light horse.

PRINCE Ferdinand remained all this time in his camp at Saxenhausen; but, after this action, he moved to Kalle, near Cassel. Upon this, the French, who were very numerous, divided themselves into three armies. One of them, which formed their reserve, passed the Dymel at Stilbergen, under the chevalier de Muy, who had succeeded St. Germaine in his command; another body, their main army, advanced under Broglio himself to Kalle; and the third, under prince Xavier of Saxony, took the route of Cassel. From those motions it was plain, that the French generals meditated some important blow; and prince Ferdinand thought it his best course to pass the Dymel, and at all events fight de Muy.

ON the 31st of July, the allies, having passed the river, and formed upon the heights of Corbach, came in sight of the French, who were posted to great advantage at Warbourg. The hereditary prince turned the left of the enemy into two columns, so as to attack them in front and rear, with his usual briskness; but the French were so well reinforced, that he could do nothing effectual. In the mean time, prince Ferdinand ordered some detachments to attack the French bridges over the Dymel on the right, and he himself advanced to charge the enemy in front. It must be acknowledged that these dispositions, had they been properly supported, must have been decisive in favour of the allies; but the flower of their army, which consisted of the British, were five miles behind; so that, though the French, by the efforts of the hereditary prince, began to give way on that side, yet their main body was at liberty to retire, without putting it in the power of the infantry of the allies to engage them; nor indeed did their commander-in-chief seem to be very forward to risk his German troops. By his own account, sent to his majesty, it is certain that his attack was very weak on the enemy's front, and unsupported, as he himself acknowledges, by the infantry. So that the heat of the day fell upon the British, whose cavalry had come five miles at full trot, headed by the marquis of Granby and general Mostyn; and while general Waldegrave did all he could to hasten the march of the infantry, captain Phillips brought up the artillery on a gallop. But though our British troops were thus expeditious beyond all precedent, they could not prevent the enemy from making their retreat good over the Dymel. The charge that was made upon them by the British cavalry was so gallant, as to evince their ardour for retrieving that glory, of which they had been deprived at Minden; though they could not be seconded by their foot, many of whom dropped down in the morasses which impeded their long and fatiguing journey. The French, in their account, pretend that the brigade of Bourbon checked the British cavalry; that the allies were greatly superior in number; that the hereditary prince, in turning their left, was favoured by a fog; and that the battle continued, without advantage to either side, for four hours. But it is evident, even from their own narrative, that they employed most of that time in making preparations for a retreat, which, with great difficulty, they effected over the Dymel; and that, upon the whole, they thought themselves victorious, because they were not completely defeated. In this battle, the great loss fell upon the English, of whom about 600 were killed, wounded, or missing. But the total loss of the allied army was not published, probably because it would have discovered the great disproportion between the sufferings of the English and of the Germans. The French, in their account, pretended that the loss of the allies was greater than theirs. But that could not be the fact. For besides great numbers of the French that were drowned in passing the Dymel, 1500 were killed on the field of battle, and as many were taken, together with ten pieces of cannon.

The battle of Warbourg was more glorious than it was advantageous to the allies. The chevalier de Muy commanded but one of the three French armies; but the other two, without resistance, became masters of Munden, Cassel, Gottingen, Eimbach, and Zugenhagen, where they made a great number of prisoners, and obtained considerable magazines. Thus, though the allies gained a battle, they lost a province; the whole landgraviate of Hesse being now in the French possession; nor was it clear, but that, before the end of the campaign, they would become masters of Hanover itself; while all that prince Ferdinand gained was, to secure his posts upon the Dymel, and preseve his communication with Westphalia; the loss of which must have been of the worst consequence to him, considering the situation of the two armies.

The French, however, had many reasons for declining to penetrate further into Hanover. The country was so miserably exhausted, as to be incapable of maintaining an army, and the attempt, however successful, would nevertheless be inconsistent with their plan. The two armies were, for a length of time, inactive on each side of the Dymel. This inaction was disagreeable to the genius of the hereditary prince, who appears to have made war cordially, without the lucrative views of continuing his appointments, or the mean ones of sparing his Germans. It is true, the great opinion he experimentally entertained of the British valour cost our men dear, and was favourable to the Germans; but he always ventured his own person equally with that of the meanest English soldier, and they followed him with pride and alacrity. While the armies were lying in this state of inaction, he understood that 2000 French occupied the town of Zierenberg; and he resolved to surprise them. He accordingly posted a body of troops between that place and Drerenberg, in order to cut off all communication between the two camps of the enemy. He next made the proper dispositions for securing his retreat, in case of a repulse; and at the head of his remaining foot, most of them British, on the 5th of September, he set out, in three divisions, and by two the next morning was before Zierenberg. But notwithstanding all the precautions that had been taken, for the silence of their march, they were discovered by a party of dragoons, who fired upon them, and spread the alarm. On this occasion, the intrepidity and discipline of the British foot did them great honour. Contrary to the character of their nation, instead of being too ready to fire, they made use of their bayonets only. With these they drove the enemy's piquets, that were on guard, before them; some entered the town at the same time with the fugitives; some were employed in putting the guard to the sword, others in forcing open the gates, till at last they all entered the place, and proceeded in firm order to the churchyard, which the main body of the enemy possessed. The noise they made was so little, and the night so dark, that the French took them for their own piquets, and suffered them to form; when they were attacked and totally dispersed by the English, with their bayonets on their musquets. In vain the French attempted to fly from the gate. They were every where opposed, pursued, slain, or taken prisoners. Every part of the town was filled with blood, confusion, and tumult; but the British were victorious. They neither killed, nor took prisoners any of the inhabitants who had no weapons in their hands; and, far from being intent on plunder, they even refused to accept the gratuities which the persons of the town offered, for the preservation of their lives and properties. The whole action of this noble and well-conducted expedition lasted but an hour, after which the prince found himself complete master of the place, having taken two pieces of cannon, and made 36 officers, and near 500 common soldiers, prisoners. He then considered the danger of remaining, with so small a force, so near the enemy's main body; and regained his former camp, without loss or molestation.

The intrepidity which the British uniformly displayed, and the success which attended all their operations, during the course of this war, compared with the little effect produced by such exertions of courage, sufficiently prove, that there was something amiss and dilatory in the original plan of every campaign, which no partial success or valour could remedy. The advantage gained at Zierenberg was glorious, and cheap, for it cost them no more than 10 men; and yet, if we except the reputation which the British gained by their success, the consequences were by no means equal to the boldness of the enterprise. The gallant prince discovered, as he might easily have foreseen, that he could not keep the place; and, by quitting it, he lost all he had obtained, except a few prisoners, whom he found it burdensome to maintain.

At last, however, prince Ferdinand put his army in motion, in order to interrupt the communication between the French post, the Rhine, and the Maine, especially with Francfort. As to Hanover, it lay quite neglected by both parties. The French had their reasons, as we have already seen, for not penetrating further into it than Gottingen; and the allies pretended that they could not, without hazarding the loss of their entire army, make any effort to dispossess them of that city, or of Cassel.

Bulow, a Hanoverian general, was dispatched, with a strong detachment, to make inroads into Weteravia, and the southern parts of Hesse; which he did with so great success, that he pushed on towards Marburg, which town he surprised, and destroyed in it the French ovens, with considerable magazines of provisions, besides carrying off their clothing and military stores. He at last proceeded towards Frankenau. The French, during this time, surveyed his progress with an air of security, thinking it would always be in their power to check his progress. Stainville, one of their best generals, on the 13th of September, attacked the rear of Bulow's detachment, as it was passing the river Orck; and not only defeated it, but in all probability would have cut off the whole body, had not the active hereditary prince, hearing of his danger, made a forced march of five German miles, and arrived to his relief. This obliged Stainville to retire to a strong camp, where he could not be attacked with any promise of success.

In the meanwhile, a feeble effort was made under general Wangenheim, another of the allied generals, to force the enemy to abandon Gottingen; but, at last, on the 19th of September, after he had passed the Weser, he was obliged to repass it, with very considerable loss, and not quite to the advantage of his military character. It must be acknowledged, that in all those skirmishes and expeditions, the French shewed a vigilance, and an attention to their plan of operations, more active than the allies; who directed their marches according to the motions of the enemy. The French, on the 20th of September, in pursuance of their defensive scheme, retired to Cassel, where they fortified themselves; while prince Ferdinand ventured to do nothing, but advance so near as to observe their operations.

More active, and indeed unexpected, scenes of war presented themselves upon the Rhine, and almost upon the frontiers of the states-general, where the hereditary prince appeared, to the surprise of all Europe, who thought he had been in the further part of Hesse. It would exceed my proposed limits, should I describe the means by which this object was effected. It is sufficient to say, that he had under him twenty battalions, and ten squadrons, which he divided into two bodies. One of these passed the Rhine at Roerost, on the other side of Dusseldorf. The other division, which marched by the way of Munster, passed a great way below, at Rees, which lies almost half way between Cleves and Wesel. These two detachments, notwithstanding the distance of the places, passed the Rhine about the same time; and their manœuvres were conducted in such a manner as to prevent the movements of the French. Every thing succeeded, as had been projected. As they advanced to their intended junction, all the French posts along the Rhine, with all their boats, fell into the prince's hands, by which he was enabled to carry over his artillery and his troops; so that, meeting with no opposition, his detachment again separated, and, on the 3rd of October, one division took possession of Cleves, and, three days after, of its castle, with 500 men, while another laid siege to Wesel.

The rapid success of this expedition did not prevent its giving rise to many conjectures, and some censures with regard to its utility to Great Britain. It was generally thought, that it had been formed to favour, in conjunction with a strong armament which was fitted out at Portsmouth, a powerful diversion on the side of the Austrian Netherlands, which might have obliged the French to desist from forming an army on the Lower Rhine, by which Broglio must have become master of Hanover. But this supposition was chimerical. Hanover had at this time, in fact, nothing to fear; for Broglio might have become master of it when he pleased. We are therefore to look elsewhere for the motives of this famous expedition.

It was not difficult to foresee, that considerable dissensions would exist in the court of Great Britain, concerning the vast expence of blood and treasure, in which she was involved by the German war. Of all the losses his Prussian majesty had met with, that of his countries on the Lower Rhine gave him, on several accounts, the greatest concern. He had many reasons to suspect, that a strong party of the British ministry was anxious to conclude a separate peace with France; and that the last convention between him and his Britannic majesty, on the 9th of November, 1759, began to be greatly condemned, chiefly on account of its fourth article, by which his Britannic majesty pledged himself not to conclude any kind of peace, without the full consent of his Prussian ally. He was sensible, as afterwards proved to be the case, that if a separate peace, between Great Britain and France, were set on foot, it would not be in the power of the former to put him, by any treaty, in possession of those countries, which were held by the French, only in trust for the empress-queen. At the same time, the subjects of the states-general did not behave towards Great Britain with such gratitude and attention as could entitle them to extraordinary consideration from our crown. Upon the whole, therefore, it is most rational to believe, that the irruption of the hereditary prince (as was before mentioned) into the territories of Cleves and Gueldres was secretly concerted between his Prussian majesty and the British court; and it would have been fortunate for the nation, if corresponding success had attended the boldness, spirit, and proper management of the design. As to the preparations made at Portsmouth, they were disavowed to be intended against the Austrian Netherlands; and their real destination was never publicly acknowledged. But it is certain, that had they proceeded to the recovery of Nieuport and Ostend, and even to overawe some of our allies; a more popular service, at that time, could not be undertaken by a British ministry.

Unforeseen accidents disappointed the full effect of the prince's irruption. One part of his troops was employed on the right of the Rhine, in the siege of Wesel; while another covered it on the left. The siege was continued with great resolution, and sanguine expectations were formed of its success, from the promised reinforcements. The vast rains that had fallen swelled the rivers, and not only put a stop to their progress, but rendered the prince's communication with the besiegers, over the Rhine, extremely difficult. They also gave time to the marquis de Castries, to draw together, from Hesse and the Low Countries, an army of 30 battalions and 38 squadrons; with which he advanced to Rhinberg, which lay in the very heart of the prince's late acquisitions, and drove the allies, with some loss on both sides, from their posts. He then turned to the left, towards the convent of Campen, where he formed himself very advantageously.

The prince had now apparently only two objects to pursue; he must either fight this superior army in a pitched battle, or abandon the siege of Wesel. His genius suggested to him a medium. Relying on the known valour of the British troops, which, as usual, formed the flower of his army, he resolved upon a surprise; and for this purpose, on the 16th of October, at ten o'clock in the night, he began his march. Fischer's famous body of irregulars lay between him and the French camp. Some shots were exchanged; the French were alarmed, and instantly drew up in a wood. By this time it was five in the morning; but the sight of the advantageous position of the French, far from daunting the British troops, seemed only to inspire them with fresh valour. The action, with incessant firings, and frequent attacks on the wood, continued from five in the morning till nine at night. The prince animated the troops by his own example; but he was disabled, his horse having been shot under him, and having himself received a wound, so that he was obliged to order a retreat, which perhaps he might have done long before, without any imputation on his courage and conduct. The British troops were the chief, if not the sole sufferers in this desperate action; but the death of none of them was more lamented, both in Germany and England, than that of lord Downe. He seemed to be born for social and gay life. He formed in the country, where he had interest, (for no sooner did the war break out than he applied himself, with surprising progress, to military duty,) a handful of his friends and dependants, by his own example he made them as complete in the exercises of war as the first regulars in Europe, and he had the glory of dying a volunteer at their head. The loss of the English, in killed and wounded, was 1190, and about 500 were made prisoners. After the slaughter of so many brave men, in a battle which ought to have been fought by others, it will afford but little satisfaction to the British reader, to be told, that the loss of the French was much greater.

THE siege of Wesel became now impracticable; and the hourly increase of inundations, had the prince delayed repassing the Rhine, must have rendered his retreat so likewise. He seized the first opportunity; and his manœuvres were so well concerted, that the French did not attempt even to disturb his rear, notwithstanding their vast superiority, in all respects but that of courage.

BEFORE we leave the operations of the allied army this year, it is necessary to follow them into their winter-quarters, which proved more fatal to them than the campaign itself, severe as their hardships had been, and unequal as was the share of service which they had endured. Upon the return of the hereditary prince to the allied army, the blockade of Gottingen was attempted, and continued from the 22nd of November till the 12th of December following. The operations preceding this siege were as languid as they were indecisive. A Hanoverian general attempted to take Heydemunden; but failed of success in a most unaccountable, if not shameful, manner; and the French defended Gottingen so bravely, that the blockade was raised. Soon after, both armies slipped, rather than marched, into winter-quarters. Prince Ferdinand secured the comfort of his troops, by having behind him a country not quite exhausted, and by giving large premiums to the people, for supplying his camp with provisions. The winter-quarters of the British troops were in the city and bishopric of Paderborn, the most exhausted place of the most exhausted country in Europe; for such Germany then was. Their miserable condition was increased by the extortions and villainies of their Jewish and other contractors, and the whole was crowned by the difficulties of the roads, inundated by the late rains. The consequences were, that distresses and diseases of all kinds broke in upon them, and carried off a prodigious number, both of men and horses; whilst their miseries were embittered, by seeing the French in a most advantageous position, where they received, by the Rhine and the Maine, all the comforts of life.

A LETTER of thanks and congratulation to prince Ferdinand, on the prowess and fortitude he had displayed in the preceding campaign, was the last public act of George II. On Saturday, the 25th of October, he was suddenly seized, at the palace of Kensington, with an apoplectic fit, soon after rising in the morning in his usual health. Recovering his senses, after a short interval, he desired, with a faint voice, that his daughter, the princess Amelia, might be sent for; but, before her arrival, he expired, in the 77th year of his age, and the 34th of his reign.

GEORGE II. with abilities not exceeding mediocrity, possessed many estimable qualities; he was just, brave, open, and sincere; in his disposition mild and humane, and placable, though prone to anger. The chief defects of his policy arose from his predilection to his native dominions. His preference of one party of his British subjects was the natural consequence of the circumstances in which he was placed, operating on his limited capacity. In the first part of his reign, a minister of considerable talents established a regular system of corruption, as the chief engine of the executive government; in the last period of his reign, the minister demonstrated, that the employment of corruption was unnecessary, and that talents and virtue, promptly and decisively exerted, will triumph over the violence of opposition, command the applause of the people, and obtain every resource that is necessary to the security and glory of the empire.

IN his person, George II. was of the middle size, well formed, with prominent eyes, a high nose, good features, and a fair complexion. He was born in November 1683, and, in 1705, married the princess Caroline of Anspach, by whom he had six children, who came to maturity, besides several others who died young: two sons; Frederic, born in 1707, who, on his father's accession to the throne, was prince of Wales, and William, duke of Cumberland: and four daughters; the princess of Orange, princess Amelia, the princess of Hesse, and the queen of Denmark. Frederic married, in 1736, the princess Augusta of Saxe-Gotha. By her he had five sons and three daughters, who came to maturity. George, born May 24th, Old Style, afterwards George III.; Edward, duke of York; William-Henry, duke of Glocester; Henry-Frederic, duke of Cumberland; Frederic-William; Augusta, duchess of Brunswick; Louisa; and Matilda, queen of Denmark. His royal highness the prince of Wales dying in the life-time of his father, in 1751, his eldest son, George, became prince of Wales, and heir of his grandfather's crown.

CHAPTER XVIII.

GEORGE III.

Accession of George III.—Judges made independent—Marriage of the King—Mr. Pitt resigns—Lord Bute's Administration—War with Spain—Capture of Martinico and the Havannah—Manilla reduced—Campaign in Germany—Articles of Peace—Lord Bute resigns—Mr. Wilkes sent to the Tower—General Warrants declared illegal—The North Briton burnt—Proceedings in the East Indies.

GEORGE III., previous to his accession, had led a life of retirement, and was only known by the reports of courtiers. His tuition was confided to John, earl of Bute, a nobleman of respectable talents and erudition, distinguished for decency and propriety of conduct. Of irreproachable morals, he impressed upon the mind of the successor to the crown the purest principles of personal virtue. A face both elegant and manly, combining the bloom of youth with the vigour of manhood; a countenance expressive of frankness and ingenuous modesty; a stature above the middle size; a figure uniting symmetry with strength; and manners at once conciliating and unassuming; co-operated with the general opinion of his private virtues, to render the new monarch a favourite of the nation. On his accession, all ranks of men ardently and sincerely testified their satisfaction. The Whigs were attached to a prince of the house of Brunswick, and the Tories rejoiced that they were to be governed by a sovereign, apparently free from party prejudices. As soon as his accession was known, addresses were presented from every part of the kingdom. When the parliament was assembled, the king's speech gave general satisfaction. As soon as his majesty retired, the two houses proceeded to business with great unanimity; and instead of the civil list revenues, which had been invested in the hands of the two preceding sovereigns, they granted him a yearly revenue of £800,000, for the maintenance of his houshold, and the support of his royal dignity.

His majesty having previously signified his resolution to prosecute the war, in conjunction with his allies, until it could be terminated by an honourable and lasting peace, the parliament granted a loan of £12,000,000, with a celerity which almost precluded a careful examination of the estimates submitted to their inspection. At the instance of the sovereign, an act was passed, securing the commissions and the salaries of the judges from all accidents but misbehaviour. Mr. Arthur Onslow, who had been speaker to five successive parliaments, retired with a pension of £3000 a-year, extending to his son; and the court conferred many other proofs of its liberality, by rewarding several other placemen with pensions and sinecures, payable from the public money.

The seventh session of parliament having elapsed, writs were issued for the election of new members. Previous to this period, the earl of Bute had succeeded lord Holdernesse as secretary of state. The regard of his majesty for the earl was ardent and sincere. By his intervention, Mr. Legge, an accomplished financier, was dismissed from the chancellorship of the exchequer.

The chief military enterprise, undertaken by Britain, in the campaign of 1761, was the attack of Belleisle, a large island, lying off the south coast of Brittany. This place was about twelve leagues in circumference, strongly fortified, and afforded to its possessors a great command of French coast. The land-forces were commanded by general Hodgson, and the fleet by commodore Keppel, brother to the earl of Albemarle. On the 29th of March they sailed from Spithead, and on the 7th of April arrived off Belleisle. On the 8th, they attempted a landing, where the beach was most accessible; but, after several brave and repeated efforts, were obliged to desist, with the loss of nearly 500 men. Not dispirited, however, by this repulse, they determined to make another trial, as soon as less boisterous weather would permit. On the 25th of April they made a second attempt, on the strongest part of the coast; they proceeded on the same principle as carried the heights of Abraham, placed their chief hopes in the difficulty of the precipices, and concluded that the enemy, trusting to that circumstance, would be off their guard. To conceal their main attempt, they amused the enemy by two feigned attacks in different quarters. By these means, brigadier Lambert effected a landing; and, gaining possession of a hill overhanging the sea, formed his men, and repulsed a body of French, which had been sent to dislodge him from his post. Having obtained the command of this part of the shore, the British troops in a short time made good their landing, and immediately commenced the siege with great vigour, while the fortress, on the other hand, was gallantly defended, and several bloody contests took place. At last, the chevalier St. Croix, debarred by the British fleet from any communication with the continent, surrendered by an honourable capitulation, on the 7th of June, two months after the arrival of the British armament. 1761.

In the East Indies, Pondicherry only remained in possession of the French. Against this beautiful town, and important fortress, the British troops proceeded. Colonel Coote invested it by land, and admiral Stevens by sea. In November 1760, the batteries and works raised by the besiegers suffered considerable damage from a violent storm; but were quickly repaired, and the operations were carried on with vigour and perseverance. The besieged made a resolute and gallant defence, expecting the arrival of a powerful fleet to their relief; but at length, being attacked by famine, they were reduced to extreme distress, and obliged to subsist on the flesh of camels, of elephants, and of dogs. On the 1st of January 1761, a violent storm dispersed the British fleet, and gave the besieged sanguine hopes of provision and succour. The British admiral, however, exerted such diligence, that, in four days after the storm, he again appeared before the place, with eleven ships of the line, and one frigate; two of the line having been wrecked. Being disappointed after the most flattering hopes of assistance, the besieged became desperate, but did not offer to surrender. At length, a breach having been effected, and only one day's provision remaining, a signal from the town was made for a suspension of arms. A jesuit and two civilians offered to capitulate; but the governor would propose no terms, and insulted the English commander, by a letter full of invectives against the English, as breakers of the treaties relative to India. As the governor would not capitulate, and the offer of the inhabitants, without his concurrence, could not be regarded, the city was taken by storm, and abandoned to the plunder of the victors. Colonel Coote and his coadjutor, by their courage, conduct, unanimity, and perseverance, effected this conquest on the 15th of January 1761, and thus gave a final blow to the French power in the Carnatic.

On the same day on which Pondicherry was taken, an advantage still more decisive was obtained in Bengal. On the taking of Chandernagore, four years before, Law, the nephew of the famous author of the Mississippi scheme, and a subject of France, had retired with a party of French fugitives into the north-western regions of India. The great mogul had, a short time before, been deposed by an irruption of Mahrattas; and, dying soon after, one of his sons, Shah Taddah, assumed the title of his father, supported by some of his hereditary provinces, and opposed by others. Law offered to this young prince his services, with his 200 Europeans, which were gladly accepted, and by which several considerable districts were immediately subjected to obedience. Law, elated with this success, in an evil hour persuaded him to turn his arms against Bengal; and he accordingly entered that kingdom with a native army of 30,000 men, and 200 French. The subah of Bengal marched to oppose him, with 20,000 natives, and 500 English. The British and their allies obtained a complete victory. Law was taken prisoner, and his fellow-adventurers killed, taken, or dispersed; the great mogul being among the prisoners.

The overtures of peace, which had been made towards the close of the year 1759, were rejected by the belligerent powers; and it was not till the beginning of the year 1761, that the courts of Petersburgh, Vienna, Sweden, and Poland, urged by the importunities of France, agreed jointly and severally to resume the negotiation, which had, at that period, been so abruptly laid aside. The city of Augsburg was chosen as the theatre of discussion, and plenipotentiaries were nominated. The great success of the British arms had so much elated the people, that the minister was afraid lest he should incur their displeasure, by making any concessions to the court of France, whose ambition and violence had always corresponded with its power. The landgraviate of Hesse, the county of Hanaw, and the town of Gottingen, were all the conquests which France could balance against the extensive and valuable acquisitions made by England. At length, however, after having received the consent of the house of Austria, the court of Versailles transmitted propositions to that of St. James's, of which the following were the principal:

1. That France would cede and guarantee to England all Canada, upon condition that the inhabitants should enjoy the free exercise of their religion; and that, in return, France should be entitled to fish upon the banks of Newfoundland, and possess the island of Cape Breton.

2. Minorca should be exchanged for Guadaloupe and Mariagalante.

3. That Gottingen, Hesse, and Hanaw should be evacuated, in return for the restitution of Belleisle and of Goree, or of the settlement of Senegal.

Respecting Asia it was proposed, that the treaty between Godechu and Saunders should serve as the basis of accommodation. The chief difficulty was in the third of these objects; for England declared that she would inviolably preserve her faith towards the king of Prussia, and France had recently been induced to stipulate at the court of Vienna, that she would admit nothing into the treaty to the disadvantage of Austria. To obviate this difficulty, France proposed, that the French and British armies in Germany should observe a strict neutrality; that when his Britannic majesty should recal his forces, the most Christian king would recal double the number; and that no French troops should remain in Germany, but in proportion to those who continued there in British pay. The French also demanded restitution of the captures made before the declaration of war.

These propositions were violently opposed by Mr. Pitt, who contended that the present was the period when the exhorbitant power of the house of Bourbon might be most effectually humbled. An officious and untimely interference of the court of Madrid greatly added to the force of his objections. M. de Bussy proposed, that all the objects of dispute between England and Spain should be finally settled through the medium of France. The sagacity of Mr. Pitt immediately penetrated the object of this interference, and readily comprehended, not only the insincerity of the French in their proffered negotiation, but the motives of their duplicity. He insisted in the cabinet, that Spain should give an immediate and decisive explanation, and that in case of refusal, hostilities should commence against that nation. He relied on the rectitude of his measures for the approbation of the people, and seemed desirous that his power should rest on that basis alone. By the success of his plans, he had raised the nation from the abyss of despair to the highest eminence of glory; but his wise and spirited advice was over-ruled by the timidity or envy of his colleagues. At length he openly declared, that, as he was called to the ministry by the voice of the people, he should consider himself as accountable for his conduct to them alone; and that he did not choose to remain longer in a situation, which rendered him responsible for measures which he was no longer permitted to guide. The day after Mr. Pitt made this declaration, he resigned the seals, and was followed by earl Temple. Whether the disinterested conduct of the minister had reduced him to indigence, or whether he justly concluded, in opposition to the popular opinion, that a grant or favour from the crown implies neither the sacrifice of political principle, nor personal meanness, he accepted of a pension for three lives, and a title for his lady and her issue. Such a man deserved reward. All the ribaldry and invective, poured out against his acceptance of the annuity, may be answered in a few words; as a supply it was wanted, as a recompence it was fairly earned.

1761. On the 8th of July, a gazette extraordinary announced the determination of his majesty to demand in marriage the princess Charlotte, sister to the reigning duke of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz. The proposal being accepted, her highness arrived in England on the 6th of September, and, at eight in the evening of the 8th, the marriage ceremony was performed by the archbishop of Canterbury. About a fortnight afterwards, the coronation of the king and queen was solemnized, with suitable formality and magnificence.

On the resignation of Mr. Pitt, the earl of Egremont was appointed to his department; but as the earl of Bute had become, by the dismission of the duke of Newcastle, first lord of the treasury, we may from this time date the commencement of the Bute administration. John Stuart, earl of Bute, was the representative of a noble family, of considerable eminence in the south-west of Scotland, and connected with the first nobility in that part of the kingdom. His lordship was a man of talents above mediocrity; he was a good classical scholar; conversant in natural history, botany, several branches of chemistry; a liberal patron of letters, and a magnificent promoter of useful experiments and discoveries. Pious in his sentiments and habits, he was meritorious in his domestic and social relations; and, as a private gentleman, a valuable member of society.

In the beginning of November, a new parliament assembled, and sir John Cust was elected to the office of speaker. The commons immediately proceeded to make provision for the queen, in case she should survive his majesty. The supplies granted for the year were £18,299,153. Seventy thousand seamen, and 170,000 land forces, British or in British pay, were voted; and a jointure was granted to the queen, of £100,000 a year, to be demanded in case she survived his majesty.

Considerable disunion prevailed at this time in the cabinet. Newcastle, still nominally prime minister, could not endure the predominating influence of lord Bute. He therefore resigned. Bute became first lord of the treasury, and Mr. Grenville secretary of state. From this period is generally dated the administration of Bute, which had really begun at the moment of Pitt's resignation.

In the mean time, though propositions of peace were agitated between England and France, the operations of war were carried on with vigour. The commanders of our cruisers displayed equal vigilance and gallantry, in taking and destroying the enemy's ships. In the West Indies, Dominique, one of the French sugar islands, was taken, with little difficulty, by a body of troops under the command of lord Rollo. In America, the Cherokees, who began to be turbulent, were chastised by colonel Grant; and sir William Johnson, by his assiduity and address, removed the apprehensions which began to agitate the rest of the Indians. No considerable armament was this year fitted out, for the conquest of the West India islands, which still remained in the hands of the French.

The winter-quarters of the allied army in Germany were very indifferent, both from the nature of the country, and the manner in which they were confined. Prince Ferdinand, sensible that his troops could bear the inclemency of the winter better than the French, and that the hardships of the field could scarcely be more intolerable than those which they now endured, set them in motion about the beginning of February; and attacked the enemy's posts with such vigour, that they retreated with precipitation. Five battalions of Saxons were taken, and a great number were slain. Vast quantities of provision and forage were seized, and more was destroyed by the flying French. The design of the general was to reduce Hesse-Cassel, and other places of strength, before Broglio could be reinforced from the Lower Rhine. He laid siege to them; but the rigour of the season, and the numerous troops with which they were garrisoned, prevented him from making a rapid progress. At length, all the expected detachments having arrived, Broglio obliged him to retire, with loss. Nine battalions, being attacked in a defile, were broken, and 2000 men were killed or wounded. The expedition, however, was not without its use; it prevented the enemies from beginning the campaign at an early period.

At length, towards the latter end of June, both the French armies were in motion. Their vast superiority in numbers inspired them with hopes of being able to make the allies retreat, as they had done in the beginning of the year. Broglio passed the Dymel, and surprising general Sporken, took 200 waggons and a considerable number of men. Prince Ferdinand repassed the Lippe, and sent out detachments, which annoyed their enemies so much, by destroying and cutting off their convoys, that they resolved to effect a junction of their two armies, and to give him battle. But he posted his army so advantageously at Kirche-Denckern, and his dispositions were so well improved, by the skill of his generals, and the bravery of his troops, that, after two vigorous attacks, on two successive days, they were repulsed, with the loss of 5000 men.

After this action, Broglio and Soubize separated, and acted, for the remainder of the campaign, upon different plans. The prince's inferiority of numbers did not allow him to form two distinct armies. He fixed his head quarters at Buhne near Hamelin, whence he sent out detachments to prevent the progress of the enemies on his flanks. An attempt which was made to reduce Wofenbuttel and Brunswick, was frustrated by the hereditary prince, who severely chastised the invaders of his dominions. Soubize's army met with no better success in its attempt upon Bremen; the garrison and the inhabitants obliged the detachment which appeared before it to retire with precipitation. Broglio remained inactive at Eimbeck, till, about the beginning of November, prince Ferdinand turned his flank, and obliged him to take up his winter-quarters in the landgraviate of Hesse. Indeed the operations of this campaign consisted rather of pillaging than fighting, and seemed much better calculated for distressing the unfortunate inhabitants of the scene of action, than for procuring any durable and solid advantages to the contending powers. Whatever attempts were made by prince Ferdinand to bring on a decisive action were frustrated by Broglio, who appeared sensible of the superior firmness of the allied army in a general engagement, and aimed more at booty than at laurels.

During the whole course of this year, the war languished in Saxony and Silesia. The king of Prussia, who, in all the preceding campaigns, had given such shining proofs of his prowess and activity, did not this year strike a single blow. Prince Henry lay entrenched with one army in Saxony, while another, under the king himself, watched the motions of the Austrians and Russians in Silesia. When the latter advanced, and laid siege to Colberg and Breslau, he dispatched general Platen, with a considerable body of troops, into Poland, in order to destroy their magazines, and to relieve Colberg. In the former part of this service he succeeded, and obliged the Russians to separate from the Austrians, and to return upon their steps, that the remainder of their provisions might not share the same fate.

While the king pleased himself with the thoughts of having, by this stratagem, removed one of his most formidable enemies, Laudohn assaulted Schweidnitz in a very dark night, and by break of day found himself master of the town and garrison. Three thousand men were made prisoners, a large quantity of artillery, and a vast magazine of meal were taken. This unexpected and fatal blow was the more sensibly felt by the king, as it disabled him from moving out of Silesia, to the relief of Colberg, or any other part of his dominions, for fear of exposing Breslau and the rest of the duchy to inevitable conquest. At first he suspected treachery; but recovering his temper, he sent the following lines to general Zastrow:

"We may now say, what Francis I. said to his mother after the battle of Pavia, We have lost all except our honour. As I cannot comprehend what has happened to you, I shall suspend my judgment. The affair is very extraordinary."

Schweidnitz was suddenly lost; Colberg made a long and noble defence. Many bold and vigorous attempts were made to furnish it with provisions; but the prodigious superiority of the Russians rendered them all abortive. After a siege of six months, by land and by water, it surrendered to the enemy, who was thus enabled to winter in Pomerania, to acquire a footing in the empire, and to threaten early and vigorous measures in the spring. Their armies would now be supplied with all necessaries by sea, and Stetin alone obstructed their march into the heart of Brandenburg.

Soon after the loss of Schweidnitz, the king was obliged to approach near Breslau, where, about the beginning of December, he cantoned his army; while Laudohn took up his winter-quarters in the neighbourhood of his new conquest. A conspiracy which was formed, for betraying him into the hands of the Austrians, proved abortive; and an attempt which Daun made upon prince Henry's camp, in Saxony, was equally unsuccessful.

At home, the proceedings of the parliament were more creditable to its patriotism than its sagacity. The German war having impoverished the country, and the troops abroad being ill-supplied with necessaries, an inquiry was instituted, into the expedience of continuing it. It was urged, in favour of an immediate peace, that we ought not to lavish our treasures, as if they were inexhaustible, on Hanoverians and Hessians; allies, who served only to protract the feeble efforts of a system pregnant with ruin; that the treaty made with the king of Prussia, to whom the English paid rather a tribute than a subsidy, exposed the ignorance of our former negotiators in a still greater degree, since he was so far from being able to make us any suitable return, that he was scarcely able to resist his own immediate enemies.

While the commons were employed upon this subject, which ought to have been discussed before the nation entered into the war, they found, as Mr. Pitt had predicted, that Spain, alarmed by the humiliation of the French, granted to their distresses that support, which she would have denied to their triumphs. From the haughty rejection of the terms proposed, the British nation was drawn into a new field of war, and a new scene of expence. Previous to the commencement of hostilities against the English, the Spanish court entered into a family compact with the enemy, by which the subjects of each country were mutually naturalized, and entitled to every privilege and immunity, as fully as if they were natives. War, however, was not declared till our enemies had gained time to make the requisite preparations.

The accession of so formidable a power as Spain, unimpaired in its resources of men, money, and stores, inspired France with fresh hopes, of retrieving that superiority which she had lost. The Bourbon confederacy aware of the wretched situation of Portugal, from a late conspiracy, and from the occurrence of a dreadful earthquake, resolved to injure Britain by the agency of that distracted kingdom. The two ministers of the hostile courts presented a joint memorial, to persuade his most faithful majesty to concur with their masters in humbling the pride of England, with whom he was in alliance. He rejected, however, their offers and their menaces, and declared, with becoming spirit, that it would affect him less to see the last tile of his palace fall, and to see his faithful subjects shed the last drop of their blood, than become an alarming lesson to all pacific powers, that they will be no longer entitled to the benefits of neutrality, when a war is kindled between states, with whom they are connected by defensive treaties. England transmitted troops, arms, and warlike stores, for Portugal; British men of war guarded its coasts; and a million was voted by parliament for its support. England herself was placed in a state of defence, and she alone seemed to balance the rest of Europe.

Early in the succeeding year, general Monckton sailed from New York, with 12,000 men, and having refreshed at Barbadoes, appeared before the island of Martinique on the 7th of January. A body of regulars and marines, supported by 1000 sailors in flat-bottomed boats, advanced on the right along the sea-shore, in order to force the redoubts which lay in the lower grounds. With irresistible impetuosity, the British troops successively carried the enemy's works in every quarter. At length, as general Monckton was advancing against the capital, deputies arrived, announcing the surrender of the island. With this place, the seat of government, the mart of trade, and the centre of all their force, fell the rest of the French Caribbee islands, Grenada, St. Lucia, and St. Vincent. All the troops that could be spared from the newly-conquered islands, were re-embarked by sir James Douglas, who joined admiral Pococke to the north-west of Hispaniola. The land forces, commanded by lord Albemarle, amounted to 10,000 men. For the sake of expedition, the admiral steered through the narrow and dangerous straits of Bahamah, and, by making use of every possible precaution, conducted the whole fleet, consisting of 200 sail, within sight of the Havannah, the object of his long and perilous voyage. A fleet of the enemy's ships, chiefly of the line, was lying in the harbour; but, whether through timidity or weakness, they remained inactive, and declined a battle which might probably have saved the city.

The difficulties with which the English contended, in the siege of the Moro, which commanded the town and harbour, are almost incredible. Several expired suddenly, oppressed with heat, thirst, and fatigue. Nothing, however, could abate the ardour of the troops. On the day that the batteries were opened against the Moro, three of the largest ships, under the command of captain Hervey, laid their broadsides against the fort, and commenced a terrible fire, which lasted seven hours without intermission. After an unremitted cannonade for several days, one of their principal batteries, which was composed of timber and fascines, caught fire, and was almost instantaneously reduced to ashes; an event that in a few seconds destroyed the labour of 600 men, for nearly three weeks. The want of water, the advance of the season, and the multiplied difficulties, diminished the prospect of success. But, however great the distresses of the assailants, however small their number, they made the most vigorous and persevering efforts. The richness of the prize which lay before them, the shame of retreat, excited them to the most strenuous exertions. The batteries were replaced, and soon silenced the guns of the fort; while the troops dismantled its upper works, and made a lodgement in the covered way. The commanders received several reinforcements and necessaries for the siege from Jamaica and America. At length the mines were sprung, and a breach was made in the wall of the fort. The British troops entered the breach, though narrow and difficult, and formed themselves with so much celerity and resolution, that the enemy fled. The governor, Don Velasco, defended, with 100 men, an intrenchment, which he had made round his colours; and, sinking beneath the sudden infliction of a mortal wound, offered his sword to the conquerors. A capitulation, for the surrender of the Havannah, immediately ensued. This was an acquisition of the first class; it united in itself all the advantages that can be achieved. It was a victory of the highest magnitude, by its effect on the enemy's marine; and, in plunder, it equalled the produce of a national subsidy, amounting to more than £3,000,000. It was followed by the capture of the Hermione, a register ship belonging to the Spaniards, valued at £1,000,000.

Admiral Cornish, with 2000 men, commanded by colonel Draper, soon after proceeded on an expedition against the Philippine isles, and came within sight of Luconia on the 19th of September. The British commanders determined to make an immediate attack on the city of Manilla. The place being too extensive to be immediately invested by their small number of men, the enemy retained a free communication with the country, which poured in to their assistance 10,000 natives, more fierce and daring than the generality of Indians. After the works had been battered night and day, a storm drove the British ships out to sea, which induced the governor, who was also an archbishop, to pronounce, that an angel had gone forth from the Lord, to destroy the English, like the host of Sennacherib. But, in defiance of the angel, and of the resistance of the Spaniards, the British troops, a few days afterwards, on the 6th of October, under a general discharge of their artillery, mounted a breach which they had made, with the greatest spirit and rapidity, dispersed their opponents, advanced into the city, and completed their conquest. It must be lamented, that this triumph was sullied by one act of cruelty. One hundred men, posted in a guard-house, who would not surrender, were cut to pieces; and 300 more, endeavouring to escape, perished in the river. Motives of prudence and humanity induced the English commanders to forbid the plunder of the city, and to accept a million sterling for themselves and soldiers. With this place, and the adjacent country, fourteen dependent islands were surrendered. The arms of Spain were not more successful in Europe. The court of Madrid had formed a plan to penetrate, by three different routes, to Lisbon. When the Spanish troops had advanced as far as the banks of the Tagus, colonel Burgoyne, who had now joined the grand army, and lay in their neighbourhood to obstruct their passage, conceived the design of attacking them by surprise. While he himself attracted the attention of the enemy in one quarter, colonel Lee turned their camp in the night, fell upon their rear, slew a great number, and dispersed the whole body. He destroyed their magazines, and returned with trifling loss. The approach of winter, and the want of subsistence for their cavalry, obliged the Spaniards to retreat with disgrace to the frontiers of their own country.

The British arms triumphed with equal splendor in the northern and southern parts of Europe. The hereditary prince of Brunswick was posted in the bishopric of Munster, to watch the motions of the French army under Condé, on the Lower Rhine; and prince Ferdinand in person lay with the grand army behind the Dymel, in order to oppose the troops of Hesse, under Soubize and D'Etrées, the successors of M. Broglio, whose successes had been attributed to treachery. Prince Ferdinand founded his plan of attack on the security with which the French confided in their advantageous positions, and their superiority of numbers. That general, with the assistance of Sporken, Luckner, and the marquis of Granby, contrived to attack the right, the centre, and the flank of the enemy's army, at the same moment. The surprise was so great, and the execution conducted with so much celerity, that the French would have been totally routed, had not Stainville, with the flower of their infantry, posted himself in a wood, and checked the career of the victors. This body withstood, for a considerable time, the whole force of the allies; but fell a devoted sacrifice. All but two battalions were taken or cut to pieces. The rest of the army took shelter under the cannon of Cassel. The battle was glorious to the allies, and gave them a decisive advantage during the rest of the campaign.

Soon after this event, the hereditary prince, in the hope of defeating Condé, drove him from the heights of Johannisburg; but, as he pursued him into the plain, the main army came up suddenly upon him, and repulsed his troops with the loss of 3000 men. Notwithstanding this change of fortune, and a severe wound inflicted on prince Ferdinand, the enemy derived no advantages from this victory; but were obliged to evacuate Cassel, in which they had placed a garrison of 10,000 men. After having, for six years, exerted almost the whole undivided strength of the nation against Hanover, the French were advanced but little further than on the day in which they commenced hostile operations. The possession of two or three trivial forts and towns were the only equivalent they obtained for 200,000 lives, and many millions of treasure.

The king of Prussia, instead of being obliged to act on the defensive, was now enabled to resume offensive operations. His object was to recover Silesia, compel marshal Daun, who was posted there, to retire to Bohemia, and afterwards to reinforce prince Henry, now in Saxony, and a second time conquer that electorate. To distract the attention of marshal Daun, he employed a body of troops to assist the Tartars, whom he had instigated to harass Moravia and Hungary. In June, Frederic, being joined by the Russians, 1762. made great advances, and without any regular battle, obliged marshal Daun to abandon his strongest positions in Silesia, to retire to the extremies of that country, and to leave Schweidnitz entirely uncovered. With his Russian auxiliaries, Frederic now proceeded to invest that city; and a considerable body of the allies ravaged Bohemia, when an unexpected and extraordinary revolution threatened to overturn his plan of operations. The inveterate enemy of Frederic, Elizabeth of Russia, was succeeded by her nephew, the duke of Holstein, under the title of Peter III. He was an extravagant admirer of the king of Prussia, and pitied his misfortunes. His family had been compelled by the Danes to relinquish its pretensions to the duchy of Sleswick, his native country; without consulting his allies, he not only agreed to a peace, but to a restitution of the Russian conquests, and to a junction of one part of his forces with those of Prussia, while the other acted against the Danes for the recovery of Sleswick. Sweden, which had long been swayed by the Russian councils, followed his example.

Though the king of Prussia did not fail to improve this favourable change of fortune, by attacking the Imperialists, and gaining some advantages over their forces under marshal Daun; yet the short duration of Peter's popularity soon clouded the prospect before him. The subjects of the Russian monarch deeply resented the surrender of his late conquests, and his introduction of a just and necessary reform into the discipline of the church. The clergy, whose revenues were in some degree diminished by this laudable exercise of his authority, took every opportunity of deceiving the ignorance, and inflaming the passions of the people. The empress, little solicitous for the welfare of a man who had ceased to be a husband, asserted an independent interest in favour of herself. She flattered the nobility, and seemed to respect religion and the clergy in the same degree that the czar appeared to despise them. Peter was ignorant that a general conspiracy had been formed, at the head of which was his wife Catharine, who appeared before the Russian guards, and after haranguing them in the most pathetic terms, was declared their sole and independent sovereign. During these transactions, the emperor was indulging himself with his mistress in idle amusements, at a pleasure-house near the sea-shore. As soon as he learned the fatal intelligence of his degradation, he made an unsuccessful attempt to escape to Holstein; and, on his detention, he was intimidated to sign a paper, declaring his own incapacity for government, the weakness and folly of his administration, and the necessity of his deposition. He was thrown into prison, and died a few days afterwards, whether by the visitation of providence, or by the emissaries of his treacherous consort, is no longer doubtful.

Upon this change of affairs at St. Petersburgh, it was imagined, that the cause of the king of Prussia had become utterly hopeless. But when the empress discovered that Frederic had recommended her late husband to treat her with kindness, and had pointed out the danger of attempting any alteration in the religious and civil laws of his country, she relented, and countermanded the orders for renewing hostilities. The Prussian monarch made the best use of this change of fortune; he attacked and gained several advantages over marshal Daun's army; and, after capturing Schweidnitz, which sustained a long and vigorous defence, compelled the marshal to evacuate Silesia. The Imperial and Austrian forces were also completely routed, near Freyburg, with the loss of many thousands in slain, 240 officers and 6000 privates taken prisoners, and thirty pieces of cannon. The Prussians immediately on this victory entered Bohemia in triumph, advanced to the gates of Prague, and reduced the town of Egra to ashes. The diet of the empire, alarmed for their personal safety, prepared for flight, and began to remove their records. The city of Nuremburg was obliged to pay £300,000 sterling, to avoid being plundered; a sum which, added to other exactions, equalled in amount the subsidy received from England in former years.

The slow progress of the Spaniards in Portugal, the retrograde motion of the French troops in Germany, the reduction of the Havannah, and the capture of the troops sent to retake Newfoundland, all conspired to impress the ministry of France with a sense of the impolicy of continuing the contest. England, though not unable to carry on the war, was not averse to peace. An important change had taken place in the administration, about the month of May. An opinion had been long entertained, that the Pelham family had been as complete masters of the cabinet, during the last years of the reign of George II., as the Marlborough family in that of Anne. A resolution was therefore formed to expel them from court, and the duke of Newcastle retired from his situation of first lord of the treasury.

No sooner had lord Bute succeeded to that situation, than a great number of the Whigs resigned, or were dismissed; a less numerous, but more able body, headed by Mr. Pitt, without coalescing with the Newcastle party, was adverse to the ministry. From the open attachment of his majesty to the earl of Bute, that nobleman was esteemed and denominated, the royal favourite. The influence of his lordship and his friends was attributed to private partiality, and they were accused of governing by a system of court favouritism. The supposed operation of this plan was exhibited, with great force and eloquence, by the parliamentary speakers and political writers of the day. The deportment of Bute was by no means such as tended to counteract his unpopularity. With exemplary morals, he was reserved and haughty in his manners. In his appointment to subordinate offices, he had frequently removed Englishmen of respectable characters, to make room for Scotchmen who were not known, and who were presumed to be the abettors of arbitrary power. The Whig party had been uniformly connected with the monied interest, and Pitt possessed the most unlimited confidence of that important body of men. The supplies of the current year had been raised, while the duke of Newcastle was at the head of the treasury. On lord Bute they had no reliance. To a ministry which was both hated and suspected, a war was difficult; their failure would have been attributed to incapacity, and their success would be converted into an argument for unreasonable terms of peace. They therefore pretended that it was full time to suspend hostilities, and to consult the interests of humanity; and pursued their object with so much eagerness and enthusiasm, as to excite suspicions of their integrity, which were equally unjust and absurd.

The courts of France and England being thus equally sincere in their advances to peace, all difficulties were soon removed. The duke of Nivernois on the part of France, and the duke of Bedford on the part of England, were appointed ambassadors to the respective courts. In the negotiation of 1761, a principle had been established between the two crowns, that their respective propositions, if the treaty were broken off, should be considered as retracted, and as never made; the negotiation, therefore, of 1762, was not a renewal of that of 1761. France and England both recurred to the original cause of the war, the limits of the North American territories, and their boundaries were now determined with the utmost exactness. A line drawn along the middle of the rivers Mississippi and Iberville, the lakes Maurepas and Pont Chartraine to the sea, separated the possessions of the two nations; the extensive, but barren sands of Florida being exchanged for the Havannah, and the contingent possession of the Philippine islands. To command the navigation of St. Lawrence, and to secure the possession of her northern acquisitions, Britain was to retain the island of Cape Breton, and St. John. By the treaty of Utrecht, the Newfoundland fishery had been divided between France and England. It was now attempted by the latter power to obtain the whole, and at length a compromise was effected, by which Britain was left in possession of the greater share. In the West Indies, the English retained none of the conquered islands, but the Grenadas, Tobago, Dominico, and St. Vincent, being our antient possessions. In Africa, Goree was restored to the French, and Senegal ceded to the British; and in the East Indies, Britain returned all the French factories and settlements; France having stipulated to erect no fortifications in Bengal or Orissa, and to acknowledge the reigning subahs of Bengal, the Decan, and the Carnatic. The island of Belleisle was exchanged for Minorca, and Dunkirk was to be dismantled. The British ministers consented to dissolve their alliance with the king of Prussia; the French engaging to withdraw their assistance from the empress-queen, and to evacuate their German conquests. All the territories of Portugal, without distinction, were evacuated. Such were the conditions of a treaty, which was interchanged on the 3rd of November, between the ministers of Great Britain, France, Spain, and Portugal. Peace being thus restored between the two great powers, whose treasures supplied the German war, it was reasonably expected that the empress-queen and the king of Prussia would soon accommodate their disputes. The superiority acquired by the Prussians at the close of the campaign accelerated the compliance of Austria, and a treaty was concluded at Hubertsburg, of mutual restitution and oblivion; by which each party remained, after a long succession of bloodshed, and the infliction of every evil humanity could sustain, in the same situation as at the beginning of the war.

The parliament met on the 25th of November. When the preliminaries were taken into consideration, and a motion was made for an address of thanks to his majesty, it was warmly opposed by a powerful party in both houses. Mr. Pitt declaimed with uncommon vehemence against them, declaring that they obscured the glories of the war, surrendered the dearest interests of the nation, and sacrificed the public faith by the abandonment of our allies. By restoring, he observed, to France the most valuable of the West India islands, and by our concessions in the Newfoundland fishery, we have given her the means of recovering prodigious losses, and of becoming once more formidable to us at sea. The fishery trained up an innumerable multitude of seamen, and the West India trade employed them when trained. He then compared the value of these possessions, by which France would enrich her finances, and augment her resources, with that of the cessions in North America, and insisted on the connection between the West India trade and that to our American colonies, and to the African coast. He ridiculed the idea of mutual restitution in the East Indies; and he reprobated the article relating to our German allies, by which it was stipulated, that the territories of the other princes should be restored, while those of his Prussian majesty, our ally, was only to be evacuated, and might be entered upon by the Austrians as soon as the troops of France had left them. He declared his disapprobation of the preliminaries, because he saw in them the seeds of future war. The peace was insecure, because it restored the enemy to her former greatness; it was inadequate, because the places gained were no equivalent for those surrendered. To these observations it was answered, that the original object of our hostilities was the security of our continental possessions in North America, and the removal of the French from our neighbourhood in that country was therefore the most effectual means of preventing future war. The friends of administration expatiated on the immense resources to commerce which must arise from the possession of the American continent. France, they said, would never agree to a considerable cession in the West Indies, where the importance of our possessions depended on our North American colonies, from which they derived their principal provisions, and other supplies. They contended, that the points which the opposite party had thought proper to contest, were not of sufficient importance to justify the continuance of the war. We had supported the king of Prussia so long as he was likely to be overwhelmed by his enemies; but now that he had to contend with Austria only, our support would only tend to promote his ambition. Notwithstanding the evident culpability of the ministers, particularly with regard to the cessions in the West Indies, the majority in parliament approved of the preliminary articles of peace; and many addresses of congratulation were presented from counties, cities, and boroughs. In general, however, the signatures were obtained by the intrigues and influence of the ministers.

When the duke of Newcastle resigned the treasury to the earl of Bute, the people, alarmed at seeing the whole power of the nation engrossed by persons, whose principles of liberty were dubious, began to censure the ministers with a freedom approaching to abuse, and their disgust was confirmed by the disadvantageous conditions of the peace. The opposition assailed the administration in the most tender part, the supplies, and several circumstances favoured their design. Though the necessity of taxes was as great as during the war, that necessity was not so palpable to the senses of the people. Means were adopted to persuade the nation, that the new taxes were partial and destructive. The whole of the new funds amounted to £7,300,000. In order to pay the interest of the annuities which were granted to the lenders of money, an additional duty of £8 per ton was imposed on all French wines. In aid of this plan, every hogshead of cyder and perry was charged with a duty of 4*s.* to be levied by excise. Those who examine the nature and operation of different modes of levying taxes are aware, that excise is less burdensome to the consumer than any equivalent raised in customs. Customs, though advanced by the merchant, must ultimately fall on the consumer; and, as the merchant must not only be reimbursed, but have a profit on all his advance, it follows, that the earlier in trade customs are paid for any commodity, the heavier they must fall on the consumer. The excise being levied on commodities in use, and paid by the consumer, does not require him to reimburse the merchant for his advance, nor to contribute to his profits. But in customs, the tax, being involved in the price of the commodity, is not felt as a tax; and, though really heavier than the excise, is regarded as lighter. From this unfounded supposition, excise is a much more unpopular mode of taxation than customs. Two circumstances add to the unpopularity of this tax: the visits of excise officers; and the summary process before commissioners. The former practice has not been found to endanger our freedom, or to occasion any inconvenience proportionable to its advantage to the revenues; and the expence and delay of prosecutions would fall infinitely heavier on defendants than this expeditious mode of ascertaining the matter in dispute. Every scheme, however, for introducing and extending the excise, has always excited the tumultuous opposition of the people. Their resentment had endangered the administration of Walpole, and now effected the downfal of lord Bute. The unpopularity of that nobleman was already great, and the loudness and violence of the clamour against him, on the bill being passed into a law, deeply affected him. Abusive pamphlets, and able lampoons, were circulated through every class and description of society; and his lordship was charged with an intention to engross the whole authority of the executive government, and to attempt the establishment of arbitrary power, by corrupt influence, and the extension of the prerogative. It would be difficult to prove what his intentions were; but the events of his administration evinced, that he wanted judgment in the choice of expedients, and firmness in their execution. Had his discernment and intrepidity been equal to his ambition, he would not have abandoned his friends and his post at the hour of danger; or would have kept the quiet and beaten path of government. In the midst of the commotion excited by the excise bill, he resigned the office of first lord of the treasury; and was succeeded by Mr. George Grenville. The new minister was chiefly distinguished for activity and diligence; and more famous for an attachment to his personal interest, than for his services to his country. Lord Egremont became secretary for the southern department. In the northern department, business was transacted by lord Halifax, a nobleman of respectable talents. The private characters of these three individuals could not be objected to. But a persuasion prevailed, that the late minister still retained an ascendancy in the cabinet, and exercised his power after he had divested himself of all political responsibility. These sentiments were studiously and industriously propagated by the partisans of the opposition, and had the effect intended, of rendering the administration unpopular. From this cause originated the most serious evils; an extreme jealousy of the royal authority; a determined opposition to the measures of the court: and, on the other hand, the desire of the crown to establish its authority on a foundation so firm as to defy the effects apprehended from popular influence, especially in the appointment of officers of state. Such were the causes of these internal tumults, which threatened to involve the kingdom in rebellion at the commencement of the reign of a monarch, whose personal demeanour had gained him the affections of his people. The public mind was more and more inflamed by the continued circulation of anonymous attacks on the sovereign and the ministry. Among the inflammatory publications of this period, the North Briton was distinguished for the vehemence of its scurrility. The licentious author of this paper, after attacking with virulence the characters of the ministers, and of him who was supposed to direct their councils, assailed the throne itself; and, under cover of the supposition, that the king's speech in parliament is that of his minister, he charged his majesty with having affirmed a direct falsehood. A general warrant was immediately issued by lord Halifax, as secretary of state, "To take up the authors, printers, and publishers of a seditious and treasonable paper, called, the North Briton, Number 45, together with their papers." By virtue of this warrant, Mr. John Wilkes, representative for the borough of Aylesbury, the supposed author, was apprehended and committed to the Tower, his papers were seized, and all access to him was forbidden. On bringing his habeas corpus, however, he was liberated, without bail, by the court of common pleas; the chief justice, lord Camden, having given it as the opinion of the judges, that although the commitment was not in itself illegal, yet he ought to be released, because the privilege of parliament extended to the offence for which he was committed. The populace regarded his discharge as the triumph of liberty over ministerial oppression, and attended Wilkes from the Tower to his home, rending the air with their praises and acclamations. When the parliament met, the ministers endeavoured to throw as much reproach as possible on the attempts which had been made to render the people discontented. The affair of Mr. Wilkes was then brought before the lower house, by a message delivered by Mr. Grenville from his majesty, importing that Mr. Wilkes, having refused to answer to an information filed against him by the attorney-general, his majesty, desirous to shew all possible attention to the privileges of the house, while public justice was duly executed, had directed the libel for which he was apprehended, together with the copies of his examination, to be laid before them. After warm debates, in which the friends of Mr. Wilkes rested his defence on the proposition, that the king's speech was to be considered as that of the minister, and had always been considered in that light by the authors of political pamphlets, it was voted, by a great majority, that the North Briton, Number 45, was a false, scandalous, and seditious libel, manifestly tending to alienate the affections of the people from his majesty, and excite them to traitorous insurrections; and it was resolved, that it should be burned by the hands of the common hangman. The peers also concurred in an address, expressing their indignation at the contumely with which his majesty had been treated in the libel, and at the outrage which had been offered to every branch of the legislature. The people rescued the condemned paper from the flames, notwithstanding all the efforts of the sheriff.

The proceedings in parliament did not prevent Wilkes from presenting to the house his complaint of breach of privilege, by the imprisonment of his person, and the plunder of his house. Many of the sincerest friends to the constitution and to good order, regretted the indiscretion of the parliament, when they saw the interests of the legislative bodies so blended with those of a seditious libeller, whose practices they abhorred, that they were obliged to forget his private iniquities, and his public infamy, in his political wrongs, or afford a precedent to future parliaments, which might aid the progress of ministerial persecution. The ministerial side of the house, however, rather irritated than intimidated by the strenuous defence of his advocates, obtained a vote that the privilege of parliament does not extend to the case of writing and publishing seditious writings. In this vote the lords concurred, but not without a protest signed by 17 peers. A process was accordingly issued against Mr. Wilkes, as the presumed author.

Soon after this decision, Wilkes was engaged in a duel with Mr. Martin, a member of parliament, and late secretary to the treasury, whose character he had attacked in his writings. In this engagement he received a dangerous wound. But, as he found that the minority were regardless of his cause, he refused admittance to the gentlemen of the faculty, deputed to examine his wound, and suddenly removed to France, before he was perfectly recovered. His flight was chiefly determined by the language of Mr. Pitt, who, justly shocked and disgusted by the private circulation of Wilkes's Essay on Woman, which contained several profane allusions to the Athanasian creed, declared, that though he could not be expected to surrender the privilege of parliament, he abhorred the offender, as a blasphemer of his God, and libeller of his king, and had joined in the former vote against him. The house of lords proceeded against Wilkes for a breach of privilege; in a short time he was prosecuted for the double crime of blasphemy and libel; and sustained the infliction of an outlawry.

Previous to his departure he printed the proceedings against him at his private press, and sold them at one guinea a copy. By the extraordinary sale of his pamphlet, he procured a degree of affluence, to which he had been before unaccustomed. He was indeed a master of expedients. His dissipation was equal to his attainments; and the latter, though not of the most exalted kind, were various and considerable. He was distinguished by his wit and pleasantry, possessed a respectable share of classical erudition, and surpassed most men as an entertaining and engaging companion. Prodigality had ruined his fortune, and profligacy. his character. Bankrupt in circumstances and reputation, he had applied to lord Bute to extricate him from his embarrassments. The notoriety of his character precluded success. Wilkes, in revenge, became a zealous and vehement patriot, inveighed against the attacks upon our rights and liberties, and against the unprincipled wickedness of the existing rulers; and derived from the enterprise, not only a timely relief from his pecuniary distresses, but a degree of consequence in the state, and favour with the people, propitious to the interests of liberty, notwithstanding the unworthiness of the instrument.

While the nation was agitated by the proceedings instituted against the favourite of the people, an attempt was made, on the vacancy of the secretary's office, by the death of the earl of Egremont, to accomplish a coalition between the friends of the late minister, and the principal members of the opposition. The chief of these were Mr. Pitt, the dukes of Newcastle and Devonshire, and the marquis of Rockingham. With this view, several conferences were held by Mr. Pitt with lord Bute, and with his majesty. But when it appeared that the arrangements insisted on by the former, would give him an ascendancy incompatible with the wishes of the court, the negotiation was broken off. And the late minister, instead of effecting his purpose, of relieving himself from the odium in which he was now held, lost the authority which he had hitherto retained in the opinions of the people, by the tacit confession of weakness which his proposals implied. The duke of Bedford was now appointed to the office of president of the council, lord Sandwich was made secretary of state, the earl of Egmont first lord of the admiralty, and the earl of Hillsborough first commissioner of trade.

During these domestic transactions, every expedient was adopted, to render the acquisitions of the British crown as profitable as possible. Under the direction of the lords of trade, a vast extent of newly-acquired territory, in the south of America, was now divided into townships; grants of land were made to soldiers and seamen of merit; to a field-officer 5000, to a captain 3000, to a subaltern 2000, to a non-commissioned officer 200, to a private soldier or seaman 50. That stability might be insured to our conquests, and to awe the neighbouring Indian nations, a military establishment of 10,000 men, was formed for this country, and for the West India islands. Notwithstanding the policy of this measure, it did not answer all the objects intended. The colonies were relieved from the inroads of the French, and from the molestation of the Troquois Indians. But they had yet a formidable enemy in the Indians who inhabited the country bordering on the Ohio, and between that river and lake Ontario. Impressed by the artifices of the French with a persuasion, that the English meditated their utter extirpation, they attempted to avert their fate by an irruption on our frontiers. Having driven away the inhabitants of several towns on the borders of Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Maryland, they ravaged the country with remorseless cruelty. They obtained possession of several forts near lake Erie and the Ohio; and, animated by success, attacked the more important fortresses of Detroit, Niagara, and fort Pitt. Captains Dalyel and Grant were sent by general Amherst, with a small force, to the defence of fort Detroit. But these officers were defeated with considerable loss, and with difficulty effected their retreat to the fortress. Though the British troops defended themselves with the desperate bravery of men who knew their lives to be in jeopardy, it is difficult to say what might have been their fate, had not the enemies been obliged to abandon the siege precipitately, in order to intercept colonel Bouquet, who was advancing to their assistance with a strong reinforcement. This officer, finding it impossible to procure any intelligence, left behind him all the provision and ammunition which was not judged absolutely necessary, and pursued his march with all that cautious expedition, which the nature of the country and service required. After having traversed a considerable tract of rough and mountainous forest, he arrived at a dangerous defile, extending several miles in length, and commanded on both sides by high and craggy hills. In order to elude, if possible, the vigilance of so alert an enemy, he determined to pass it in the night.

While the troops, after a fatiguing march of seventeen miles, were preparing to refresh themselves, and to make the necessary arrangements, their advanced guard was suddenly attacked by the Indians. This body, being speedily and firmly supported, repulsed the enemies, and pursued them to a considerable distance. But their flight proved only a decoy, to entangle the whole detachment in the snare which was prepared for them. When the pursuit ended, they returned to the charge with redoubled vigour; and being supported by parties, which lay in ambush on the high and woody grounds, flanking our army, they galled it with an obstinate fire. The whole line was obliged to advance, and to dislodge them from these posts.

Though this movement succeeded, it produced no decisive advantage. No sooner were the savages driven from one eminence, but they occupied another, till by constant reinforcements they surrounded the whole detachment, and attacked the convoy in the rear; a circumstance which forced our troops to fall back for its protection. The enemies, improving this advantage, pressed forward with the greatest spirit. The action grew hotter and hotter every moment; and the English found themselves encircled and assailed at once by superior numbers. But their courage, their perseverance, their dexterity in evolutions, surmounted all obstacles. They forced the Indians from all their posts with bayonets fixed. Night put an end to the engagement, which had been continued from noon without intermission.

The ground, on which they stood, was not ill-adapted for an encampment; the convoy was therefore placed in the centre, the troops forming a circle round it. In this posture they passed a restless and anxious night, obliged to the strictest vigilance by an enterprising and daring enemy, who waited only for the morning to complete their destruction. Soldiers accustomed only to the humane maxims of European war have hardly any idea of the dangers to be endured in an American campaign. In Europe, the roads are practicable, magazines are established, and hospitals provided. In case of any great disaster strong towns are at hand; or at the worst, a generous enemy is ready to afford every relief to the vanquished. No consolation but that of victory can be wanting. Such a service may be considered as the exercise of an active and adventurous mind, rather than a sanguinary contest for mutual destruction; a dispute between rivals for glory, rather than a struggle between deadly enemies. But in America every object is pregnant with terror: the face of the country, the climate, the enemy. There is no refreshment for the healthy, no relief for the sick or wounded. A vast, inhospitable desart, full of snares and treachery, extends on every side. Victories are not decisive, but defeats are ruinous; and simple death is the least misfortune that may befal a soldier. What then can be more critical than such campaigns? As they act in small bodies, man fights against man; every individual marks his antagonist. All the vigour of the body and firmness of the mind is put to the severest trial; every exertion of courage and address is called forth into action. If the events have less dignity and magnificence than those of a regular war, they are more interesting to the heart, more amusing to the imagination.

At the first dawn of light, the savages, setting up the war-whoop all around the camp, in order to intimidate with their numbers and ferocity, made several bold attempts to penetrate into it under favour of an incessant fire. Though constantly repulsed, they constantly renewed their attacks, and harassed our troops, which were equally distressed with fatigue and want of water, circumstances much more insupportable than the enemies' fire. Their situation was extremely critical and perplexing: tied to their convoy, they could not lose sight of it for a moment without exposing not only that interesting object, but also their wounded to the merciless barbarians. Many of their horses were lost; many of the drivers, stupified by fear, had hid themselves in the bushes, and were incapable of hearing or obeying orders: to pursue their march was therefore impracticable. Besieged rather than engaged; attacked without interruption, and without decision; capable neither to advance nor retreat; they saw nothing before them but the melancholy prospect of crumbling away by degrees, and perishing without revenge, without honour in those dreadful forests. The fate of Braddock and his army came rushing to their minds; but they had another commander.

Bouquet, seeing that all depended on bringing the savages to a close engagement, endeavoured to inspire them with confidence, and to give additional strength to that audacity, which success had already so greatly increased. For this purpose two companies, who occupied the most advanced posts, were ordered to fall within the circle; the rest of the troops opening their files to the right and left, and then closing up the vacant space, as if they meant to cover their retreat. The savages fell into the snare. Imagining that the thin line of troops, which filled up the ground abandoned by two companies detached to support the former, indicated a retreat by moving nearer to the centre, they rushed from the woods which covered them, and, hurrying headlong on with the most daring intrepidity, galled the English with their heavy fire. But at the very instant when they thought the victory certain and the camp taken, the two first companies rushed out from an invisible part of the hill, and attacked their right flank. The barbarians, though disappointed, were not dismayed: they returned the fire with great spirit. But discipline and well-directed strength soon decided the contest; unable to sustain the irresistable shock of the regulars, they fled at the second volley. As they turned their backs, the other two companies presented themselves in their front, and by their full fire completed their overthrow. They were pursued, and totally routed and dispersed.

This well-concerted and well-executed stratagem saved the whole detachment from the most imminent danger. The rest of the savages, who had been kept in awe during the engagement by the British troops, were terrified by the fate of their companions, betook themselves to flight; and abandoned all the adjacent woods. Yet, notwithstanding this advantage, so many men had been wounded, and so many horses lost, that, before our troops could move, they were under the disagreeable necessity of destroying the greatest part of their convoy of provisions, and consequently of relinquishing one of the principal objects of their expedition. This action, in which our officers and soldiers gained great and just honour, was the only one of moment which distinguished this war. As the Indians draw their chief subsistence from hunting, and their hunters and warriors are the same, they were soon weary of it, and laid down the hatchet. For the future, gentle and pacific measures were embraced by our colonists, and past experience taught them, that their enmity is as dangerous as their friendship is advantageous. By kind and indulgent usage they lost both their military and savage spirit, and instead of barbarous foes became useful subjects and allies.

In the month of January, in the ensuing year, Wilkes was expelled the house of commons. The odium which he had incurred was considerably diminished, when the manner in which the evidence was brought against him was fully known, and when it was made obvious to the people, that he had intended the Essay on Woman for circulation only among his friends. As the long and uninterrupted precedents adduced in the support of general warrants only rendered the danger more alarming, many were of opinion, that, in order to remove the fears and jealousies of the public, the practice ought to be formally condemned by the commons. At length a resolution was past, declaring, that a general warrant, for apprehending the authors, printers, and publishers of a seditious libel, and for seizing their papers, is contrary to law; but, notwithstanding all the arguments of the opposition, the ministerial party attached a ridet to the bill, which exculpated the accused officers of state. This resolution respecting general warrants was the chief advantage arising from the dispute between Wilkes and the ministry. 1764.

The proceedings in the house of commons, in their resolution of expulsion, scarcely excited more violent clamours among the people, than the conduct of lord Sandwich in the upper house. He was himself a drunkard and a profligate, and had formerly been one of the most intimate associates of Wilkes; yet he was extremely active in obtaining evidence to prove the publication of the Essay on Woman. His own habits of intercourse, and sources of information, peculiarly fitting his lordship for bringing his flagitiousness to light, he obtained a copy of the work, and complained of it in the house of peers, as a flagrant outrage against the most sacred duties, both of God and man. The peers immediately addressed his majesty, desiring him to prosecute the author. He was accordingly indicted for blasphemy, while the proceedings respecting the libel were pending. On the 21st of February, he was tried before lord Mansfield for republishing the North Briton, with notes, and on the same day for printing and publishing the Essay on Woman. Not returning to receive sentence, he was outlawed, an event peculiarly grateful to the earl of Halifax, against whom all proceedings were of course abated. An action for damages was brought against that nobleman, and, after a trial of fifteen hours, before the lord chief justice, a verdict was given for the plaintiff, with £1000 damages and costs of suit.

The affairs of India at this period became extremely important. Soon after Mir Kossim, the successor of Jaffier Ali Cawn, had been restored to his province by the assistance of the English, his next care was to render himself independent of those men, to whose valour he owed his prosperity. After complaining of being treated with insolence and indignity, he removed his court from Murshadabad, a city which, by its vicinity to Calcutta, enabled the factory to observe his conduct. He proceeded 200 miles higher up the Ganges, and fixed his residence at Mongheer. He collected a numerous army, composed of Persians, Tartars, Armenians, and vagrant Europeans, changed the fashion of the English muskets from matchlocks to firelocks, and improved his cannon. He soon incurred the displeasure of Mr. Vansittart, the English governor, by issuing an order, subjecting all the three traders to the regular and equal payment of duties throughout his dominions, and commanding that all disputes occurring in his territories should be determined by his magistrates.

Mr. Vansittart immediately repaired to Mongheer, expostulated with Mir Kossim on the subject of his repeated violation of the company's privileges, and concluded with him a treaty, which regulated their mutual trade, and laid it under some restrictions. Against this treaty a general clamour was raised by the ambition and cupidity of the company, and it was voted by the board at Calcutta to be dishonourable, disadvantageous, and a breach of their privileges. They then deputed Mr. Amyat, and others of their body, to negotiate a new treaty with him. But Mir Kossim, grown confident in his strength, sternly refused to alter the stipulations of the treaty, and as the deputies were returning by water to Calcutta, they were fired upon and murdered by his troops, posted on the banks of the Hughly. In the mean time, Mr. Ellis, the chief of the factory at Patna, 300 miles above Calcutta, without assigning a justifiable reason, attacked the city, and made himself master of it. But while his troops were engaged in plunder, the governor and garrison returned suddenly upon them in their haste to take refuge in a neighbouring territory.

This act of Mr. Ellis was condemned as rash and impolitic, independent of its evident injustice. But it now became necessary to enter upon vigorous hostilities. Major Adams, who was invested with the chief command in colonel Coote's absence, being joined by a body of troops under major Carnac, marched rapidly towards Murshadabad, and having defeated an Indian army, posted to oppose his march, possessed himself of the city. The English general then marched his small army, while his troops were animated by success, in quest of the nabob. The army of Mir Kossim consisted of 28,000 men, armed with firelocks, provided with a train of artillery, and formed into regular brigades. They advanced to meet their enemy, and chose a strong position on the Nuna Nullas. Thus judiciously posted, they were attacked by the English army, which did not exceed 3000 men, and after maintaining the action four hours, were driven from the ground, with the irreparable loss of their artillery.

The remainder of the campaign was one continued train of success on the part of the English. When the nabob's forces did not dare to appear again in the field, the British generals attacked and forced their entrenchments at Anda Nulla. Then pursuing Mir Kossim to his residence at Mongheer, whither he had fled for refuge, they gained possession of that fortress, and afterwards closed their career with the reduction of Patna, the last place of strength which remained in his dominions.

When the company heard of the commencement of hostilities, they were greatly alarmed. In the extremity of their fear, they invested lord Clive and four other gentlemen with unlimited authority to examine and determine every public measure, independently of the council, so long as Bengal should continue in a state of war. Before this select committee arrived at Bengal, Jaffier Ali Cawn died, and nominated his son Naijem Doulah his successor, which nomination the council confirmed. He was allowed to keep no soldiers, but a few for parade; and they compelled him to deliver up Nundacomar, his prime minister, and the instructor of his youth, and to accept one of their servants, who might act as a spy upon his conduct.

Mir Kossim, after his late disasters, had fled for protection to the court of Sujah al Dowlah, nabob of Oude, a powerful prince, who acted as vizier to the mogul, and had not only obtained his protection, but, by his weight at the court of Delhi, had engaged Shah Allum in his alliance. The council of Calcutta peremptorily demanded his surrender of the fugitive prince, with all his effects, and was answered by a warm and just expostulation on their ambition, injustice, and rapacity. The council, irritated by this remonstrance, determined to humble and chastise the intrepidity of the nabob; and sir Hector Munro penetrated to the territories of Oude with about 5000 men. He found a vast confederate army, posted near the junction of the Cammissary with the Ganges, having a morass in its front, and protected by the fortress of Buxard. An action ensued, which, after it had been fought three hours, terminated in favour of the English. The confederate Indians were routed, with the loss of 6000 men, and 150 pieces of artillery. Sir Henry Munro, after he had been foiled in an attempt to possess himself of the strong fortress of Chundageer, retired to Benares, and encamped his troops under the walls of that city.

In the Carnatic, Mahommed Ali had been by the conditions of the late peace acknowledged nabob of the Carnatic; and, in compliance with the company's wishes, he entered into a treaty with the rajah of Tanjore, guaranteed by the president and council of Madras, by which he received from the rajah, as the great mogul's representative was regulated and explained. Mahommed Ali was compelled to cede to the company in Jaghire, in consequence of their services, four districts, the revenue of which amounted to 14 lacks of rupees, or about £175,000. Mr. Pigot then resigned the government to Mr. Palk, who was appointed to succeed him, and embarked for England. The rajah of Tanjore died in the ensuing year, and was succeeded by his son, Tulja Ji, a prince as weak and profligate as his father, and whom the company soon experienced to be equally faithless. 1763. Usoph Khan, governor of Madura, a city dependent on the nabob of Arcot, having neglected to pay the stipulated tribute, Mahommed called upon the company for its support in enforcing the payment. In compliance with his request, a body of troops was sent to reinforce the army with which the nabob had invested Madura. Tulja Ji, in order to lull the suspicion of the company, had sent auxiliaries to the besieging army, while he secretly encouraged Usoph to resistance by promises of support, and permitted a body of French troops, which had served in his army, to enter into the service of the revolted Khan. His treachery proved the destruction of the individual whom he meant to serve. Merchand, a French officer, willing to gain the favour of the nabob, betrayed his trust, seized the person of Usoph, and delivered him up to Mahommed, by whom he was instantly put to death. Such was the conclusion of a war, as destructive to the English, and as expensive to the nabob, as trivial in its cause.

CHAPTER XIX.

GEORGE III.

Imposition of Duties on the Americans—The Stamp Act—Universal Discontent of the Colonies—Riots in Spitalfields—Affairs of the East India Company—Election of Wilkes for Middlesex—His Expulsion, and Re-election—Arguments adopted by both Parties—Address of the City of London—Intrepidity of Beckford.

1765. IN the beginning of the succeeding year, an unbounded love of power, which was the predominant feature of the cabinet, laid the foundations of those differences between Great Britain and her colonies in North America, which ended in the independence of the latter. The parliament passed a law, in the beginning of the year 1764, which, while it rendered the intercourse of the Americans with other colonies in some respect legal, loaded the most advantageous part of it with such heavy duties, as amounted to a total prohibition. Not satisfied with imposing this hardship, it ordered all the money arising from these duties to be paid in specie to the British exchequer; a regulation which must have exhausted the colonies of the trivial portion of money which remained in their hands.

IN this session, the celebrated act for levying a duty on stamps on the British colonies of North America, was brought forward by the minister, but did not pass the lower house without long and warm debates. The right of the parliament to tax the colonies, and the expedience of that act, were disputed. It is difficult to determine on particular points, when the question in debate is neither justified nor condemned by precedent. But a prudent statesman will not, unless the occasion be urgent, bring forward an obnoxious measure, when the minds of men are in a state of irritation, which excites them to oppose it. This was the case in the present instance. The bill was founded on the principle of making every part of his majesty's dominions contribute to the support of the government by which it is protected. But the imposition of the tax tended to establish a power in the British legislature, to tax the colonies without their consent, which they were apprehensive might be abused to the purposes of oppression. The great and decisive argument in favour of their resistance rested upon the simple and obvious proposition, that those who are not represented in the great council of the nation cannot be subjected to taxation If many individuals in England be subjected to the payment of a considerable annual contribution to the revenue, their patrons and advisers, all whom they are accustomed to regard with reverence, upon whom their interest is dependent, or who are qualified and authorised to illustrate their views, have access to the national assembly, and are able to express their wishes, and support their rights. But the colonies were condemned to submit to the decisions of the English senate, unaided by council, unsupported by their own proper representatives; and were in the same situation as that to which the Irish people would have been subjected to the prerent day, had they possessed neither a parliament of their own, nor a share in that of the country, with which they are connected. The minister, who was the author of the measures respecting American taxation, deferred the proposition of the stamp duty some months after his intention was announced, in order that the colonies might have time to deliberate on the subject, and might offer a compensation for the revenue which the tax would produce. He informed the agents that he was prepared to receive proposals from the colonies for any other tax, which might be equivalent in its produce. But it was not to the amount of the tax that the Americans objected, but to its principle; the proposal only tended to exasperate their resistance, and having evinced no indication of acquiescence, the bill was hurried through the house, and received the royal assent.

On the arrival of intelligence at Boston, the rage of the populace was accompanied by the most evident expressions of sorrow and discontent. The colours of the shipping in the harbour were displayed half-mast high, in token of the deepest mourning; the bells rang muffled; the act itself was printed, with the decoration of death's heads, and cried publicly about the streets, under the title of the Folly of England, and the Ruin of America. The provincial assemblies deriving boldness from the unanimity displayed in the southern provinces, sanctioned the proceedings of the multitude, by declaring that Great Britain could claim no right to the imposition of taxes, without their free consent. The assemblies deputed a general congress, to be held at New York, which petitioned his majesty for redress of grievances.

The indisposition of the king, and his paternal regard to the welfare of his people, induced him to propose a regency bill, by which he might be enabled to appoint, in case of his decease, the queen, or some other person of the royal family, guardian of the realm, and of the heir apparent; the princess dowager of Wales, the mother of the king, was particularly mentioned as worthy of the regency. While this measure was under consideration, the journeymen silk-weavers of London assembled, by beat of drum, in Spitalfields and Moorfields, and proceeded, with flags expressive of their grievances, to St. James's. Conceiving themselves injured by the free use of French silks, they surrounded the palace, and houses of parliament, and presented a petition for the redress of their complaints. As the weavers in the country were reported to be approaching to join their distressed brethren in London, considerable apprehensions were entertained for the public tranquillity; but, after breaking the windows of a few houses suspected of selling French silks, and compelling a nobleman who had treated their cause with harshness to abscond, the clamour was appeased. The distress of the weavers did not so much arise from the importation of French silks, as from a deficiency of the usual sale of their manufactures in the colonies. This conclusion was suggested by the privy-council, and impressed the mind of his majesty with an unfavourable opinion of the talents of the ministry. When to these circumstances it is added, that the ministers had come to an open rupture with the earl of Bute, by dismissing his brother, Mr. Stuart Mackenzie, and his friend lord Northumberland, from their employments, it can excite but little surprise that their authority was nearly at an end. The Rockingham administration next succeeded, and the marquis was appointed first lord of the treasury, in the place of Mr. Grenville. The duke of Grafton and Mr. Conway were made secretaries of state; Mr. Dowdswell chancellor of the exchequer; and the duke of Newcastle lord privy-seal. The prevalence of party spirit was at this period so general and so violent, as to weaken the authority of government, at home and abroad. Foreign nations were averse to enter into negotiations with a cabinet, of which the councils were so fluctuating; and the inferior ranks of the English nation lost the respect and reverence for their rulers, which was necessary for the regular and efficient management of public affairs. The duke of Cumberland, employed in the formation of a ministry, had failed in his negotiation with Mr. Pitt and lord Temple, who were unwilling to lose their popularity, by sharing their power with the earl of Bute and his party; but the royal duke was more successful in his application to lord Rockingham, who, having no political character to risk, was less rigid. Besides those which have been mentioned, many of the other principal offices were filled with men, who were new to the ministerial list, and the duke of Newcastle was the only old statesman who strengthened the party. The youth and inexperience of the ministry were the chief objections by which it was attacked; but the most effective motive of discontent, with the great body of the people, was the exclusion of Mr. Pitt. The arrangement of this ministry was the last public act of the duke of Cumberland, by whose intervention it was formed; his royal highness being taken suddenly ill, at a private council, expired almost instantaneously in the 45th year of his age.

Scarcely had the new ministers entered into office, before they endeavoured to appease the clamour of the Americans, by the most judicious and conciliating conduct. By preserving a wise medium, by suspending their own judgment, and abstaining from violent measures of coercion, they neither urged their fellow-subjects to unpardonable acts of desperation, nor prevented the legislature from embracing pacific councils. In the mean time, the affairs of America became the subject of general discussion, and numberless pamphlets were published on both sides of the question. The advocates for the colonies carried their ideas of liberty to the highest pitch of enthusiasm; and their antagonists seemed to imagine that every privilege, every birthright of an Englishman was forfeited by crossing the Atlantic. Those who affected the greatest candour and impartiality alleged, that the former, by considering the colonies as states, allied, rather than subjected, to the mother-country, furnished the strongest argument for giving an early check to this licentious spirit of freedom, and convincing them of their dependence on the mother-country; and that the latter, by displaying their power, opulence, and population, sufficiently evinced the necessity of treating them with cautious tenderness; since, if their calculations had any solid foundation, it must be impossible to retain them long in subjection.

When the change of ministry became known in America, the spirit which had been so long repressed burst into open violence. At Boston, the fury of the populace was directed against the officers of the crown. Their houses were pillaged, their furniture was destroyed, and their persons endangered. The governor assembled the council of the province, and found in them no inclination to suppress the riots. He attempted to muster some companies of militia, but they refused to obey his orders. The stamp officer, seeing the danger of the employment he was required to exercise, resigned his office. In the other colonies no duty could be levied, and the act was completely inefficient. Deputies from nine of the thirteen colonies assembled on the 1st of October, to hold a general congress. After several days of debate and deliberation, the delegates drew up a declaration of the rights and grievances of the colonies. The declaration set forth that they owed the same allegiance to the sovereign as the people of Great Britain, and all due subordination to parliament. That they were entitled to the same rights, privileges, and immunities, as their fellow-subjects; that no taxes could be imposed on freeborn Britons, but by their own consent, or that of their representatives; that the colonies were not and could not be represented in parliament; that all supplies to the crown were free gifts from the people; that therefore it was unreasonable in the British parliament, to grant the property of the inhabitants of the colonies; and finally, that trial by jury was the right of a British subject. They next proceeded to their grievances; the stamp act tended to subvert the rights and liberties of the colonies. The duties imposed were unconstitutional in their principle, oppressive in their operation, and could not be paid. The British manufactures, which they were in the habit of purchasing, contributed greatly to the revenues; the restrictions imposed by the late acts would prevent them from purchasing these articles, and would consequently materially injure the finances; the increase and prosperity of the colonies depended on the free enjoyment of their rights and liberties.

The congress became the medium of universal concert and communication, among the leading and most able men of the colonies. The moderation of their proceedings, the plausibility of their professions, the tone of respect which pervaded their complaints to the king and the parliament, manifested a sound policy much more formidable than tumultuous violence. Associations were formed, for prohibiting the importation of British manufactures, until the stamp act should be repealed. Commerce was at a stand. The civil courts were unable to proceed; the customs could not be levied; and Mr. Grenville's plan of taxation, so far from improving the revenue, obstructed one of its principal resources.

Thus stood the affair, when the parliament met, on the 14th of January, at the request of the crown, which directed the fullest information to be laid before it, took the subject into consideration. The debates 1766.

turned upon two questions, the right and expediency of taxation. The ministers, who were joined by a great majority, affirmed the right, but denied the expediency. "The constitution of this country," said they, "has been always fluctuating, always gaining or losing: even the representation of the commons was not, till the reign of Henry VII., reduced to any fixed system. What does it avail then to recur to antient records, when the constitution is no longer the same; when no body can ascertain its state at the times which are quoted, and when there are, even in the great charter, things which are no more constitutional? Such misplaced industry is as idle as all that mass of learning and dissertation collected from natural lawyers, such as Locke, Selden, Puffendorff, and other speculative men, under whose arguments and refinements the subject has been almost buried. Beyond the era of Edward I. or king John, the mode of taxation is involved through the uncertainty of history in doubt and obscurity. Some of the writs upon record were conformable, some contrary, to law. Of the latter sort are those issued for raising ship-money and extorting benevolences. Can any just conclusion be drawn from such discordant, such opposite precedents? The marches of Wales did not long enjoy the privilege of taxing themselves; they were, upon the accession of the prince of Wales, annexed to the crown, and subjected to the payment of taxes, like the rest of England. Henry VIII. was the first who issued writs for the return of two members to parliament. Before his time, this point was left to the discretion of the crown; a circumstance, which caused the great inequality observable to this day in our representation. The same prince allowed Calais the right of sending one member to parliament; and one of the counties palatine was taxed for the space of fifty years, before it acquired the right of representation. Where then is the propriety of saying that representation and taxation are inseparably connected, or, at least, that they have been so in England since the first origin of the constitution? It is equally absurd to draw any inference from the case of the clergy; because they were at no time unrepresented. They had always a right of voting singly in the election of members; they had bishops and abbots as representatives in the house of lords, and they were obliged by petition to obtain the consent of parliament for taxing themselves. Any reasoning, founded on the conduct of antiquity to their colonies, is but an useless display of learning. None of the antients formed a regular system of colonization but the Romans; whose plan, being military, implied a boundless and uncontroulable authority. The states of Holland were not colonies; and nothing can be more different from colonies than that inundation of men, who poured into the Roman empire from the North. These barbarous emigrants renounced all connection with their native desarts and forests, which upon their departure remained generally unpeopled, till another race of savages was forced to occupy their place. But our colonies emigrated under the sanction of the crown and parliament; and, though their governments were modelled by charters, grants, and statutes, they were never emancipated, much less dismembered. They do not themselves deny their dependence on the crown. How then can they help acknowledging their dependence on parliament, when both are inseparable, and constitute one single, undivided, and indivisible authority? As soon as the commonwealth parliament was formed, it discovered great jealousy of a separation of the colonies, and passed an act establishing their authority over them. It is a question whether this act be not still in force; and if it should not, constant usage, without any express law, is sufficient to determine the point. For have not the colonies submitted since their first origin to the jurisdiction of England? Have they not appealed to the privy-council in all questions concerning property; and have they not been decided, not by the law of the colonies, but by the law of England? They have been frequently at variance. New Hampshire and Connecticut have been in blood about their limits; Virginia and Maryland have taken up arms against each other; circumstances, which shew the necessity of one supreme jurisdiction, to which all the inferior may recur. As the constitutions of the several colonies are composed of different ingredients, they must, from the nature of things and their particular relations, remain dependent upon the mother-country or suffer a total amputation. No man entertained a contrary opinion, till the trumpet of sedition was lately blown. Acts of parliaments, restraining and regulating their trade have been passed, not only without the least doubt of their legality, but with the greatest applause. The navigation-act shut up their commerce with foreign nations, and made it centre in the bosom of that country, from which they derive their origin. Port duties, cramping and diminishing their trade, have been imposed without murmur; and regulations, such as the post, directly affecting their interior commerce, have been embraced with alacrity. Till of late, none entertained the most distant suspicion that they were not to be taxed, regulated, and bound by parliament; protection on the one side necessarily implying obedience on the other. Any corporation in England may claim the privilege of taxing itself as well as the colonies; for they are virtually, if not actually, represented as fully as the majority of Englishmen. A tenth of the people have no voice in elections. Every objection, therefore, drawn from this source is equally conclusive against the constitution. But such reasonings have but a sandy foundation; since a member chosen for a borough represents not only the constituents or inhabitants of that particular place, but the inhabitants of the whole kingdom. In the same manner that he represents London and all the commons of the island, he represents the colonies; and is in duty and conscience bound to consult their interest. The distinction of external and internal taxes is entirely false and groundless. If we have a right to lay the one, we must have the same to lay the other; since the effects of both are the same, and they differ only in the places of collection. A tax is like a pebble dropt into a lake, and making circle after circle, till the whole surface, from the centre to the circumference, is agitated; for nothing can be more evident, than that a tax laid upon tobacco, either in the ports of England or Virginia is as much a duty laid upon the inland plantations of Virginia, as if it were collected an hundred miles up the country, on the spot where the tobacco grows. Besides, were there no other argument, the unwarrantable proceedings of the colonists will justify any exertion of power; for they have absolutely forfeited their charters by appointing deputies to a general congress, which was only another name for an universal conspiracy against the dignity and legislative rights of Great Britain."

Those who embraced the opposite side of the question, among whom were Mr. Pitt and lord Camden, argued with more force as well as eloquence. "We acknowledge," said they, "that the constitution has been always in a fluctuating state, and that the earlier periods of our history are not without obscurity. But does it hence follow that we are to form no analogical reasonings upon them? Because we know not the whole, must we make no use of what we do know? Had our ancestors argued in this manner, and built their arguments upon the actual state of the constitution, they would have crouched beneath the rod of tyranny, when it happened to be shook over them, and would never have made a single effort to recover their just rights. We might now have groaned in vain beneath the yoke of despotism. This doctrine is equally pregnant with absurdity and mischief. Let the actual situation of affairs be ever so bad, we must not look up to our forefathers for precedents, because the struggles between privilege and prerogative prevented them from being regular and uniform. What, then! are there no general maxims, no principles congenial to the constitution, to guide our researches in this region, which you represent as obscure and perplexed? What is become of that unalienable right of a British subject, which secures him from being taxed or judged, but by the common consent of his peers? This is the first, the vital principle of our liberty, which is antecedent to all political charters; for it is the charter of human nature, and is inherent to all freemen. Nor can it be forfeited, even by slaves; they may resume it, whenever power reverts into their hands. Our great charter, the bill of rights, most of our writs for electing members, bear witness to this truth, without which, as a clue, our history cannot be unravelled. Can it then be conceived that the colonists did not emigrate with this right, which does not depend upon particular charters, but upon human nature? Their charters are only the exterior model of their constitution; but this undefeasible claim, this general right of a British subject is the great internal principle, or soul, by which it is actuated and invigorated. Such is the doctrine of Locke, Selden, and Harrington, men, whom we shall always be glad to find on our side. Those who would ridicule their authority, would do well to postpone their attacks till their names are become equally respectable. The people of this country have too much sense to be more influenced by titles and high station than by sense and argument. The case indeed is so plain and evident, that there is no occasion for their authority. What does it avail to observe, that one of the counties palatine was taxed for the space of fifty years, before it sent any members to parliament, since that right was at last confirmed; and proved more clearly than if it had never been contested, the justness of the claim? The rest of the counties palatine, as well as the marches of Wales, continued to be taxed by their own assemblies or parliaments, till they were at different periods melted down into our present form of parliamentary representation. The observations upon the representation of the clergy are equally insignificant. The bishops and abbots did not sit with the lords as deputies of the clergy; that idea is inconsistent with the nature and constitution of that house; they sat there, like the lay peers, by virtue of their baronies. And it is apparent, that the inferior clergy were not fully represented in the lower house, but in the convocation. Else how could they be excluded from that house, or allowed to tax their own body? Many entertain too high an idea of parliamentary authority, when they suppose it capable of effecting every thing. It must have the concurrence of the people to establish this omnipotence; else it would be arbitrary and uncontrolable; a power, as dangerous in a small body of men as in a single individual. This right of taxing themselves, which the colonists derive from the same source as the English, is one of these sacred points, which a parliament cannot without profanation touch. By this rule of right, the charters of the colonies are, like all other crown-grants, to be interpreted for the benefit, not the prejudice of the subject. These charters they accepted through mere necessity; and as it was not of their creation, they cannot be obligatory; the obligation ceasing with the necessity, which was its parent. But suppose them bound by these charters, they are only bound to that allegiance, which the supreme head of the realm may claim indiscriminately from all subjects. Being originally expelled out of their native country by civil and religious persecution, they settled their present abodes at their own risk and expence; all ties, therefore, except those common to all mankind, were dissolved between them and her; obedience and protection being reciprocal duties, they were absolved from the former, as she neglected the latter. What can be more absurd than that the legislature, which had not power to shield them from the violence of the crown, should claim from them that submission, which it would itself refuse to any other? When the people of Britain contended with tyrants, it could not be with a view of copying their usurpation. If liberty be the just right of those who have sense enough to know its value, and courage enough to undergo every danger and fatigue for its preservation or recovery, the Americans have a better claim to it than the English; since besides facing, in the wilds of America, enemies much more dreadful than any to be encountered by the friends of independence in the fields of Britain, they had not only renounced their native country, and all its tender endearments, so congenial to the human mind, but braved all the perils and hardships of a long voyage, and, after escaping the fury of winds and waves, run the risk of perishing on shore by a slow famine. If, in the first years of their existence, one of the colonies was guilty of some intemperate sallies, and all were exposed to enemies, which obliged them to request assistance from the English, that necessity was now superseded by their own internal strength. Whatever support they had received in their infancy from England, they must have received it from motives of humanity and fraternal affection, or with the view of being one day repaid; and not as the price of their liberty and independence. At least, the colonies cannot be supposed to have accepted it on any other terms; as slavery, to which they have such an unconquerable aversion in every shape, must have been doubly odious to them from the hands of a presumed, but insidious, friend. If the former were the motives, have they not always discovered the strongest gratitude? If the latter, have they not made ample returns by actual assistance, and by the balance accruing from the many restrictions laid on their trade? It is only owing to misinformation, that we lay to their charge the expence of the last war, which indeed took its rise in America, but was entirely a British quarrel, or rather a contention with France for empire. The Americans had no disputes with the French or Indians, either about the limits of Nova Scotia, or the territories on the Ohio. Till the defeat of Braddock they were never attacked, and the reason is evident; they are not concerned in the Indian trade; it is entirely carried on by British merchants, and with British manufactures. The colonists are chiefly farmers and planters: scarce any article which they raise is an object of commerce with the savages. So that the war, being commenced for the defence of territories belonging to no American, and for the protection of a trade purely British, had nothing American in it but the name and scene of action. Yet the different provinces contributed largely towards bringing it to a happy conclusion; and were as forward in their endeavours to render the British arms triumphant, as they were, when they sent 3000 men to assist in the expedition against Carthagena, and as they will always be, wherever the interest of the British empire is concerned. Their past conduct proves that they make no distinction of wars, but are willing to co-operate with the head of the empire as far as their power extends. Had the first inhabitants of the colonies renounced all connection with the mother-country, they might have renounced their original right by positive institution, but not that derived from nature. But as they emigrated under the authority of the crown, and with the national sanction, they quitted Britain, in possession of this great privilege, by virtue of both principles. As they fled, from the heavy hand of power, to climes which they hoped to find more friendly to their principles of civil and religious liberty, it has been universally received as law, that acts of parliament, and particularly those which specify any penalty, are not binding on the colonies, unless they are particularly named. The inhabitants of the colonies, once removed from the domestic legislation of Britain, are no more dependent on it in the general system than the Isle of Man is, or than, in the feudal system, many subordinate principalities were dependent on the jurisdiction of the lord paramount, to whom they owed only a limited obedience. We mean not, by what has been said, to deny Britain the right of laying external duties and restrictions on their commerce. To these they voluntarily submit, because they esteem them necessary to the trade carried on with us; and because the colonies of all the maritime powers in Europe stand in the same predicament. The duties of the post being solely calculated for their own interest, and an useful regulation rather than a tax, they have always encouraged on the same principle. But before real internal taxes can be justly imposed upon them by the supreme legislature, they must be represented in that assembly; an event, which the nature of things and the order of providence have rendered impracticable. Nothing can be weaker than to allege that they are virtually represented. The Americans cannot in that respect pretend to equal the Irish. Not to speak of the many Englishmen possessed of large estates and great places in Ireland, nor of their immediate descendants settled in that country, many Irish noblemen and gentlemen sit in both houses of parliament; and many more still reside in England. Yet, notwithstanding this virtual representation, the parliament has relinquished all claims of taxing Ireland. Why should America be treated with more indignity? Because they have hitherto submitted to laws enacted by the British parliament? They are no more affected by these precedents, than the English are by their tameness under the dictates of the Tudors, or the rod of the Stuarts. But the fact is, that they never did acquiesce in the parliament's right to tax them. The resolutions of the Virginian assemblies are clear and strong against the exercise of this arrogated power. Their protests may be seen in the journals of their house; and it is probable that, upon enquiry, similar acts may be found in the records of the other provinces. It is ridiculous to advance that they are like boroughs, which have only a right to make bye-laws, but are bound by all statutes. All boroughs have representatives; the colonies have none, and therefore cannot be bound by the acts of an assembly, of which they make no part. By the original constitution of their charters, indeed, their laws must not be inconsistent with those of England; but this circumstance gives the parliament no more authority over them, than as if they had lain under the same restraints with regard to the laws of Scotland, or of any other country. Equally futile is the objection drawn from their toleration of slavery. If they be judged on that account incapable of legislation, they will only be placed on a level with the antient Romans, Spartans, and other nations, who were the most renowned for wisdom and political knowledge. But had the parliament ever so good a right to tax the colonies, it has no right to impose taxes which are in their consequences attended with injustice and tyranny. By the stamp-act, the prosecutor may bring an action against the supposed delinquent in a court situated at one extremity of America, though the trespass was committed at the other extremity, at the distance perhaps of 2000 miles; and yet the defendant, though he should cast the plaintiff, is entitled to no damages, if the judge certifies that there was a probable foundation for the prosecution. Besides the judge has an evident interest in giving a verdict for the plaintiff, as he is allowed a large share of the penalties by way of commission. Was there ever an act so full of iniquity, so totally subversive of all law and justice! Could the most despotic tyrant expect that the most abject vassals would submit to such an humiliating yoke!"

NOTWITHSTANDING the force of these arguments, the right of taxation, in its fullest extent, was declared in both houses, without a division. The more sober and sensible part of the men who voted for this declaratory act, did not embrace that measure so much from any opinion of its future use in regular taxation, as from a sense of the evil consequences which would flow from the contrary doctrine. They saw that the general reasonings employed against that power gave a rude shock to our whole legislative right; and they imagined that it could not be yielded to any arguments without a virtual surrender of all our authority. "If," said they, "this particular power of levying money in the colonies be not retained in our hands, as a sacred trust, to be used, not in the first instance for supply, but in the last exigence for control, it is obvious that the presiding authority of Great Britain, as the head, the arbitress, and directress of the whole empire, must vanish into an empty name, without energy or operation; all unity and subordination will be at an end; if the power be habitually exercised, no trace of freedom can remain to America." A great people, whose property is in all cases, and without reserve, at the disposal of another people, at an immense distance, can never be persuaded that they live in the enjoyment of freedom. It will be no easy matter to shew to men in such a state, which of the usual parts of the definition or description of a free people is applicable to them; and it is neither wise nor pleasant to attempt to prove, that they have no right to be comprehended in such a description. Whether all this be reconcilable to legal speculation is a matter of little moment. It is reconciled in policy; and politics ought to be adjusted, not to human reasoning, but to human nature; of which the reason is but a part, and by no means the greatest part.

THE grand committee, which had brought in the resolution, on which the foregoing bill was grounded, had also passed another for the repeal of the stamp act.

BUT the opposition, far from being discouraged, seemed to gather new strength from the late act. So many instances of the inexpediency of taxing the Americans had already occurred, that the question was hardly controvertible. They changed therefore their ground, and founded their defence upon the bill for securing the dependency of the colonies. According to them, "the total repeal of the stamp-act, while such an outrageous resistance continued, would not only lessen our authority, but render it contemptible. Such submission of the supreme legislature to subordinate provincial assemblies, established only by prerogative, which had no such powers to bestow, will discover so much weakness and timidity, as will necessarily breed fresh insults, and produce in the end a total separation. The power of taxation is the most essential branch of all authority; and it cannot be equally extended to all the members of the state, in proportion to their respective abilities. Suffer a part to remain exempted from a share of those burdens, which the public exigencies require to be imposed on the whole, and you destroy by your partiality that confidence, on which all government should be founded. It is in vain that you assert the inability of the colonists to comply with the terms of the stamp-act. The state of their finances overturns your argument. Of the debt contracted in the last war, they have in three years payed off £1,755,000, and the remaining £763,000 will be discharged in the course of two years more. What other proofs are wanting to shew that they are able, though not willing, to ease the mother-country of her heavy burdens? Nothing could be more fatal to the colonies than the parliament's renunciation of its authority, which from long usage has become constitutional; a total dissolution of government would ensue. It is easy to foresee, that from the discordant heterogeneous principles, of which their different governments are composed, there would be no end of feuds and factions, when there existed no power of sufficient force or authority to terminate their mutual differences. A new form of government, or subjection to a foreign yoke, must be the necessary consequence. At any rate they will have reason to lament the hour, in which they renounced their dependence on parliament, whose authority has hitherto rendered their own governments extremely mild to the subject, and at the same time secured them from the heavy hand of the executive power, which, in consequence of this new plan, will find it an easy matter to turn the arms of one province against another, and, in the end, to involve them all in the same general slavery."

THE ministry argued with more force and conviction. "We have," said they, "sufficiently provided for the honour, dignity, and superiority of Britain, by the declaratory act, which has secured it from the least imputation of weakness or timidity, and consequently from any fresh insults, excited by the insolence of success. We readily admit the propriety of levying on the whole empire a proportionable share of the general expence: but the heavy debt contracted by the Americans, in the course of the war, demonstrates that they have not been wanting in that point. The act of parliament, by which part of their disbursements has been since refunded, unanswerably proves, that you were of opinion that they had contributed beyond their abilities. As to any dangers arising from their various governments, and the want of an umpire to settle their differences, they will trust to their own wisdom and prowess rather than submit to a master. Hitherto they have had little occasion to apply to an intermediate power. Having weathered the storm in their infancy, can you expect to persuade them that they will not prove equally successful in their manhood? This remarkable interposition of parliament in their concerns has not impressed on their minds the most favourable ideas of its justice or wisdom. Their disobedience to this act is universal. Nothing, therefore, but a strong military as well as naval force, can reduce the seditious to reason. Nor will it be sufficient to send it to one place; every province of America must be traversed and subdued. Were such a measure embraced, little doubt can be entertained of success. A year or two, at most, would complete the conquest, And if the question was about reducing a foreign nation, a case in which every successful stroke would add to our power, and take from that of a rival, a just war, with such undisputed superiority, would certainly be an adviseable undertaking. But four millions of debt, due to our merchants from the Americans, the total cessation of a trade annually worth four millions more, a large foreign traffic, much home manufacture, a very capital revenue, arising immediately from colony imports, and indeed the produce of all our revenues materially depending on the same cause; all these circumstances accumulated, are very weighty considerations, at least well to be weighed, before we draw that sword, which even by its victories must produce all the pernicious effects of the greatest national defeats. How public credit must suffer in such a crisis, needs not be told. If the condition of the nation, at the close of the last foreign war, was so deplorable as you represent it, this civil war will be found a bad couch, on which to repose our wearied virtue. Far from being able to enter into new plans of œconomy, we must launch into a new, a boundless sea of expence. Such an addition of debt, with such a diminution of trade and revenue, will leave us in no want of your dolorous lamentations, to aggravate the picture of our distresses. Our trade at this moment feels these mischiefs to its vitals; and we ought to sympathise with the feelings of the whole body of our merchants and manufacturers, whose numerous petitions uniformly declare that their trade is entirely at a stand, and that it will be totally ruined, if this obnoxious act be not repealed. Will any wise senator laugh at their universal alarm, as an ill-grounded or a pretended panic? No; he must allow great weight to their unanimous opinion, in every commercial question; nor will he slight their advice in points relating to the revenue. Nothing is more quickly or more deeply affected by the taxes than trade; and if an American tax afforded any real relief to England, no part of the community would be sooner, or more materially, relieved by it than our merchants. But they well know that our trade is more burdened by one penny raised in America, than by three in England; and more than by ten, if that penny be raised with the confusion, murmurs, and discontents of America. The colonies were evidently founded in subservience to our commerce. Hence the whole system of our laws concerning them is a system of restrictions. We have established a double monopoly, a monopoly of their whole import, which must be all from Great Britain; and a monopoly of their whole export, which, as far as it can be of any service to us, must be no where but to Great Britain. On the same principle it was contrived that they should send us all their products raw and in their first state, and that they should receive all our goods in the last stage of manufacture. Can such a people be deemed a just object of taxation or revenue? The original purpose of their foundation must first be eluded; every restrictive trade-law must first have become useless and ineffectual. The Americans are rather factors and servants to this island than subjects, who, being on an equal footing, should bear an equal share of public burdens. They are always in debt to our merchants, because the balance of trade, and consequently the course of exchange, is vastly against them. They have therefore much of the merchants' money to trade with as a capital. They are entrusted with many talents, and they do not hide them in a napkin; they return them ten-fold. Are they not then to be considered as labourers to our merchants; as tributaries to this kingdom? In this light they have always appeared to every man conversant in commerce; and there are the surest grounds for concluding, that the greater the sums are, with which they are entrusted by our merchants, for improving their plantations and staple commodities, the greater will be the advantages which will accrue to this nation. What then can be more impolitic than to levy, by an internal tax, in the laying of which we are, through our ignorance and distance, liable to commit so many mistakes and oppressions, what must finally centre amongst us by the nature of our commerce? Though the American seas are covered with ships, it is with our ships, our sailors, our merchandise. They all labour for us; we are the masters, they the servants; and the principal share of the profit remains in our hands. We have every thing but the peculium, without which even slaves will not work. What then shall we say to those reasonings which infer, from the many restraints under which we have already laid the colonists, that they are to be subjected to all manner of restraints? True policy and a little prudence would have taught us, that we ought rather to compensate so many restraints by every indulgence not incompatible with our interest. We have the management of a great empire, composed of a vast mass of heterogeneous governments, all more or less free and popular in their forms, all to be kept in peace and out of conspiracy with one another, and in subordination to this country; while the whole is pervaded by the spirit of an extensive and intricate trading interest, always qualifying and often controling every general idea of constitution and government. It is a great and difficult object; heaven grant that we may have wisdom and temper enough to manage it as we ought. Its importance is infinite. Sixty-two years ago our whole trade to the plantations exceeded but a few pounds, in exports, that which we now carry on with the single island of Jamaica, and fell a third short of it in the value of the imports. Our dealings with most of the European nations is but little increased; these nations have since that time remained pretty much at a stand, and we have rivals in their trade. Our intercourse with the colonies is a new world of commerce, which we have in a manner created. It is grown up to this magnitude within the memory of man; its parallel cannot be found in history, and it stands upon principles of its own; principles, that ought not to be sacrificed to any little consideration of extorted revenue; much less to a revenue like this, which is more speculative than real, which is better calculated for enriching a swarm of ministerial creatures than for replenishing the treasury. The vast extent of the country, and the many temptations thence arising to smuggling, must render such a number of collectors necessary, that, after they are paid, hardly the value of a pepper-corn will reach the exchequer. And what is worse, ten times the amount of the tax will be raised on the Americans; as the great distance of the distributors of stamps will often oblige them to take a journey, which will cost them four or five pounds, that the treasury may gain six-pence. Do you recollect that the subjects of this imposition are the descendants of Englishmen; men of a high and free spirit, whom it will neither be wise, nor long practicable, to keep under a government made up of nothing but restraints, penalties, and taxes, in the establishing of which they have no share? People must be ruled in a manner agreeable to their temper and disposition; and above all people of a free and independent character. The British colonist must see something, which will distinguish him from the colonists of other nations. Will he therefore submit without murmur to a tax, which, if not unconstitutional, is at least impolitic? He must have been sensible that he payed before his full quota of public burdens. Where is the necessary or convenience of life, which he did not receive from this island? Did he not therefore pay every tax, with which these necessaries and conveniences are loaded? Nothing is more evident. Not a single manufacture, not a single article of commerce enters an American port, without being charged with all our taxes; for the suppression of manufactures in that country comprises every species of taxes in one, and makes the colonists in reality the supporters of a large share of our public burdens. But what do we say? The suppression of manufactures in that country? Alas! that was once the case, but is now so no more. There was a time, when the colonies and this island laboured mutually for each other, and pursued these objects, for which they were severally fitted by their situation and respective improvements. Now, thanks be to the late ministry for it, they are striving to undo each other, and are in a state of open rivalry. It is not the fault of the same senators, if they are not soon in a state of open enmity and hostility. The evident tendency of their speeches is to hurry us into rash and violent councils. But it is to be hoped that we have more wisdom, more knowledge than to widen those breaches which they have made, or to render incurable those wounds which their folly and their wickedness have inflicted. These names are due to the treachery with which they withheld from our view all dispatches, all remonstrances from America against passing the act, as they rendered by these means the wisdom of parliament as improvident as their own temerity. They are due to their obstinate perseverance in error; as they would urge us to chastise, as rebellion, that despair which is totally owing to their own blindness and precipitance."

In consequence of these arguments, the stamp-act was repealed, by a majority of 276 to 167, and some time afterwards a bill was passed to indemnify those who had incurred the stipulated penalties. In order still more fully to gratify the wishes, and restore the tranquillity of the nation, the cyder-act was repealed; general warrants and the seizure of papers were declared to be illegal; and many important regulations were established, with respect to the general system of our commerce with the colonies. A treaty was concluded with Russia, very advantageous to the English merchants. The ministers adjusted, to the satisfaction of the owners, the dispute respecting the Canada bills, due to our merchants by the French government. They procured an act for restraining the importation of foreign silks, thus exciting the gratitude of the British manufacturers; and promoted many other acts conducive to the general welfare of the community. Yet the administration, with all its merits, was unable to acquire security or stability. The Whigs who had not been included in the dispensation of offices, and the friends of the prerogative, who acquiesced in the ascendancy of lord Bute, were equally opposed to the continuance of their power. The lord chancellor Northington, being consulted on a sketch of a constitution for the government of Canada, framed by Mr. Burke, not only condemned it, in the most unqualified terms, but represented the ministers, to his majesty, as totally inexperienced in business, and unfit for office. His opinion accorded with the wishes of the king, and measures were adopted for the arrangement of a new administration.

Overtures were proffered by lord Bute, for a coalition between the court party and lord Temple, which that nobleman positively rejected. Advances were then made to Mr. Pitt, and he was offered a carte blanche for the state appointments. Mr. Pitt acceded to this proposal, taking the place of privy-seal, which was to be accompanied by an earldom to himself, while the earl of Temple was designed to fill that of first lord of the treasury. The latter, finding, from a formal interview, that, while he was to have the most responsible station, Mr. Pitt was to retain the uncontrolled administration of affairs, left the conference in disgust. Mr. Pitt next made overtures to several persons, whose influence might have compensated the loss of earl Temple, but with such an air of conscious superiority, as prevented their acceptance. At length, the duke of Grafton, who had been secretary of state in the marquis of Rockingham's administration, was made first lord of the treasury; and general Conway, another member of the Whig party, was continued secretary of state. His colleague was the earl of Shelburne, a nobleman of considerable abilities, a zealous admirer of Mr. Pitt, and possessing a great extent of literary and political information. Mr. Charles Townsend was appointed chancellor of the exchequer; lord chief justice Pratt, created lord Camden, was made chancellor; his predecessor, the earl of Worthington, was made president of the council; and Mr. Pitt himself took the privy-seal. His acceptance of the title of earl of Chatham, with a pension, and his apparent partiality in these appointments to individuals, acceptable in the eyes of the favourite, undermined the popularity of that illustrious statesman. Yet his age might justify a retreat from the active business of state to the more tranquil exercise of his influence in the upper house; his services demanded remuneration, and a just regard to the interests of his family induced him to accept it. His selection, indeed, of the members which composed his ministry was unfortunate for his country and himself. The countenance of the favourite rendered the individuals of his election superior to his influence. A victim to chagrin and regret, he proved by his own example how necessary are moderation in prosperity, and the milder graces of life to the satisfactory enjoyment of splendid talents. The conflict of his passions exasperated the violence of his gout, and brought him to the brink of the grave.

The weakness and incapacity of the administration, no longer guided by his powerful intellect, was soon exhibited in repeated changes and disputes. To conciliate the friendship of the duke of Newcastle, who was united with the marquis of Buckingham, in opposition to the court, lord Edgecombe was dismissed from the office of treasurer of the household, and Mr. Shelly, his grace's near relative, appointed his successor. The expedient exciting the resentment of lord Edgecombe and his friends, the duke of Portland and several other individuals immediately resigned. Sir Edward Hawke was appointed first lord of the admiralty; lord Le Despencer was made post-master; and Mr. Jenkinson, the earl's private secretary, was introduced to the admiralty board.

Soon after the formation of the new ministry, several tumults were occasioned by the distresses of the poor, from the high price of provisions; many lives were lost, and the magistrates were at length obliged to call in the military to the aid of the civil power. On the 11th of September, a proclamation was issued against forestallers, secreters, and engrossers of corn; and, as the price of wheat continued to increase, another proclamation was issued on the 26th, prohibiting the exportation of grain, and laying an embargo on all ships outward bound, and laden with corn. A law was enacted, by which the governor, council, and assembly of New York were prohibited from passing any act, till they had in every respect complied with the requisition of parliament, by supplying the British troops with necessaries in their quarters, conformable to an act of the last session; to which the inhabitants of the country had determined to pay no obedience. At the rising of parliament, lord Chatham relinquished all public business; and the ministry were further weakened by the death of Mr. Townsend in the month of September. He was succeeded in the chancellorship of the exchequer by lord North, and soon after a coalition was effected with the Bedford party, in consequence of which earl Gower was appointed president of the council. The earl of Hillsborough was made secretary of state; and lord Weymouth secretary for the American plantations; an office lately created. 1766. 1767.

In the course of the session, the affairs of the East India company had occupied the sedulous attention of the government. The wealth and revenue of the company had been much extended by the treaty concluded with the great mogul, which constituted the company his duans, or receivers of his revenue, in the provinces of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa. It was naturally expected, therefore, that as our Indian possessions had so much increased in value, there would be a proportionable rise in the dividends. The proprietors solicited the directors to declare an increase of the dividend, now payable at only 6 per cent.; and, on their refusal, proceeded to vote to that effect by a great majority. When the affairs of the company were brought before the house, several members, and among them lord Chatham, denied the right of the company to have territorial possessions, as they were not conveyed by their charters, and were totally foreign to the nature and object of a trading corporation. The supporters of the opposite opinion denied that the charter restricted its holders from acquiring territory. After many debates and representations, the company engaged to pay to government £400,000 yearly, for two years, by half-yearly payments; during which time the territory and revenues, lately obtained, were to continue in the hands of the present possessors; but if they should be deprived of any of them by a foreign power, a proportionable abatement was to be made in the annual payments. The company having held a general court on the 16th of May, the half-yearly dividend was declared to be 6¼, being one fourth more than that of the preceding half-year. The ministry, understanding this design, sent an intimation, advising the company not to increase their dividend till their affairs should be examined; but finding that the communication was disregarded, a bill was brought in to rescind the resolutions of the general court, till some security should be obtained for the fulfilment of the company's engagements with the state.

The parliament was dissolved in the spring of the succeeding year, and writs were issued for the election of a new one. The influence of Indian wealth was never more shamelessly and strikingly displayed than in the scenes of bribery and corruption which universally occurred. The public interest and anxiety were divided between the progress and results of the election, and the proceedings in the case of Wilkes. He returned home at this period, notwithstanding his outlawry remained in force, and offered himself a candidate for the county of Middlesex. Availing himself of the marquis of Rockingham's appointment to the treasury, he attempted a reconciliation with the government, through the medium of Mr. Burke, but his concessions were not such as could be expected. His application to the duke of Grafton, with whom he had lived in habits of familiar intercourse, and upon whom he had conferred many obligations, was equally unsuccessful. Incensed at this contemptuous treatment, he became the bitter enemy of that nobleman, and gratified his revenge by a severe and sarcastic exposition of his character and habits. An exile from his country, destitute of personal respectability, notorious for his licentiousness and dishonesty, surrounded by clamorous and defrauded creditors, the people so far forgot his personal frailties, in the ardour of their enthusiasm for the cause of liberty, that notwithstanding his defeat in the city of London, he offered himself to the county of Middlesex, and was returned by a great majority. Every indication of attachment was displayed on the part of the populace; and their enthusiasm was increased by the reversal of his outlawry. But the two verdicts against him, on his trials for the circulation of libel, were affirmed, and he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment, to pay a fine of £1000, and to find security for his good behaviour for seven years. He was rescued as the civil officers were conducting him to prison; but he prudently surrendered himself to the marshal of the king's bench. Though a body of guards were stationed in the approaches to his apartments, no disturbance occurred till the 10th of May, the day on which the new parliament was summoned. On that day great numbers of people crowded about the gates of the king's bench, expecting to see their favourite proceed to the house of commons, and intending to conduct him in triumph. After waiting for some time, they became clamorous, which some of the magistrates construed into a riot, and embraced the opportunity of reading the riot act. This proceeding, scarcely justified by the occasion, exasperated the resentment of a multitude already inflamed with resentment. Stones and brick-bats were thrown at the justices as they read the act; and the soldiers in their turn became enraged. Some of them singled out a supposed offender, and pursued him to a considerable distance; but, in his stead, shot dead a young man of the name of Allen, in his father's cow-house, at the very instant he was supplicating for mercy. A circumstance, apparently so atrocious, alarmed the neighbourhood, which, prompted by curiosity, crowded to enquire into the cause of such barbarity. The Surry justices, supposing their authority to be despised, directed the soldiers to fire upon the people, of whom above twenty were killed or wounded. The friends of Mr. Wilkes were deeply offended at the thanks which were returned, in the name of the king, to the detachments employed on this melancholy occasion. Soon after the commencement of the session, Wilkes was charged, by lord Weymouth, in the upper house, with a breach of privilege, in publishing a libellous preface to the letter of his lordship, addressed to the chairman of the Surry quarter-sessions. Lord Barrington, in the lower house, immediately moved, that on this ground alone he should be expelled, and his motion was carried by a large majority.

The electors of Middlesex had been called upon to make another choice in the room of Cooke, who did not long survive his return as the colleague of Wilkes. Sir Edward Beauchamp Proctor, an unsuccessful candidate at the former election, resolved to try his fortune once more. The turbulence and violence of the people were commensurate with the arts employed to inflame their imaginations, and to confirm their prejudices. They assaulted and endangered the inferior officers of justice, and all who endeavoured to repress the atrocities of popular outrage. Bludgeon-men were actively employed on all sides; and, in one of the tremendous scuffles to which the drunkenness, the misplaced enthusiasm, and the involuntary irritation of the populace gave rise, a person named Clarke was unfortunately killed. Two of the supposed assassins were apprehended, indicted, convicted, and condemned to be hanged for murder. Such, however, was the prevalence of the popular fury, that the verdict of a jury of surgeons reported, that it did not appear to them that the deceased person had died by the blows which he received. In consequence of their representation, a doubt arose in the royal breast respecting the guilt of the convicts, who received a free pardon; a circumstance which excited the real or pretended suspicion of the opponents of government, though no satisfactory reason can be advanced, why the friends of the sovereign should not possess the same claims upon his mercy with the enemies of his throne, and the opponents of the government.

On the expulsion of Wilkes, he was again elected, and was again expelled. The determination of the county of Middlesex was now so well ascertained to be decidedly in his favour, that at first no gentleman could be found to oppose the idol of the people. Mr. Wilkes was therefore elected without opposition; but the election being declared void, at the instigation of the ministry, colonel Luttrel, son of lord Irnham, offered himself a candidate. A few dependants of the court gave him their votes, but Wilkes was re-elected by a majority of 1143 to 296. Notwithstanding this result, a resolution was passed in the house of commons, that Mr. Luttrel ought to have been returned a knight of the shire for the county of Middlesex, and the return was amended by erasing the name of Mr. Wilkes, and replacing it with that of his competitor. A petition of the freeholders being presented against this proceeding, the merits of the case were warmly and elaborately discussed. The speeches of the ministry were more distinguished by sophistry, than by sagacity or justice. "Those," said they, "who enquire whether a smaller number of legal votes can elect a representative in opposition to a greater, must from every tongue receive the same language; they must be answered in the negative. The question, therefore, must be, whether a smaller number of legal votes shall not prevail against a greater number of votes not legal; and here it is to be considered, that those votes only are legal, which are legally given; and that those only are legally given, which are given for a legal candidate. Nothing then remains to be determined, but whether a man expelled can be so disqualified by a vote of the house, that he shall be no longer eligible by lawful electors. Now here it is evident, that the expulsion infers exclusion or disability. For the expulsion and the writ happened in the same session; and, since the house is by the law of parliament bound for the session by a vote once passed, the expelled member cannot be admitted. He that cannot be admitted, cannot be elected; and the votes given to a man ineligible, being given in vain, the highest number for an eligible candidate becomes the majority. The disability is no more than what was included in the expulsion; it is only a declaration of the house, that they will no longer permit him, whom they thus censure, to sit in parliament; a declaration made in consequence of that right, which they necessarily possess, of regulating their own house, and of inflicting punishment on their own delinquents. They have therefore no other way of enforcing the sentence of incapacity, but that of adhering it. They cannot otherwise punish the candidate so disqualified for offering himself, nor the electors for accepting him. But if he has any competitor, that competitor must prevail; and if he has none, his election will be void, for the right of the house to reject annihilates, with regard to the man so rejected, the right of electing. The vote of the commons has so far the force of law, as that force is necessary to preserve the vote from losing its efficacy. If they had only the power of dismissing for a few days the man, whom his constituents can immediately send back; if they can expel but cannot exclude, they have but a nominal authority without virtue or energy, and perhaps it may be never obeyed. The representatives of our ancestors entertained a very different opinion; they fined and imprisoned their members; on great provocation they disabled them for ever; and this power is maintained by Selden himself. Why should not the commons have the same authority over their members, which the upper house claims over the peers? They expelled Bacon and Macclesfield from their assembly, and excluded them for ever from re-assuming their seat. Have not we a just right to exclude for seven years, when they can exclude for life? It is surprising how any friend to the people can thus propose to abridge our privileges, which are in fact the privileges of the people; since, the more important we become, the more importance they must acquire in the state, the constituents and their delegates being virtually the same. He who would divide them, must be an enemy to the constitution, which warrants incapacitation as well as expulsion; precedents and the law of parliament declaring in our favour."

"It is true," said the opposition, "that those, who would effect a breach between the commons and the people, are enemies to the constitution. But those, who would invade the rights of the people, are guilty of this crime, not those who would preserve them. Nor shall we deny, that the constituents and their representatives are the same, and that the importance of the one increases that of the other; but we must observe, that can only be the case, when they pursue the same interest. Nothing can be more futile than to pretend, that an expelled member cannot be admitted, because the house is bound for the session by a vote once passed. Those expelled by act of parliament, for accepting places, are admitted; and the journals of the house prove, that members expelled for other reasons have sat in the same session. Besides a member does not sit in consequence of a vote, but of his election. It is not the act of the commons, but of the constituents, which creates his right. Their vote, therefore, is not at all concerned in the question. This reasoning, which is in fact begging the question, is as absurd and ridiculous as that which says, that the right of the house to reject, annihilates, with regard to the person so rejected, the right of electing. It would be more rational, as well as constitutional, to assert, that the right of the freeholders to elect, annihilates, with regard to the person so elected, the right of rejecting. When was it ever heard, that the house of lords rejected a peer elected by the sovereign? How then can the commons pretend to reject a representative chosen by the people, the proper electors? In order to overthrow the whole of this new-fangled doctrine, we need no other arguments but those furnished by the common law. The freeholders, as such, are prior in existence to either house, being antiently the assessors of the barons, and having a right to a vote in the great national assemblies. Their rights, therefore, are coeval with the constitution, and cannot by any power be taken away without their own consent, nor indeed even by that, as the act of the father would not be binding on the son, and could not deprive him of unalienable property. The commons, indeed, are the representatives of the people, and transact for them what they managed formerly in person. But the commons cannot shew that they have been entrusted with the right of choosing representatives, much less of rejecting them, when chosen by the constituents. Could they even point out any period, at which they exercised, or were allowed, such a privilege, no inference could be drawn from it to the prejudice of the people, who have an undoubted right to overturn every pernicious precedent. What, then! say you, are not the customs, precedents, and decisions of every court a law? Never; it is not a course of precedents and decisions, that constitutes any thing a law; but the just grounds, the rational principles upon which it is founded. One would have thought the fate of general warrants might have settled this point, and deterred every class of men from building on so sandy a foundation. If then an uniform course of precedents be not sufficient to establish a law, how much less will that effect be produced by a series of the most fluctuating, absurd, and contradictory precedents, that the world ever saw; precedents, which became such a shame and reproach to the commons, that, in order to extricate them from an inextricable labyrinth, an act was found necessary to set aside all their decisions relative to any election but the last. No man of sense ever calls in precedents to his assistance in any argument, but as comments and explanations. Being only declarations of other fallible men's opinions, they must ever give way to principles; and were the commons governed more by principle, and less by party rage, personal animosity, and interested views, they would not be so ready to have recourse to engines, which may be applied to any purpose, to the destruction as well as to the improvement of the constitution; engines, which, like a two-edged sword, cut either way, and may be twisted and turned, like a nose of wax. What then becomes of the law of parliament, which is founded on precedent? Must it be annihilated? No; but it must never stand in competition with the common law, which is prior and paramount to it, which is a law to parliament, and as binding upon it in a judicial capacity as upon the lowest court in the kingdom. By this law no subject can be disfranchised, but by an act of the three estates of the realm; nor can even they disfranchise such a body as the electors of Middlesex, because, as we have shewn, such an act would be a subversion of the constitution, and a dissolution of government. Many authorities have been produced to prove the exclusive jurisdiction of the commons in determining the rights and qualifications both of the electors and the elected. But suppose this jurisdiction allowed in its fullest extent, what inference can be drawn from it to establish their right to create an incapacity? None; it only establishes their right of determining these points according to law, the estate and birthright of the people. Various classes of men are said to be disqualified by the sole votes of the commons; and these votes are alleged as proofs of their disqualifying power. Nothing can be worse founded than this allegation; an examination of all the cases, upon which it is built, will shew, that all the resolutions, which give the least colour to the argument, were grounded on the principles of the constitution, and derived all their efficacy from that source; so that they were nothing more than declarations of what before was law, and therefore of more or less authority, as they were more or less sanctioned by that supreme rule. In the present case, Mr. Wilkes is adjudged incapable of being elected. But how is he incapable? Not by any legal disability, not by any law prio to his expulsion; but by a vote of the commons, by the very act of expulsion. Is then a vote of the commons equivalent to a law? No; far be such blasphemy from every senator's mouth; and, were it so, it could not supersede the most sacred law of the land; it could not disfranchise a subject, and in him the whole people of England. But perhaps the word expulsion implies, that an expelled person shall never become again a member of the same parliament? Strange magic this, in a word, indeed! May not any relation, though dissolved, revive again in the same manner that it was at first created? The masters of a school, the governors of a college or club, have the power of admission, and therefore of constituting, dissolving, and renewing the relation of the members. The commons do not stand in the same predicament; they do not make themselves, and therefore cannot create a member. That power the electors possess; and, as it is by their election that the relation is at first created, so by the same process may it, after cessation or dissolution, be revived. Thus, upon a false return, or void election, a member is really and substantially expelled. Yet he may be re-chosen, and so may one ejected for accepting a place. What clearer proof can be desired, that expulsion does not imply a total and perpetual exclusion from the expelling parliament? An arbitrary Tory-parliament first broached this idea of incapacity resulting from expulsion. A doctrine propagated by such a class of men deserves the patronage of our present ministers, who are their avowed disciples. Yet even these tyrannical despots did not proceed so far as our modern race of dictators; they did not vote Taylor chosen upon the exclusion of Walpole. Their principles indeed led them to this step; but they durst not venture their brittle bark on such a dangerous rock; they foresaw it must split on such novel, such unconstitutional ground. Without the gift of prophecy, one may safely aver, that our present adventurers will be wrecked on the same shelves. But to what purpose do they produce Walpole's case to authorise the late decision? It has the same weight as a determination of the star-chamber would have in a case relating to the liberty of the press. It is not one or two precedents, even in good times, without principles; much less precedents contrary to principles, and in bad times, that will establish a law. Many reasons might be urged against all expulsions. If they are necessary to one house, why not to the other? The lords have sustained no great loss from the want of this privilege; much less would the commons, whom the next election will in all probability free of any member that is justly obnoxious. As every representative is, with regard to his election and seat, independent of the rest, he ought to be liable to no other expulsion but a recal from his constituents. As long as he pleases them, he ought to please his fellows. But as custom has established the right of expulsion, let it, for God's sake, be confined to its antient limits, that the representative assembly may not be garbled and stript of its most valuable members, according to the dictate of an arbitrary minister or tyrannical king. If the house has a right to incapacitate one man, it has the same right to incapacitate two, three, or any number; that is, it can disfranchise all the electors of England; it, that cannot make a law to deprive the meanest subject of the lowest right, can take from the whole nation its noblest inheritance, the very foundation of all its rights! No such power was, or could be delegated to it; and as it did not make itself, it cannot make its own power. Where then is there any foundation left for this strange claim? Shall it be said, that the end of expulsion cannot be answered but by perpetual exclusion? The suggestion is true, were the satisfaction of the rage and malice of a majority the only end intended. But that is not the case. The only rational ends are to secure to the constituents a proper representation, to preserve the purity of the house, and to punish offending members, for the preservation of order and the prevention of crimes. But is incapacity necessary for these purposes? No; the first end is fully obtained by simple expulsion, without incapacity, because it gives the opportunity of a new choice to the constituents, who ought to have the power of affirming or reversing the sentence of the representatives, as a proper check upon their interested views or intemperate zeal. Had it not been for this circumstance of giving the people a new election, it may be questioned, whether the commons would ever have numbered the power of expulsion among their rights. Certain it is, that they could never have formed the least pretensions to it, if the right of recalling deputies had been exercised, as the nature of the service requires. The constituents are the best, and indeed the only judges of the qualifications necessary in their representatives; their decision, therefore, ought to be ultimate, and subject to no appeal. The contrary doctrine is pregnant with the highest arrogance and presumption, as it treats the people of England like minors, who are incapable of appointing their own guardians. As to the third end, the preservation of the purity of this immaculate house, it will not be saying too much if we assert, that the laws of the land are sufficient. If any extraordinary case should occur, we may, as in former times, impeach. The lords have no other power in their hands, for this purpose, but the laws, which have hitherto preserved them from any signal disgrace. Are not we equally capable of employing the same engine? The third end, which is punishment, is sufficiently answered by expulsion. If the disgrace which ensues be not thought an adequate punishment, we presume the majority will allow the expence of a second election is so. For what other reason are they so violent against a dissolution? It is to be hoped they are not afraid of losing their wages. If the member be re-elected without expence, and incur no disgrace, it is no great sign in favour of the expulsion; there is reason to suspect its justice and expediency. Supposing both equally fallible, it is much more rational to allow the judgment of the electors to prevail, than that of the commons, as the former must know their own affairs best, and the latter are in these points too often influenced by private views and ministerial arts. "But shall they be at liberty to restore, who had no power to expel?" The answer is, Shall they be at liberty to expel, who have no power to restore nor to create? The question is convertible; and there is no absurdity in saying that they, who ought to have the right of recalling, ought also to have the power of expelling.

"But suppose the people, not their deputies, convened, may not a member, by indecorum, treachery, or immorality, forfeit his right to a seat in their assembly; and are not the majority the sole judges of his fitness to continue a member? If they judge him unfit, can he regain his seat against the sense of the majority?" In answer, Suppose the freeholders of Middlesex assembled to choose a representative, can they exclude a single member from voting? No; he holds his freehold independent of them, and can be disfranchised only by law. "Admit then, that incapacity was not a necessary consequence of the expulsion; yet the express declaration of incapacity, by the resolution, was binding on the electors." Excellent logic this! Though the house could not, in the first instance, make a resolution equivalent to a law of incapacity, they could declare it such in the second instance; justifying in this case the old proverb, which says, that two blows are better than one. I suppose we shall bye and bye hear of two acts of parliament being necessary on every occasion; one to lay the foundation, another to declare the meaning. Thus, though the house cannot make the law, it can declare it; and whatever it declares to be law, is law, because there is no appeal from its jurisdiction. At this rate, were the house to resolve that London has no right to send four members to parliament, and then to declare that this was law, it must be so. Precedents and decisions would be no longer necessary; a resolution and declaration would do every thing. What an absurd and monstrous doctrine! Such a judicature would be a basilisk to kill the law, whenever it should dare to look it in the face. But you will find yourselves mistaken, if you think that there is no appeal from your jurisdiction. You, and every other court, are answerable to the people of England, who will not tamely see their rights invaded, nor their understandings mocked, by evasions and subterfuges. They may be called, if you will, low mechanics, sturdy beggars, and the scum of the earth; but, let their name be what it will, if the gauntlet be once thrown, they will decide the fortune of the field. That matters may not be carried to this extremity, no wise, no good, no honest man will vote for this expulsion."

NOTWITHSTANDING the force of these arguments, and the perseverance of the freeholders of Middlesex, in presenting their petitions, the house agreed in a vote, importing that they could not, according to the law of parliament, reverse in the same session a resolution that had once been passed. The dissatisfaction excited by this resolution was exasperated by the apparent remissness of the government, in permitting the French, partly by intrigue and partly by force, to obtain possession of Corsica, notwithstanding the gallant exertions of Paoli, and the resistance of the people. Yet it may be reasonably doubted, whether the value of that possession was equal to the expence of blood and treasure squandered in its conquest, and whether the people of Corsica were either sincerely desirous of liberty, or capable of enjoying it.

ONE of the first acts of lord North was the bringing in a bill for the repeal of so much of a late act of parliament as related to the imposition of a duty on paper, painter's colours, and glass, imported into America. The tax upon tea, which was imposed by the same act, was still continued. It was insisted on, by those members who had uniformly opposed the imposition of internal taxes on America, that the act which imposed these duties should be at once totally repealed. To this proposal the minister replied, that the conduct of the Americans had been too violent and disaffected to deserve any additional demonstrations of tenderness and forbearance. The object of the minister was not the mere increase of the revenue, but by the most secret and apparently unimportant steps, to obliterate from the minds of the Americans the antipathy they had conceived against internal taxation; and in effecting this, an essential service was meant to be rendered to the East India company, who sensibly felt the diminution of their exports to America. In the year 1768, they had exported to the continent teas to the value of £130,000; in the next year their exports declined to £44,000, and they continued to decrease in the same rapid manner. The company paid a duty of 25 per cent. on their exported teas, which greatly enhanced the price at a foreign market, and enabled the Dutch to supply the colonies much cheaper. This duty was therefore discontinued, by which measure the price of teas in America was so much reduced, that it was expected the Americans would submit, without reluctance, to the continuance of the duty of three-pence per pound on that commodity.

Before this bill had passed the lower house, Mr. George Grenville brought in a bill entitled, "An act for regulating the proceedings of the house of commons, in controverted elections." It stipulated, that instead of bringing the merits of a contested election before a general committee of the house, upon a petition being received, a day should be appointed to hear the merits, and for the petitioners, their witnesses, and council to attend. On the day appointed the house should be counted, and if it was not found to have 100 members present, the business should stand over till that number were assembled, at which time the names of the members in the house were to be put into six boxes or glasses, to be drawn alternately and read by the speaker, until forty-nine members were drawn. The sitting member and petitioner may nominate one each. Lists of the forty-nine members, thus selected, are then to be given to the parties, who, with the clerk of the house of commons, are to withdraw, and to strike off one alternately, beginning on the part of the petitioner, till the number be reduced to thirteen; who, with the two nominees, are to be sworn a select committee, to determine the matter in dispute. The introduction of this bill was unwelcome to the ministry; but as it met with the approbation of the house, it passed into a law. In the next session of parliament, the benefit of this measure became apparent. A contested election, for the borough of New Shoreham, being brought before a select committee, a long-established plan of corruption, which had prevailed in that borough, was revealed. In consequence of a report made to the house, a bill was framed, to incapacitate eighty-one freemen of Shoreham, by name, to vote at the elections of members to serve in parliament, and for preventing bribery and corruption in that borough. An address to his majesty was voted, imploring him, that the attorney-general should be directed to prosecute five persons, who were the principal agents in the sale of the borough.

The city of London, having taken the lead in every measure which opposed the conduct of the house of commons, in seating colonel Luttrel as member for Middlesex, and excluding Mr. Wilkes, could not quietly contemplate the dismissal of that great national question without further discussion. Mr. Beckford, who was then, for the second time, lord mayor, had long been distinguished for the warmth with which he maintained the right of the people to choose their representatives, without the control of parliament. The livery of London were convened in common hall, and it was there resolved to present an humble address, remonstrance, and petition to his majesty, in the name of the lord mayor, aldermen, and livery of the city of London, praying for a dissolution of parliament, and the removal of evil ministers. In this piece, of which the title and contents seemed at variance, great freedom and spirit were indulged. His majesty was told that "under the same secret and malign influence, which, through every successive administration, has defeated every good, and suggested every bad intention, the majority of the house of commons have deprived his people of their dearest rights. They have done a deed more ruinous in its consequences than the levying of ship-money by Charles I., or the dispensing power assumed by James II.; a deed which must vitiate all the future proceedings of this parliament; for the acts of the legislature itself can no more be valid, without a legal house of commons, than without a legal prince upon the throne. Representatives of the people are essential to the making of laws; and there is a time, at which it is morally demonstrative, that men cease to be representatives. The time is now arrived; the present house of commons do not represent the people. We owe to your majesty an obedience, under the restriction of the laws, for the calling and duration of parliaments; and your majesty owes to us, that our representation, free from the force of arms or corruption, should be preserved to us in parliament. It was for this we successfully struggled under James II.; for this we seated, and have faithfully supported, your majesty's family on the throne. Under James II. the people complained, that the sitting of parliament was interrupted, because it was not corruptly subservient to his designs; we complain now that the sitting of this parliament is not interrupted, because it is corruptly subservient to your majesty's ministers. We call God and man to witness, that as we do not owe our liberty to those nice and subtle distinctions, which places, pensions, and lucrative employments have invented, so neither will we be deprived of it by them; but as it was gained by the stern virtue of our ancestors, by the virtue of their descendants it shall be preserved."

His majesty, in his answer, told them, that he should always be ready to receive the requests, and to listen to the complaints of his subjects; but it gave him great concern to find that any of them should have been so far misled, as to offer him an address and remonstrance, the contents of which he could not but consider as disrespectful to him, injurious to his parliament, and irreconcilable to the principles of the constitution. The day on which this address was delivered, lord Chatham made a motion in the house of lords, for an address to the throne, praying his majesty to dissolve the parliament. He stated the public discontents in England, Ireland, and America, affirmed that the people reposed no confidence in the existing house of commons, and shewed, from the situation of public affairs, the necessity of having a parliament in whom the people could place a proper confidence. The motion was overruled by a great majority.

The next day, a member in the house of commons moved to address the king, praying that a copy of the city address, as well as his majesty's answer, might be laid before the house. A very animated debate ensued. The lord mayor, who was one of the members for the city, instead of shrinking from the contest, avowed the part that he had taken in the remonstrance, maintained its propriety, and declared that he should ever glory in it. Mr. Treecothick, another city member, and the two sheriffs, Townsend and Sawbridge, who were members, supported the chief magistrate against the weight of the house; they justified the language used to his majesty, and declared themselves ready to enter into the merits of that transaction. This brought on a long and animated debate, in which the right of the subject to petition the throne was discussed. The house was much divided in sentiment, not only concerning the propriety of the city of London presenting a petition to the throne, for the purpose of censuring the conduct of the commons of Great Britain, but more particularly concerning the expressions made use of in the remonstrance; and many members, who approved of this mode of conveying to the royal ear the grievances of the people, reprobated the terms employed on this occasion. Others, with great animation, endeavoured to excite the house to inflict some signal punishment on the principal instigators to a corporate act, which they asserted to have insulted the throne, and to have been performed with all the circumstances of tumultuous parade; which tended to alarm the minds of the peaceable, and inflame the passions of every misguided member of the community. The motion for an address was at length carried by a great majority; and when, in consequence, the remonstrance was laid before the house, after the journals and other records had been examined, the house passed a resolution to address his majesty, and to obtain the concurrence of the lords. The address was accordingly presented on the 23rd of March. It 1771.
acknowledged the right of the subject to petition the throne, but censured very severely the indiscreet manner in which that right had been exercised by the city of London; the direct tendency of which was to disturb the peace of the kingdom, and subvert all lawful authority. Many people expected, that new instances of expulsion and incapacitation would have ensued; but more moderate measures prevailed, and with the address the business was dismissed.

A few days after the rising of parliament, another humble address, remonstrance, and petition of the lord mayor, aldermen, and council of the city of London, was presented to his majesty. It expressed the deep concern which the city of London felt, in his majesty's answer from the throne; and, after recapitulating the grievances complained of in former addresses, concluded with a prayer, that his majesty might reign, as kings only can reign, in and by the hearts of a loyal, dutiful, and free people. His majesty informed them, in his answer, that he should have been wanting to the public, as well as to himself, if he had not expressed his dissatisfaction at the late address. After which, the lord mayor requested leave to reply; which being granted, his lordship addressed his sovereign, and begged leave to declare, in his royal presence, on behalf of his fellow-citizens, how much the base apprehension of his majesty's displeasure would at all times affect their minds. The declaration of his majesty's dissatisfaction had filled them with inexpressible anxiety, and with the deepest affliction. He supplicated his majesty not to dismiss them from his presence without some comfort, and prospect, at least, of redress. No answer being returned, the lord mayor, and those who accompanied him, withdrew.

The birth of a princess occasioned the city of London to present a congratulatory address to his majesty, on that event, a week afterwards, when the lord chamberlain acquainted the lord mayor, that, as his lordship thought fit to speak to his majesty, after his answer to the late remonstrance, he was directed to inform him, that as it was unusual, his majesty desired that nothing of that kind might happen for the future. This was the last public transaction in which Mr. Beckford was engaged. He died, three weeks after, of a fever. As he possessed a very ample fortune, was splendid and munificent in his manner of living, had a strong and agreeable elocution, and steadily opposed the measures of the court, he was the object of general confidence and esteem. His influence was exerted to check and restrain the jarring interests which prevailed among the leaders of opposition in the city. A society had been formed, under the title of the Supporters of the Bill of Rights, of which the principal object was to exonerate Mr. Wilkes from his debts. Soon after Mr. Beckford's death, violent dissensions broke out. Many of the members seceded, and called themselves the Constitutional Society. These two bodies of men entertained the utmost aversion to each other, and the object of procuring redress for the violated rights of the electors of Great Britain, which had at first united them, seemed lost in private animosity.

CHAPTER XX.

GEORGE III.

[1770 to 1771.]

Falkland Islands seized on by the Spaniards—Preparations for War—Negotiations—Resignations—The Dispute with Spain adjusted—Probable Motives which led to that Event—Situation of France—Meeting of Parliament—Misunderstanding between the two Houses—Proceedings of the House of Commons against certain Printers—Conduct of the Magistrates of London—The Record of their Proceedings erased by order of the House—The Lord Mayor and Alderman Oliver committed to the Tower—Resolutions respecting Mr. Wilkes—Bill to enable the East India Company to raise a Military Force.

LORD Chatham, who had strenuously exerted himself towards the close of the session, had predicted, that a great blow either was or would soon be struck in some part of the world. The event proved how well that consummate statesman was acquainted with the resolutions which were formed in foreign cabinets; for in the month of June 1770, a squadron of Spanish ships sailed from Buenos Ayres, for the purpose of seizing upon Falkland islands, where the English, a few years before, had made a settlement, by erecting a fort, which they called Egmont, and where two sloops then lay. The Spanish commander, Don Madariaga, summoned the fort to surrender to the catholic king; which being refused, he proceeded to possess himself of it by force of arms. Captain Farmer, who commanded in the fort, having remonstrated in vain against the insult offered the king, his master, in a time of profound peace, was obliged to submit. A capitulation was signed; after which the captain and garrison were detained twenty days, and the rudder of his ship taken away, before he was permitted to return home.

THE islands are situated to the eastward of the straits of Magellan, and are the most desolate and dreary of habitable regions, although not so high, in southern latitude, as the island of Anglesea lies to the north; but many reasons induced our court to form a settlement there. It was in contemplation to encourage a whale fishery in the southern parts, from North America; and the possession of this spot was thought beneficial, for the purpose of exploring the South Sea, which at that time was a favourite pursuit The French had claimed these islands, in consequence of M. Bougainville having visited them before commodore Byron; he gave them the name of Malouines, and his court transferred their right of them to the Spaniards; but the English claim was founded upon their discovery in the reign of queen Elizabeth.

THAT the court of Spain should look with a jealous eye on a settlement, made by the English, in a part of the world from which the Spaniards had excluded all other nations, is no ways surprising. But that she should be hardy enough to deprive us by force of that possession, in violation of the peace which then subsisted, and when she had so lately felt the force of our arms in every quarter of the world, which in less than a twelvemonth had opened to themselves a way to all her resources of wealth; that she should risk the irritating of such a power argued great temerity; an utter oblivion of the moderation and lenity which dictated the last peace, on the part of Great Britain, and a full persuasion that her late victorious adversary, from some secret cause, operating strongly on every department of the state, was sunk into a condition which made her no longer formidable. It was remarked, that the expedition against Port Egmont did not appear to have been a sudden ill-concerted enterprise, but to have been conducted, not only with the usual military precautions, but in all the forms and ceremonies of war. A frigate was first employed, to examine the strength of the place, a message was sent by Don Francisco Buccarelli, the governor of Buenos Ayres, demanding immediate possession, in the catholic king's name, and ordered our people to depart; at last a military force appeared, and obliged the garrison to surrender.

News of this expedition arrived at Cadiz the latter end of August; immediately upon which Mr. Harris, our charge des affaires at the court of Madrid, sent advice of this transaction to lord Weymouth, secretary of state, which arrived about the same time, that the prince de Masserano, the Spanish ambassador, had acquainted his lordship, that he had good reason to believe that the governor of Buenos Ayres had taken upon him to make use of force, in order to dispossess the English of their settlement at Port Egmont, in Falkland islands; adding, that he was directed to make this communication, to prevent the bad consequences which might arise by its coming through other hands; and expressing his wishes, that whatever the event at Port Egmont might be, in consequence of a step of the governor, taken without any particular instruction from his catholic majesty, it might not be productive of measures at this court, dangerous to the good understanding that subsisted between the two crowns. Lord Weymouth hereupon asked the Spanish ambassador, if he was ordered to disavow the conduct of M. Buccarelli, the governor, which was answered in the negative, until he should hear from Madrid.

When Mr. Harris applied to M. de Grunaldi, the prime minister of Spain, for a disavowal of this hostile measure, his answer was very unsatisfactory; he said, the British court had reason to foresee such an event would happen, since our establishment there was notoriously disapproved by Spain. He could not, he said, blame the conduct of M. Buccarelli, as it was founded on the laws of America; but added, that his catholic majesty was very desirous of peace, having so little to gain and so much to lose by a war: therefore he would avoid it, at any rate consistent with his own honour, and the welfare of his people. A few days after, he acquainted Mr. Harris that the king, his master, was resolved to do every thing in his power to terminate this affair in an amicable manner; that therefore he admitted our demand, and that he assented to it in every point consistent with his honour, which, as well as ours, was to be considered; that, however, as this matter could be determined only in London, and not at Madrid, orders had been given to prince Masserano to lay before lord Weymouth all the ideas which had been suggested on this head; and as they differed only in the terms, and not essentially, he trusted some one of them would be adopted.

Prince Masserano, upon receipt of these dispatches, proposed a convention between the two crowns, in which he would disavow, in the name of the king, his master, any particular instruction given to M. Buccarelli on this occasion; at the same time that he acknowledged him to have acted agreeably to his general orders, and his oath as governor; the restitution of Falkland islands was to be thereby acceded to without any injury to his catholic majesty's right to those islands; but the king of Great Britain was at the same time called upon to disavow, on his part, a menace of one of his captains, which was said to have occasioned the steps taken by the governor.

This mode of adjusting the difference, by convention, was rejected as totally inadmissible; notwithstanding which, our ministry did not despair of an accommodation at the time the parliament met. Indeed, before the news of the capture of Port Egmont had been officially known, sixteen sail of the line had been put into commission; admiral Keppel was appointed to command the fleet, and press-warrants were issued for manning it. The people of England are ever ready to draw the sword, when either their interest or their honour appears to be attacked. On this occasion the nation felt itself insulted, and called for vengeance; but our natural strength was not found adequate to great undertakings; our navy, the pride and the protection of England, during an eight years' peace, had been suffered to fall into decay; and when the surveyor of the navy, to whom, under the first lord of the admiralty, this important trust was committed, found his delinquency revealed, he eluded the resentment of his country by a sudden death. The sailors, who had been ever ready, in former contests, to embark in a war with Spain, were now backward to engage in the service; this was chiefly owing to the ill-treatment which both the soldiers and sailors received, who went on the expedition against the Havannah, the last and most destructive service in the late war; in which the common men scarcely received any proportion of the vast wealth which was acquired; owing to a secret regulation being settled at home, before the expedition set forward, by which the commander-in-chief of the fleet and army were to receive one third, instead of one eighth, of the prize money.

In the king's speech it was observed, that the honour of the crown, and the rights of the people, were deeply affected by an act of the governor of Buenos Ayres. This expression was much animadverted upon, and the minister was severely censured, both in parliament and without doors, for causing his royal master to represent to his people an open act of hostility, authorised by the catholic king, as an act of the governor. Nor were the subsequent parts of the speech less criticised; this act, it was said, to avoid the mention of a regular siege and surrender, passes under the piratical description of seizing by force, and the thing taken is described, not as a part of the king's territory or proper dominion, but merely as a "possession," a word expressly chosen in contradiction to, and exclusive of, the idea of right. But the caution used, in the manner of wording the speech, may be very well defended. Our right to the wretched spot, for which we had contended, had ever been disputed by Spain. When lord Anson returned from circumnavigating the globe, he recommended a settlement being made on Pepy's or Falkland islands, which would actually have been carried into execution, but for the remonstrances made by the court of Spain; in compliance with which it was totally laid aside, until lord Egmont was placed at the head of the admiralty, in 1764; a nobleman whom one of the ablest advocates for the conduct of the administration in this business, describes as possessing a vigorous and ardent mind, whose knowledge was extensive, and whose designs were magnificent; but who, by indulging romantic projects and airy speculations, had somewhat vitiated his judgment. But however this may be, the new settlement was made with great caution, the commanding officer at Port Egmont being instructed to warn off any other European power, who might attempt to make a settlement on Falkland islands; but if he found any already settled there, he was then to make a joint settlement with them, if they refused to depart after due warning; referring the decision of right to their two sovereigns.

There appears to be a moderation, not unmixed with firmness, in the administration during this contest, which renders the conduct pursued on this occasion dissimilar to that which had been adopted on all our disputes with Spain, in former reigns; if it did not resemble the spirited attacks made by queen Elizabeth, as soon as she discovered the intentions of the Spanish monarch, it was equally unlike the abject condescensions of her pusillanimous successor. It had nothing of the greedy thirst of spoil which led Cromwel to wage an unjust war with Spain, nor of that decisive boldness, which at one stroke made us masters of her navy, in the reign of George I.; but then it was as free from any thing like Walpole's apparent indifference to the interests of the nation. The contest was not for dominion, or for any valuable commercial object, but for a point of honour; whether we should hold a barren island in the vicinity of the Spanish territories, of which we had taken possession, in the presumption that we had a prior right thereto, but which right, as already observed, had always been disputed by Spain.

Nor is it difficult to assign reasons for this moderation in the British cabinet. It seems to have been a settled principle, from the very commencement of the present reign, to keep clear of foreign war as much as possible. The long reign of George II. was considered as having thrown too much weight into the scale of the people; it was represented by those who possessed the royal confidence, that a turbulent, factious spirit was gone forth; that the insolence of the vulgar exceeded the example of former times; that all respect for lawful authority was lost, and the licentiousness of the press had levelled all distinctions, whether of birth, fortune, or talents, traducing, with a bold effrontery, the characters most eminent for wisdom and virtue. The body of the English gentry adopted these sentiments, and were ready to concur with the court in restraining the violence of the lower orders of the state; the manners of the age being formed by wealth, luxury, and refinement, made the tumults of a mob more dreadful than the encroachments of a minister; and the stability which government seemed now to have acquired, notwithstanding the strong opposition which had been formed against it, pointed out the present as the most proper season for introducing internal regulations. Whilst a time of peace was necessary to effect these objects at home, it was still more requisite for pursuing the measures which were thought expedient to bring the American colonies under due subordination to the parent state. These considerations probably induced our ministers to continue the negotiation with the ambassador and court of Spain, during the months of September, October, and November. At length, lord Weymouth informed Mr. Harris, that from the conduct of prince Masserano, he saw but little reason to expect an amicable termination of this affair; and advised him, if possible, to convey a hint of this to the governor of Gibralter, and the consuls at the different ports of Spain. The governor of Gibralter was also ordered to embark immediately for that fortress.

Such was the posture of affairs when the parliament adjourned for the Christmas recess, during which lord Weymouth resigned his post, and was succeeded by the earl of Rochford, who a few days after his appointment wrote Mr. Harris a letter of recal; but a month after, he directed him by another letter to return to Madrid, as there were reasons to believe, that fresh propositions of satisfaction would be made for the injury done.

On the day the parliament met, after the recess, a declaration was signed by prince Masserano, and an acceptance thereof by the earl of Rochford. By the former the ambassador, in the name of his master, disavowed the violence used at Port Egmont, and stipulated, that every thing should be restored there, precisely to the same state in which they were before the reduction; but at the same time declared, that this restoration was not in any wise to affect the prior right of sovereignty over the islands; and by the acceptance, the performance of these stipulations was to be considered as a satisfaction for the injury done to the crown of Great Britain.

When the declaration and acceptance had been laid before parliament, an address was presented, for copies of all claims and propositions made by the court of Spain, relative to Falkland islands, from the first settlement of it, together with the answers. This produced nothing previous to the demand which the governor of Buenos Ayres made, the 30th of November, 1769, for the English to quit the island, and no one paper, relative to the claims or representations made by the court of Spain, since the first settlement there, nor the answer given to the first of lord Weymouth's letters, which was dated September 12th, and was marked No. 10. Neither did the papers laid before parliament explain in what manner the negotiation had been resumed. The answer given to the enquiries was, that no other papers could be found. However, the subsequent conduct of government proved, that there were secret stipulations on the part of Great Britain, which the ministry did not choose should meet the eye of parliament. For though Falkland islands, Port Egmont, its forts, and other dependencies were restored to the English on the 16th of September, 1771, in conformity to his catholic majesty's declaration; yet in 1774, orders were sent out for evacuating the place, which was done accordingly, and no settlement has since been made there. The sudden resignation of lord Weymouth may be supposed to have been occasioned by a dislike of this compromise.

The conduct of Spain, throughout this transaction, was extremely mysterious; and, as it was never elucidated by authentic documents, we are left to form conjectures merely. The consequence naturally to be expected from such a forcible seizure of an English colony, was an immediate rupture with Great Britain; and although the Spanish government had taken every possible method of defending their distant settlements from all future attacks, yet that kingdom was so unequal to a naval contest with us, and the wealth annually drawn from the New World would be thereby so much hazarded, that to precipitate a war appeared to be a folly of the first magnitude. Against these motives for a pacific system in Spain, may be placed the national character, haughty, vindictive, and brave, which takes fire at any supposed insult, and renounces interest at the call of honour. Such national propensities to war were not checked but promoted by the disposition of their monarch, who loved the clang of arms, although he possessed none of those talents which are necessary to form a military prince; and the antipathy of the king was supposed to have subsisted ever after the year 1740, when, being king of Naples, a British fleet compelled him to withdraw his troops from the Spanish army, and sign a treaty of neutrality, in order to save his capital from destruction.

The close connexion which subsisted between the two branches of the house of Bourbon, leaves no room to doubt, that the court of Versailles was to have become a party in the war, had it broke out, although the kingdom of France was not in a situation to begin new quarrels. The misconduct of Lewis XV. had been the chief cause of the defeats, disgraces, and bankruptcy, which had attended the last war; as weak kings are frequently the most tenacious of despotic rule, this monarch was fond of exercising every attribute of absolute sovereignty, and demanded from his parliament an implicit acquiescence in his edicts. Whilst the English nation besieged the throne with complaints against the house of commons, the French were excited to a ferment, almost as violent, against their king, for his authoritative control over their parliament; and the noble stand which those assemblies made, against the mandates of a tyrant, was admired and respected by the whole nation. Nor was this the only source of discontent against the sovereign; notwithstanding the vast revenues of France, yet the interest payable on the debts contracted during the last war, together with the expences of government and the crown exceeded the income, in the beginning of the year 1769, by upwards of three millions and a half sterling, annually. By forced reductions of interest, which only an arbitrary government is able to make, but which must inevitably destroy all confidence, and deprive the state of relief on future emergencies, some savings were made, and new imposts on the people furnished some provision for this annual waste. Although such was the exhausted state of France, yet the duke de Choiseul, who was prime minister, appeared inclined to enter into a war with Great Britain. When lord North was asked, in the house of commons, whether France had interposed or not in the dispute with Spain, he did not choose to answer that question; and, as Choiseul had quitted his employments a little before the court of Spain came into the terms insisted upon by the British cabinet, it is highly probable that this concession was forced from it, by her ally having adopted a new system of conduct.

During this session of parliament, a circumstance, in itself trivial, caused a great misunderstanding between the two houses. Before the Christmas recess, the duke of Richmond made a motion for an address, for quickening our preparations, and putting our valuable possessions in the West Indies, and the Mediterranean, in a proper state of defence. In his speech, he expatiated on the defenceless state of Gibralter, when he was interrupted by a proposal being made, that the house should be immediately cleared; this was objected to, and a great clamour ensued. Eighteen peers, disgusted at the proceedings of the ministerial party, quitted the house in a body; and, soon after, several members of the house of commons, who attended at the bar of the house with a bill, were ordered to withdraw. Many of the peers, who had withdrawn from the house of lords, proceeded to that of the commons, and were there when the members, who had been excluded the upper house, returned to their seats, and represented the treatment they had just received. A gentleman on the treasury bench hereupon moved, that the house should be cleared, peers and all, which, after some opposition, was carried; so that those very lords who had quitted their own house in disgust, at finding themselves unable to prevent the members of the house of commons being excluded from thence, were driven from the other house by the resentment which that very exclusion had excited. Much recrimination arose between the two houses, from this conduct. The lords soon after issued strict orders that no one whatever should be admitted into their house for the future, except such members of the house of commons as should come to present bills, and they also to retire as soon as they had made the usual obediences. This misunderstanding continued during the remainder of the session. A protest against this order was entered on the journals, signed by sixteen peers.

The apprehensions of foreign war being now removed, fresh internal contentions disturbed this season of repose. The house of commons, in the case of the Middlesex election, had themselves defined their own privileges, and had maintained them against the clamour and discontent which the nation expressed against a power self-created, till then unknown in the latitude in which it was in that case exercised. The alarm which this innovation had spread was at length so much subsided, that no farther commotions were to be apprehended from the establishment of the precedent; when, all at once, the house was drawn into a disgraceful contest, not upon a national question, but with a few inconsiderable individuals, which terminated very unfavourably to the dignity of parliament.

The printers of certain newspapers had inserted, in those publications, what they called the speeches of particular members of the house of commons; this presumption the members, on whom the speeches were fathered, complained of it to the house, and the printers were ordered to attend, which order they did not think proper to comply with; the messengers reported, that they had not seen the printers, and the house made an order, that the leaving the summons at the printers' houses should be deemed a sufficient notice of attendance. The practice of retailing, in periodical publications, the substance of what was delivered in parliament, guarded, however, by feigned names, and a slight transmutation of circumstances, had prevailed for near forty years; and the writer, who afterwards rose to the highest eminence, and who, on account of the magnitude of his conceptions, and the great compass of his knowledge, has been styled the Colossus of Literature, was one of the first who regularly gratified the public with the debates of the senate. Individuals were frequently displeased with the liberty which was taken with their harangues, and were solicitous to confine their sentiments within the walls in which they were delivered; and there are instances, in which the house of commons, in a body, have adopted the sentiments of such members, and ordered into custody the publishers of their speeches. In the present instance, the gentleman, Mr. Onslow, who lodged the complaint, stated, that he had been grossly misrepresented, and that the speech, given in the newspapers as his, had the tendency to injure him greatly in the opinion of his constituents. This brought on a debate on the liberty of the press. It was said, that ministerial writers were publicly encouraged in the most flagrant abuses of the press, and that, while this was done in one instance, whereby some of the most respectable characters in the kingdom were mangled, without regard to shame and truth, it was in vain to curb it in other cases, or to say to licentiousness, So far shalt thou go, and no farther; and that although misrepresentations of any member were undoubtedly infamous, yet they ought to be legally punished by the person injured, and not by the authority of the house; which, however well supported by precedent, not being conducted by the ordinary forms of legal proceeding, had ever an odious and oppressive appearance. It was maintained, that except the instances in which the house of commons is a court of judicature, to which, from the nature of their office, a coercive power must belong; and, excepting such contempts as immediately interrupt their proceedings, they have no authority to imprison a man for any supposed violation of privileges whatsoever. The privilege now claimed has never been defined or confirmed by the statute; neither can it be said, with any colour of truth, to be a part of the common law of England, which had grown into prescription long before we knew any thing of the existence of a house of commons. The power of creating new privileges has been long formally renounced by both houses, and there is no code in which we can study the law of parliament. To establish a claim of privilege in either house, and to distinguish original right from usurpation, it must appear that it is indispensibly necessary for the duty they are employed in, and also that it has been uniformly allowed. There is no precedent from the year 1265 to the death of queen Elizabeth, of the house of commons having imprisoned any man, not a member of their house, for contempt, or breach of privilege. They never took the power of punishing into their own hands; they either sought redress by petition to the sovereign, or applied to the house of lords; and when satisfaction was denied them, or delayed, their only remedy was, refusing to proceed on the king's business.

As the subject of privilege, as claimed by the house of commons, now became agitated, the principles of the constitution, particularly as they affected the right assumed by the representatives of the people, were enquired into, and much valuable knowledge communicated from the press. A writer of distinguished abilities insisted, that the greatest and most exceptionable parts of the privilege of parliament, now contended for, were introduced and asserted by a house of commons, that abolished both monarchy and peerage, and whose proceedings could be no ways reconciled to the form of the constitution. It is a leading maxim of the laws of England, and without it all laws are nugatory, that there is no right without a remedy, nor any legal power without a course to carry it into effect. Let the power now in question be tried by this rule. The courts of criminal justice are open to prosecutions, which the attorney-general may commence by information or indictment. A libel tending to asperse or vilify the house of commons, or any of its members, may be as severely punished in the court of king's bench, as a libel upon the king; and the house will consult its real dignity much better by appealing to the laws, when they are offended, than by violating the first principle of natural justice, which forbids us to be judges when we are parties to the cause. It was, however, the opinion of a very great majority, that the dignity of that house must be supported at all events, and that the delinquents should be taken into the custody of the serjeant-at-arms, for contempt of the orders issued by the speaker.

At any other time, the offenders would have been left to feel the severity of that power, whose authority they had trifled with; but it cannot be doubted but a plan was now formed, to shew to the world how little able the commons of England were to support that controlling power over the subject which they had assumed, whenever the civil magistracy had refused its concurrence. Those who were most interested about the decision on the Middlesex election, were undoubtedly the chief instigators to this contest; and the refractory printers were emboldened in their contumacy by a junto, who aimed at disgracing parliament. The language which these held was, We have nothing to apprehend from prerogative, but every thing from undue influence. Formerly it was the interest of the people, that the privileges of the parliament should be left unlimited and undefined; at present, it is not only their interest, but necessary even to the preservation of the constitution, that the privileges of parliament should be strictly ascertained, and confined within the narrowest bounds the nature of their institution will admit. Upon the same principle that prerogative was resisted, privilege must be resisted. It is immaterial, whether the crown, by its own immediate act, imposes new, and dispenses with old laws; or whether the same arbitrary power produces the same effects, through the medium of the house of commons.

In consequence of the orders given to the serjeant-at-arms, that officer went to the houses of the parties, but they were constantly denied to him; and their servants even accompanied their answers with contemptuous sneers, which the officer reported to the house; whereupon it was determined to petition the throne, praying his majesty to issue his royal proclamation against the delinquents, and offering a reward for apprehending them; which was accordingly inserted in the gazette, and £50 a-piece offered for taking them.

Wheble, one of the printers mentioned in the proclamation, was apprehended and carried before alderman Wilkes, at Guildhall, and was by him discharged and bound over in a recognisance to prosecute the captor, for an assault and false imprisonment. The officer was also obliged to give bail for his appearance at the next sessions, to answer for his offence. The magistrate then wrote a letter to the earl of Halifax, secretary of state, informing him of his proceeding, and the motives which led him so to act. Wheble, he observed, was not charged with any crime in the proclamation, and without some crime being charged and proved, it was violating the rights of an Englishman, as well as the chartered privileges of the city of London, to take such a man into custody.

Thompson, the other printer, was apprehended in like manner; and in like manner discharged by Mr. Alderman Oliver. Certificates were given by the two magistrates to the parties who apprehended Wheble and Thompson, testifying their having brought the persons described in the proclamation before them, whereby they might lay claim to the reward offered in the proclamation. The claimants had literally executed the business, for which the reward was promised, in carrying the persons described before proper magistrates, as was directed to be done; but the whole was evidently a mere collusion, and utterly repugnant to the spirit of the proclamation. The lords of the treasury refused to pay the reward for a transaction so nugatory.

The house of commons seemed to grow more determined upon being thus baffled. Six other printers were now named; and a motion was made, seconded, and agreed to, that they should be proceeded against. Miller, the printer of the London Evening Post, one of the six, was apprehended by a messenger of the house of commons, in his own house. He immediately sent for a constable, whom he charged to take the messenger into custody, and carried him to the Mansion-house, before Brass Crosby, the lord mayor, where the aldermen, Wilkes and Oliver, likewise sat. The deputy serjeant-at-arms attended, and demanded, in the name of the speaker, that both the messenger and the printer should be delivered up to him; this was refused by the lord mayor, who asked for what crime and on what authority the messenger had arrested the printer; it was answered, that he had done it by warrant from the speaker. It was then asked, if that warrant had been backed by a city magistrate; which being answered in the negative, the warrant was demanded, and, after much altercation, produced; and its invalidity being argued by the printer's counsel, the three magistrates present discharged him from confinement. Miller then proceeded to lodge a complaint against the messenger, for an assault and false imprisonment; and, having proved the facts to the satisfaction of the court, the messenger was asked for bail, which the serjeant having refused to comply with, a warrant for his commitment to prison was made out, and signed by the lord mayor and the two aldermen; which was no sooner executed, than the serjeant consented to the giving of bail, which was admitted.

The boldness of this proceeding, and the open defiance which was hurled at parliamentary privileges, when claimed independent of law, astonished the nation; whilst the indignation of the house, at the insult which their officer had received, rose to a height which seemed to threaten severe chastisement to the magisterial triumvirate. The lord mayor and Mr. Oliver, being members of the house, were ordered to attend in their places, and Mr. Wilkes at the bar of the house. The two members were accordingly in their places. The lord mayor was much indisposed; he defended his conduct by the oath of office he had taken, by which he was obliged to observe inviolable the franchises of the city of London. He farther alleged, that the city charters excepted citizens from any law process, being served by any other than by their own proper officers He pleaded that these chartered privileges were recognised by an act of parliament. Such being his obligations as chief magistrate, it became his indispensible duty to act as he had done, and prayed to be heard by counsel; but this was not permited, it being observed, that it was absurd for counsel being suffered to plead at the bar of that house, against its privileges; the rejecting this request, to be heard by counsel, was also supported by a precedent drawn from the time of Henry VIII.

The lord mayor's clerk was then ordered to attend with the book of minutes; and being ordered up to the table, a motion was made and carried, that the recognisance of Witham, the messenger, which was there entered, should be erased out of the book; after which a resolution was passed, that there should be no farther proceedings at law in that case.

Considering the disposition that was shewn to dispute the authority of the house of commons, the permitting the clerk to attend with the minutes, in consequence of an order from the speaker, will appear to be giving up the point, for which they contended in that instance. Indeed the order might have been complied with for the purpose of ensnaring the house, on the supposition that more disgrace would accrue from erasing a public record, than from reiterated contempt being shewn to its summons. But the true reason was, that the alderman who then sat was not disposed to maintain the contest.

This new kind of noli prosequi was strongly inveighed against by many members. It was, they said, assuming and exercising a power of the most dangerous nature, with which the constitution had not entrusted any part of the legislature; and that the stopping the course of justice, and suspending the law of the land, were among the heaviest charges that could be brought against the most arbitrary despot.

The advocates for the privileges of the house maintained, that the charter of the city of London being granted by the king, no rights thereby conveyed could interfere with the inherent privileges of that house; as the crown itself had no power to make such grants, the privileges of the house of commons being a check upon the other branches of the legislature; that consequently their cause was the cause of liberty, and of the people at large; and if the powers of the house of commons were weakened, the security to liberty would be equally so. It was then resolved, that the discharging of Miller from the custody of the messenger was a breach of privilege. The numbers—272 for the resolution, against 90. The house then resolved that it was a breach of privilege to apprehend the messenger executing his warrant, under pretence of an assault; and that it was a breach of privilege to hold the messenger to bail for such pretended assault. The business, when advanced to this stage, detained the house till one o'clock in the morning. Mr. Oliver was then asked, what he had to advance in his defence? He replied, that he owned and gloried in the charge; no justification he knew could avert the punishment intended for him; he was conscious of having done his duty, and he was indifferent about the consequences; and, as he thought it vain to appeal to justice, so he defied the threats of power.

Hereupon it was moved, that Mr. Oliver should be sent to the Tower; which, after much warm debate, was carried by 170 to 58, and he was accordingly conveyed thither at that hour, by virtue of the speaker's warrant. The lord mayor being at that time much indisposed, the proceedings against him were deferred.

Whilst these matters were depending in parliament, a court of common council was summoned to Guildhall, when alderman Treeothick officiated as locum tenens for the lord mayor. Public thanks, in writing, were there voted to the lord mayor and the two aldermen, for having supported the privileges and franchises of the city, and having defended our excellent constitution. A committee of four aldermen and eight commoners was also appointed to assist them in making their defence, with instructions to employ such counsel as they should think proper upon this important occasion, and power to draw upon the chamber of London for any sum not exceeding £500.

Two days after the commitment of Mr. Oliver, the lord mayor, with his committee, attended the house of commons to receive his sentence. The populace, on this occasion, assembled in crowds, and many violences were committed on such members as had incurred their resentment. The whole strength of the civil power was exerted to repel the popular fury; and, at length, by the interposition and persuasion of some members of the house of commons, who stood on the best terms with the people, the mob were prevailed upon to retire to a greater distance from Westminster-hall, which they had in a manner closely besieged. The military power was not called forth upon this day's tumult, although a large body, both of horse and foot, were in readiness, if exigencies demanded their interposition.

The house being assembled, the lord mayor said, he looked upon his case as prejudged, and would therefore add nothing to what he had already urged in his defence. The house, however, on account of his ill state of health, were inclined to shew him some indulgence, and it was moved, that he should be taken into the custody of the serjeant-at-arms, instead of being sent to the Tower; but the magistrate disclaimed all such lenity, and said, that whatever might be the state of his health, he gloried in undergoing the same fate with his friend. The question for his commitment to the Tower was then put, and carried by 202 against 39. On his way thither, although it was now midnight, the populace took his horses from his coach, and drew it to Temple-bar. When they arrived there, they shut the city gates, and insisted on the deputy serjeant-at-arms quitting the coach, and proceeding no farther. The lord mayor was obliged here to interpose, and, by assuring them that the gentlemen with him were his particular friends, removed their apprehensions. They then proceeded to drag the carriage onwards to the Mansion-house, where the ovation ended. His lordship, as soon as the mob dispersed, proceeded quietly to the Tower.

The two prisoners were soon after brought up, by the writ of habeas corpus, to the court of common pleas, when, after a full hearing of their counsel, the judges were unanimously of opinion, that the court was not competent to judge of the conduct of the house of commons; whereupon the prisoners were remanded, and continued in confinement to the end of the session, receiving addresses of thanks and congratulation from various parts of the kingdom.

It required no uncommon share of discernment to foretel, that the inflexibility of the city magistrates would entangle the house of commons in a dispute, in which they had every thing to lose and nothing to gain; but the disgraces which this precipitate conduct drew after it, were not completed by the commitment of the lord mayor. The supporters of parliamentary edicts were now extremely embarrassed how to proceed against the other culprit, Mr. Wilkes; they had already experienced both his firmness and abilities, and appeared really afraid of encountering a man of unconquerable spirit. Those who wished farther to involve the house asked, why that gentleman was allowed to triumph in his contumacy? Was he above or below the law? Was it fear or contempt that dictated such a conduct? These sarcasms occasioned an order to be issued, that Mr. Wilkes should attend; but instead of obeying the summons, that gentleman addressed a letter to the speaker, in which he observed, "That in the order for his attendance, no notice was taken of his being a member of the house, and that he should attend in his place, which circumstance, he said, according to the settled form, ought to have been mentioned. In the name of the freeholders of Middlesex, he again demanded his seat in parliament, being ready to take the oaths prescribed by law, and to give in his qualification as knight of the shire. When thus admitted to his seat, he would give the house an exact detail, which would necessarily comprehend a justification of his conduct relative to the late illegal proclamation; equally injurious to the honour of the crown and the rights of the subjects, and likewise to the whole business of the printers. He had acted, he said, entirely from a sense of duty to the great city, whose franchises he was sworn to maintain, and to his country, whose noble constitution he revered, and whose liberties, at the price of his blood, to the last moment of his life, he would defend and support."

This letter a member presented to the speaker, while the house was sitting; but the sense of the house being taken, it was neither received nor admitted to be read. Other orders were issued for his attendance, to which he paid no regard. At length, a few days before the recess at Easter, the house hit upon an expedient to get rid of this business, such as fully proved the deep dilemma into which it was plunged; they issued an order, that he should attend on the 8th of April, and then adjourned to the 9th. So much had the dignity and importance of the house of commons, from whence these proceedings originated, been lost in the contest!

Such members as had at the first opposed these measures, did not fail to utter the most mortifying reproaches against so ignominious a conclusion of this unfortunate business. They said, every exertion the house had made, in defence of their privileges, had only tended to lower the estimation in which their power was held by the world. Their commands were not obeyed, nor their punishments dreaded; for the people having converted them into marks of honour, they must be considered as conferring a reward. The majority in the house not only felt, but acknowledged the propriety of these remarks; but they were desirous of taking some measures, by which these consequences might be avoided, and the power and privileges of the house of commons be established on a respectable basis. Accordingly a special committee was chosen, by ballot, for asserting and maintaining their dignity. The result of such an appointment excited great expectations in the public, and nothing short of expulsion and disqualification was expected to fall on the imprisoned members, while the punishment that awaited Mr. Wilkes was more doubtfully augured. After the committee had sat a considerable time, they reported to the house the various cases which appeared upon the journals, in which that house had exercised the power of apprehension and imprisonment, and concluded with recommending to the house, that J. Miller should be taken into custody; which measure, however, the house did not think fit to adopt, and this long-protracted and disgraceful contest was finally given up. Not but many able speakers laboured to bring the house to exercise the power of which it was possessed, of expelling its refractory members; and as it was an offence committed immediately against that legislative body, they urged the greater propriety of expulsion, in this case, even than in the late expulsion of Mr. Wilkes, who at that time had not filled up the measure of his iniquity, by adding contempt of parliament to his other crimes; but the ministry were unwilling to make so bold a use of the precedent so very lately established; it appeared to many to be extremely doubtful, whether it would be in the power of government to make head against the clamour and discontent such a proceeding would excite; and, as the least of two evils, the house of commons was left to bear its disgrace, rather than the nation should be plunged into a state of anarchy.

The newspapers from henceforth threw off all restraint, and in the course of the next session, the daily proceedings of parliament were circumstantially related in the prints of the next morning; and whether the sentiments and expressions of each member were fairly given, or grossly perverted, depended on the capacity or humour of the writer, for the house no longer fulminated its maledictions against traducers.

Towards the close of the session, a bill was brought in, to enable the East India company to raise and support a military force, for the defence and protection of their settlements. That body was to be empowered to raise 2000 men, who were to be paid by the company, but the officers were to be appointed by the crown. This force was to be composed of 600 German protestants, 700 Irish catholics, and 700 were to be raised in England. These troops were to be subject to the military laws, during their continuance in England, and 1400 of them were to be annually sent to the East Indies. It farther empowered the company's officers to recruit, by beat of drum, in the manner practised by the regular troops.

Among the numerous instances of the departure of governments and inferior communities from those principles, upon which they were at first formed, the transformation of a body of merchants into sovereigns, virtually possessing a large, rich, and populous kingdom, is the most singular and remarkable. Fourteen years had not elapsed, since their principal settlement in Bengal became subject to a barbarous enemy, and their governor, council, and chief officers were driven, like a herd of cattle, into a noisome dungeon, miserably to perish. It then hung nicely suspended in the scales of fate, whether the company should possess a foot of land in those very territories, over which, in less than a twelvemonth afterwards, they gained a controlling power.

The possession of the territorial revenues of the provinces of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa, had opened such inviting prospects to ambitious and rapacious men, that the original mode, of carrying on a beneficial traffic with the natives, by conciliating their good will and confidence, was entirely lost in an intemperate rage for conquest, and establishing the power of the sword, in violation of justice and humanity. The representations which the company's servants made, of the state of affairs there, appeared to be so congenial to the interests of the proprietary, that the revenues of the country became an object as eagerly sought after as its manufactures; and as grants extorted by force of arms, must be held by the same means, a continual supply of fresh troops from Europe became necessary, the climate being much more fatal to the common men, than the enemies against whom they were led.

The application which the company now made to parliament, was supported by the weight of government. The imports of the country brought large sums directly into the exchequer; and the Asiatic wealth which centered in the nation, greatly increased every branch of the public revenue, in the course of its circulation; and what government, now subsisting, would sacrifice such important objects of finance, for the preservation of public virtue, and the honour of the national character?

Many weighty objections, however, were made to this bill; that it was unconstitutional to keep an armed power in the kingdom, which was independent of parliament for its pay; that the introduction of foreign troops was contrary to the act of settlement; and that it was highly dangerous to establish such a precedent. The replies made to these objections were chiefly directed to shew the expediency of the measure, in order to remove the inconveniencies the company laboured under. It was observed, that a greater number of men was sent off every year, and that was provided for by this act; but many were obtained in an indirect and unwarrantable manner; such were the arts practised by the kidnappers, and the compulsions used in lock-up houses, and that it was with a view of rendering these means of recruiting unnecessary, that the present plan was formed. Indeed the idea of procuring German soldiers was, after some time, abandoned, and many restrictions, as to the regulation of the troops while in England, were proposed; but after the bill had been twice read, and a great majority each time procured for it, it was thrown out on the third reading. The parliament rose on the 8th of May.

The death of lord Halifax, which happened soon after the rising of parliament, occasioned some alterations in the arrangement of the great offices of state. The earl of Suffolk was appointed secretary for the northern department, and the duke of Gordon succeeded lord Suffolk in the privy-seal.

CHAPTER XXI.

GEORGE III.

[1772.]

Seamen voted—Petition of the Clergy to be relieved from subscription to the thirty-nine Articles—Royal Marriage Bill—Lord Clive's defence of his Conduct—Bill for the Relief of Protestant Dissenters—Lord North's Financial Schemes—The Question respecting the Middlesex Election decided in the King's Bench—Changes in Various Departments—Sudden Failures in London, and their Consequences.

As little public business was likely to employ the two houses, parliament did not meet until the 21st of January 1772. The strength of the ministry was soon found to be increased by several members, who had, on former occasions, distinguished themselves by opposing the measures of administration, who were now induced to change their sentiments, and give their entire support to government. A state of public tranquillity imparts stability to a minister; and, as it frees him from those restraints which opposing sentiments create, it yields scope for the exercise of his talents, and the application of them to the general interests of the state.

TWENTY-FIVE thousand seamen were voted for the service of the current year; and, although it was objected, that so large a number, in time of peace, would add half a million to the public burden, it was carried without a division. Sound policy dictates, that our grand national security should be assiduously attended to, even in the most quiet times; but sailors upon paper are destructive means of peculation. A great reform in the guard-ships was promised; the conduct with respect to them was declared to have been so shameful, that for many years back they had been considered merely as jobs; and, it was said, that at the time of the late expected war, there were neither ships nor men fit for service; but that things were now so much altered for the better, that twenty of the best ships in the navy were kept upon that duty, and were in such complete condition, and so nearly manned, that a slight press would at any time enable them in a few days to proceed to sea; that the rest of the fleet was also in good condition, and that, in about a year, we should have near eighty ships of the line fit for service, besides those that were upon foreign duty.

THE halcyon days of peace, with which the nation was now blessed, afforded a favourable opportunity for introducing reformation in the state, and modelling legal establishments in conformity to the changes of times, and the fuller discovery of truth which had been made through a succession of ages. A petition was therefore presented to the house of commons, by sir William Meredith, signed by a great number of the clergy of the church of England, and members of the profession of civil law and physic, praying relief from the subscription to the thirty-nine articles of faith.

THIS petition stated it to be one of the greatest principles of the protestant religion, that every thing necessary to salvation is fully and sufficiently contained in the holy scriptures; that the petitioners have an inherent right, which they hold from God only, to make a full and free use of their private judgment, in the interpretation of those scriptures; that, though these were the liberal and original principles of the church of England, and upon which the reformation from popery was founded, they had been deviated from, in the laws relative to subscription, by which they are deprived of their invaluable rights and privileges, and required to acknowledge certain articles, and confessions of faith and doctrine, drawn up by fallible men, to be all and every of them agreeable to the scriptures.

SUCH subscriptions were farther represented as a great hindrance to the spreading of true religion, as they discouraged free enquiries into the real sense of the sacred writings, tended to divide communions, and to cause mutual dislike among fellow-protestants. That the diversity of opinions, held upon many of these articles, occasioned great animosity and ill-will among the established clergy; that they afforded an opportunity to unbelievers to charge them with prevarication, and with being guided by interested and political views, in subscribing to articles which they could not believe, and about which no two were agreed in opinion; and that they afforded a handle to papists, to reproach them with their inconsistency, by departing from the principles on which they had grounded their separation from them, and now admitting of human ordinances, and doubtful and precarious doctrines, though they pretended that the scripture alone was certain and sufficient to salvation.

THE two professions of civil law and physic, complained of the hardships they suffered, at one of the universities particularly, where they were obliged, at their first admission, or matriculation, and at an age so immature for disquisitions and decisions of such moment, to subscribe their unfeigned assent to a variety of theological propositions, in order to be able to attain academical degrees in their respective faculties; and that their private opinions upon those subjects can be of no consequence to the public, as the course of their studies, and the attention to their practice neither afford them the means nor the leisure to examine into the propriety or nature of such propositions. They also lamented the misfortune of their sons, who, at an age before the habit of reflection can be formed, or their judgment matured, may be irrecoverably bound down, in points of the highest consequence, to the opinions and tenets of ages less informed than their own.

SIR William Meredith, after having brought up the petition, said, that the prayer of it was of such importance, as highly merited the most serious consideration; that it was repugnant to that liberality of sentiment, which happily prevailed in the present age, to oblige people to subscribe to the truth of articles which they could not believe; that such injunctions tended to establish, under a religious authority, habits of prevarication and irreligion; and were productive of great licentiousness in the church, and had a farther tendency to destroy Christian charity. The removal of these unworthy shackles, he affirmed, would give a firmness of strength to the established church of England, which nothing could shake; nor could any danger rise from such a reformation, whilst the hierarchy and the bishops existed.

Sir Roger Newdigate was the great champion of the high church party upon this occasion. He considered the petition as a prayer to put an end to the very being of the church of England, as he knew not where to find it, as a national church, but in its thirty-nine articles and book of common prayer. He understood, he said, that the greater number of those who had signed the petition were clergymen, who must therefore have subscribed these exceptionable articles, so that however tender their consciences are at present, they could quiet them in that instance. It was such tender consciences that subverted the church of England in the last century, and he foretold, that similar consequences would now ensue, if the house granted the indulgence prayed for. The house had no power to dispense with oaths; nothing could relieve those who had already subscribed. He maintained, that the house could not receive the petition, for to comply with it would be a direct breach of the articles of union, by which England and Scotland are now knit together. Our king, as third part of the state, is bound by oath never to admit any alteration, either in the liturgy or in the articles.

Mr. Hans Stanley spoke next, with much more moderation, though totally against the petition. He expressed himself desirous of shewing all due respect to so serious a subject; but he perceived a sort of contradiction in the petition, which rendered it an unfit subject of future deliberation for the house. Indeed, to alter the religion of a country was not entirely a new proposition; it had been done here in the reign of Edward VI. If a change of religion takes place in the governing powers, it authorises such an alteration; but he observed, that there was a seeming contradiction in the inferior number coming to the majority, to solicit a material alteration in religion. He had heard it pretty generally said, that it was the original intention of the subscribers to object to certain articles of the thirty-nine, and to certain parts of the litany; but not being able to agree among themselves, upon the particular parts to be expunged, they had brought the house, as well as themselves, into a very embarrassed situation. These gentlemen apply to become members of an ecclesiastical community, namely, the church of England; and, in the same breath, they desire the foundation, on which that constitution is built, to be removed.

He declared himself as warm a friend to toleration as any one within those walls, but he considered toleration as a relative term, signifying a community which had a national church, and tolerated inferior sects. Every one should certainly believe and profess that, which, in his own mind, appears best and most acceptable to the Supreme Being; but these petitioners, he said, seemed to wear the garb of private sectaries. If they have a mind, under a sanction of toleration, to teach what they please, allow them so to do, but let them not, under the garb of the church of England, teach such doctrines. Such a conduct would be absurd, if it was followed by any particular sect; how much more so to be adopted by the established church! No reformer, he insisted, whose name has been transmitted down to us, with any honour and approbation ever formed so wild an idea, as that of putting all religious creeds upon a level.

The first question is, Do you believe the holy scripture? The second is, In what sense do you understand them? If all the founders of religious systems, said he, were alive at the same time, I am persuaded that they could compose as numerous an army, as that with which Alexander subdued the Persian empire, yet every one of them would derive his tenets from the scriptures; but the wisdom of all countries has rather chosen to trust to explanations, derived from the mature labour and consideration of a venerable and pious hierarchy, than to the crude fancies and notions of every assuming dogmatiser, who desires to make himself famous for the singularity of his sentiments; on this account, systems and creeds have prevailed all over Christendom. Where is the great hardship to persons, who, from scruples of their own, (which they may be very much in the right to indulge, if they are sincere,) for them to take to other virtuous employments, if they cannot accept of church preferments on the terms upon which they are now to be taken? At the same time, it is allowed, that there might be many hard cases; but where are the general laws that can guard against inconveniencies to individuals?

He concluded with saying, that he thought the peace of mankind a fortieth article, which he valued and prized as much as the whole thirty-nine; and though there have been many disputes about the civil administration of this country, yet respecting its ecclesiastical affairs, we have, since the accession of the house of Hanover, enjoyed more peace than any other age or any other country can boast; he therefore begged the house to consider, how far it might be prudent to agitate this matter, and how far the corrosives of religious controversy, thrown in, when other heats have prevailed too much, may be likely to produce fatal consequences. It is inconsistent, it is dangerous, to bring such a business before parliament; for though a free country may alter any law, (for law is the creature of the legislature, and can be altered,) yet there are laws so fundamental, that they cannot be altered, without shaking the basis of the state.

Mr. Weddirburn, (solicitor-general) was also of opinion, that to subscribe a belief of some certain articles of faith was necessary for the clergy in any establishment; the church of Geneva, one of the most liberal establishments in Europe, he said, imposed such forms on their clergy; the objection to granting the petition, because it would violate the act of union, he, however, shewed to be ill-founded, as it had been in that sense violated, both with respect to England and Scotland, the legislature having exerted a power of altering church government since the union, by the act against occasional conformity in England, and that which destroyed elective patronages in Scotland, by the latter of which the people at large were deprived of the power of electing their pastors.

It was observed by Mr. Burke, that the church subsisted before the thirty-nine articles were framed, and consequently the thirty-nine articles could not be essential to the existence of the church of England; the articles of the church at first consisted of forty-two; why then might they not be farther reduced, as good sense and liberal sentiments gained ground? But what, says he, are we to understand by the holy scriptures, which these gentlemen desire to make a profession of their belief in? This appears to be a very indeterminate idea. The Romish canon admits of the books of the Apocrypha; the canon of Luther excludes some parts of the Pentateuch, and the whole epistle to the Hebrews; and some antient fathers have rejected the book of Revelation. Mankind are as likely to be of one mind on this point, as on any other.

Sir George Saville observed, that we, protestants, derive that appellation from the first adherents to those principles which we profess, having protested against forms prescribed by human authority; and shall we maintain the necessity of prescribing modes of faith, when our principles reject the idea of any such power belonging to human beings?

Mr. Thomas Pitt represented the hard case of the clergy, compelled by the constitution to give a formal assent to points of faith which they cannot possibly believe; and asked, what would that house, or any honest man say, if a judge, who by his oath is bound to administer justice conformably to the law of the land, should be obliged, at the same time, to interpret that law plainly contrary to its true spirit and meaning?

The house in general seemed to be of opinion, that the professors of law and physic being bound in matter of subscription, was of small concernment to the public; but it was expressed as a wish, on all sides of the house, that the universities would grant them relief in that respect, as well as to young students at the time of matriculation.

Lord George Germain insisted on its being a heavy grievance, for a youth at college to be required to sign his assent to, or belief of, the thirty-nine articles, earlier than the age of sixteen, when it was not to be supposed that he could understand them, or had formed any sentiments about them. A considerable time before, the meaning of the oaths of allegiance and supremacy was thought likely to be intelligible, and consequently was not administered. He informed the house, that the university of Cambridge had been applied to for a repeal of this statute; the practice being founded on a bye-law of their community, might be laid aside at pleasure; but notwithstanding the power being vested in them, they evaded compliance with the request, pleading that, as a standing rule, they ought not to dispense with it.

The same speaker undertook to defend the character of the petitioners, from the imputation which had been thrown out against them, that they renounced their principles, when, by subscribing the articles, they accepted of church benefices. He said, he lived in a county where many of the neighbouring clergy had signed the petition, whom he knew to be worthy, conscientious, and pious men; many had assented to the articles, with that forced construction which was put upon them by those who could not believe the truth of some of them. The sentiments which many entertained at the time when they gave their assent to those articles, had been by farther reflection changed, and their conscientious scruples, being awakened, by such a different view of things, rendered the step they were now taking highly laudable, and acquitted them of all imputation of dissimulation in their former conformity.

Mr. Soame Jenyns, in behalf of the university of Cambridge, said, that the practice of enjoining a subscription to the thirty-nine articles, being founded on a royal statute, ordained at the instance of king James I. the university did not consider itself at liberty to annul it.

Towards the close of the debate, lord North delivered his sentiments on the question; he said, when he came down to the house, he hoped to have seen nothing in the petition, to prevent him from recommending that it should be laid upon the table, meaning to oppose every attempt to go farther. Hereby designing to pay a compliment to the petitioners, out of respect to the principle upon which the petition was grounded, and then to move, that the farther consideration of it might be put off for six months; but in the course of the debate he said, a stronger objection had arisen in his mind against bringing it up, and which outweighed every respect which he wished to have paid to the importance of the subject, for he thought it repugnant to the act of union, and if such indulgencies should be granted, there would, after that time, be nothing that could exclude a man from the church of England, but popery; and he was convinced, that to make any innovations in the forms now prescribed to the clergy of the established church, would occasion such contentions in the nations, that neither poppy nor mandragara could ever medicine it to its former repose.

Mr. Dunning replied to this, that he never knew till then, that it was a principle of sound policy to narrow the means of access to emoluments; and he had always thought, that every good subject ought to be considered as entitled to a proportiona' chance for obtaining posts of profit and honour. In the course of the debate, he said, he had remarked, that the same premises had led different members to very opposite conclusions; one member observed, that our reformation from popery was affected by the spirit which this petition was designed to promote; and another member asserted, that the granting this petition had a direct tendency to bring us back to popery. He could not foresee that the quiet of the nation would be endangered by granting the prayer of the petition; but if the repose now enjoyed partook at all of that torpid state of insensibility, which his lordship's mandragara had diffused through that house, he should wish to see it broke in upon as soon as possible; for it was an alarming symptom, which, instead of betokening health, was the forerunner of destruction. The debates were continued till after midnight, when, on a division, there appeared for receiving the petition 71, against receiving it 217. The petitioners, by aiming at too much, lost every thing; had nothing farther been asked, than an exemption from subscription to some of the articles, such a request might probably have been attended to. The importance of this discussion has led me to be circumstantial in the relation of it. The debates are given from minutes which were taken in the house at the time, and were never printed.

The marriages of the two royal brothers, which had taken place during the summer, occasioned messages to be delivered from his majesty to both houses of parliament, in which he observed, that "being desirous, from paternal affection to his own family, and anxious concern for the future welfare of his people, and the honour and dignity of his crown, that the right of approving all marriages in the royal family, which ever has belonged to the kings of this realm, as a matter of public concern, may be made effectual, recommends to both houses, to take into their serious consideration, whether it may not be wise and expedient to supply the defects of the laws now in being; and, by some new provision, more effectually to guard the descendants of his late majesty, other than the issue of princesses who have married, or may hereafter marry, into foreign families, from marrying without the approbation of his majesty, his heirs, and successors, first had and obtained.

In compliance with this message, a bill was brought into the house of lords, which discovered the fullest disposition in that house to gratify every wish of his majesty in that respect. It acknowledged the legality of the powers claimed by the crown in the message, and enacted, that all marriages, entered into by any descendants of king George II., except only such as were particularly excepted in the message, without the previous consent of the king, or his successors on the throne, signified under the great seal, and declared in council, should be null and void. But if such descendants, having attained the age of twenty-five years, shall persist in his or her resolution to contract a marriage, disapproved of by the reigning prince; then, upon giving the privy-council twelve months previous notice of their design, they may, after the expiration of that term, enter into marriage with the person before proposed and rejected, without the royal consent; unless both houses of parliament shall, within that time, expressly declare their disapprobation of it; and whoever shall knowingly solemnize a marriage by this act forbidden, or assist at the celebration of such unlawful marriage, or any such matrimonial contract, on being duly convicted thereof, are declared to incur the pains and penalties ordained in the statute of provision and præmunire, made in the sixteenth year of the reign of Richard II.

The judges, having been consulted when the business was first brought into the house, declared it to be their opinion, that the care and the approbation of the marriages of the children and grand-children of the king, and the presumptive heir to the crown, (other than the issue of foreign families,) do belong to the kings of this realm; but to what other branch of the royal family such care and approbation do extend, they do not find precisely determined.

This bill met with great opposition in both houses; but notwithstanding every clause was strongly objected to, and a division of the house was called for on every part, yet it was carried through the house of lords in less than a fortnight; the numbers for the bill being 90, against it 26. It produced, however, two protests, one of which was signed by fourteen peers. The bill was therein reprobated, for the following reasons. The maxim laid down in the preamble, that because marriages of the royal family are of the highest importance to the state, they are therefore entrusted to the kings of this realm, is founded on a doctrine absurd and unconstitutional, but which hereafter will have the force of a parliamentary declaration of the law, the immediate tendency of which is to create as many prerogatives in the crown as there are matters of importance in the state; and, indeed, to extend them in a manner as vague and exceptionable as had ever been done, in the worst and most despotic period in the history of this nation; and they apprehended that some future, and even more dangerous use may be made of this preamble, as it is more extensive than is necessary for any purpose avowed in the bill; and this declaratory preamble is used, notwithstanding nine of the judges, in their unanimous opinion, delivered to the house of lords, do not find any authority in support of the prerogative, in that extent in which it is assumed. The descendants of George II. in course of time may become very numerous, and it is conceived to be an intolerable grievance, that the marriage of so many subjects, perhaps dispersed among the various ranks of civil life, should be subject to the restrictions of this act; the extensive power of which may, in time, render the first families in the kingdom totally dependent on the crown.

The age of twenty-one years appears to be the limit which the laws of this country, and the spirit of the constitution, have, with great wisdom, given to minority. It seems indecent to the royal family, to suppose they will not arrive at the age of discretion as soon as the lowest subject of the realm; and why may they not be as capable of choosing a wife at the age of twenty-one years, as of being entrusted with the regency of the kingdom, of which, by the law, they are at that age capable? Besides, the deferring their age of minority, as to marriage, till twenty-six, is impolitic and dangerous, as it may tend to drive them into a disorderly course of life, which ought the more to be guarded against in men of high rank, as the influence of their example is the most forcible and extensive.

The right of conferring a discretionary power, of prohibiting all marriages, was asserted, in the same protest, to be above the reach of any legislature, because contrary to the original inherent rights of human nature; which, as they are not derived from, or held under civil laws, by no civil laws whatever can be taken away; for though the legislature has a power of prescribing rules to marriage, as well as to every other species of contract, yet there is an essential difference between regulating the mode in which a right may be enjoyed, and establishing a principle which may tend entirely to annihilate that right. To disable a man, during his whole life, from contracting marriage, or what is tantamount, to make his power of contracting such marriage dependant neither on his own choice, nor upon any fixed rule of law, but on the arbitrary will of any man, or set of men, is exceeding the power permitted by the Divine Providence to human legislatures; it is directly against the earliest command given by God to mankind, contrary to the right of domestic society and comfort, and to the desire of lawful posterity, the first and best of the instincts planted in us by the Author of our nature, and utterly incompatible with all religion, natural and revealed, a mere act of power, having neither the nature nor obligation of law. This protest concluded with saying, "we cannot, therefore, on the whole, avoid expressing our strong disapprobation of an act, which shakes so many of the foundations of the law, religion, and public security, for ends wholly disproportioned to such extraordinary efforts, and in favour of regulations so ill-calculated to answer the purposes for which they are made; and we make this protest, that it may stand recorded to that posterity, which may suffer from the mischievous consequences of this act, that we have no part in the confusion and calamities brought upon them."

Another protest, which chiefly objected to the bill as a violation of the natural rights of mankind, and contrary to every principle of religion and humanity, was signed by six other peers, viz. Temple, Radnor, Clifton, Lyttleton, Abingdon, and Craven. The opposition of the bill was yet stronger in the house of commons. The preamble to the act was much objected to, as acknowledging and confirming the prerogative of the crown asserted in the message. A motion was made to omit that declaratory clause, when, after a very long debate, the motion was rejected by a majority of 36 only, when the house consisted of 364 members.

A motion was then made to insert a clause, "That the act should continue in force during the reign of his present majesty, and three years after his demise, but no longer;" but it was rejected by a majority of 18 only. Sir Joseph Manby remarked, that the title of the bill was not sufficiently expressive; to remedy which, he proposed that it should run, "An act" for enlarging and extending the prerogatives of the crown, and for the encouragement of adultery and fornication, under pretence of "regulating the marriages of the royal family." The bill continued for three weeks to engage the attention of the house, but was then passed, without any material alteration, by a majority of 50.

Mr. Sullivan, deputy chairman to the East India company, made a motion in the house of commons, March 30th, for leave to bring in a bill for the better regulation of the company's servants and concerns in India; the object of which bill was, to establish a great variety of new and important regulations in those remote territories. It aimed at restraining the governor and council of Bengal from all concerns in trade, went entirely to change the court of judicature, and the manner of administering justice there, and gave the court of directors a fuller control over their servants. This drew from lord Clive a long and laboured defence of his conduct, during his last expedition to India. He declared, that the sole motive which led him to expose his feeble constitution, broken as it was, in the service of the company, to the sultry climate of Hindostan, and to the fatigues and dangers of war, was, a desire of doing essential service to the company, under whose auspices he had acquired his fortune and his fame. That, instead of increasing his fortune, he was several thousands poorer thereby. He had been charged with establishing a most destructive monopoly of salt, beetle-net, tobacco, and other commodities in Bengal, which was a principal cause of dreadful famine and sickness, which prevailed there, and swept away some millions of the inhabitants. In speaking to this charge, he confined himself to the duties laid upon salt; which, according to the population which he reckoned to be in the country, and the proportion each individual paid towards the tax, furnished data to calculate the yearly produce, which appears to have been the enormous sum of £437,500 sterling. The reason he assigned for these imposts was, that the company's servants might receive an equivalent for the deductions made from their incomes, by the directors having absolutely forbidden the receiving of presents, and being deprived of a lucrative trade in salt. He acknowledged to have received 5-56ths share, which yielded him £32,000, which sum he distributed among his secretary, surgeon, and another gentleman, together with £5000 more. The establishing of a new gold currency in Bengal, during his lordship's presidency, had been represented as a measure calculated to enrich those concerned, to the great loss and injury of the province, as well as of the company. He exculpated himself by saying, that he knew nothing of the mixture of metals, and solemnly declared, that he reaped not a shilling profit by the coinage. He charged the directors very roundly with having, either through obstinacy or ignorance, deranged and frustrated the best concerted plans of regulation in Bengal. He attributed the unlooked-for embarrassments of the company's affairs to four causes: a negligence in administration; the misconduct of the directors; the outrageous behaviour of general courts; and the disobedience of the company's servants in the East Indies. When the business of the company came before parliament some years before, the object, he said, was not how to secure so beneficial a trade, and so great an empire, for a perpetuity, but to make an immediate dividend of £400,000 to the public, and £200,000 to the proprietary. The directors suddenly stopped prosecutions, restored the suspended, and undid every thing that had been done; and yet, by the bill which was then moved for, they were willing to disable themselves from ever withdrawing prosecutions for the future. They had erred likewise in being so eager to secure their annual election; the first half of the year, he said, has been consumed in freeing themselves from the obligations contracted by their last election; and the second half has been wasted in incurring new obligations, and forming an interest among the proprietors; but, in spite of all these manœuvres, the direction has been so fluctuating and unsettled, that fresh and contradictory orders have been sent out with every fleet; had they been less fickle and absurd, their concerns would have been much more consistently and uniformly managed. The malversation of their servants may justly be charged upon the fluctuation of their own councils; had they not concurred in restoring suspended and persecuted men, the governor and council would never have deliberated whether they should obey, or not, the orders of the direction. Fundamental principles being thus overturned, the whole system tumbles to the ground.

His lordship stated, that the clear net revenue of Bengal, for 1771, amounted to no more than £171,000, whilst the claim of government was £400,000. During his presidency, the largest net sum was brought into the treasury. The expences of the military establishment, as it is called, since that period, has gradually increased, until it rose to the present enormous sum of £1,800,000 per annum; the company's servants having found out the way of making fortunes, by charging exorbitantly in all contracts for furnishing the troops with provisions and other necessaries. Hence the revenue falls short, though the sum levied amounts to little less than four millions. The temptations to amass wealth, by indirect means, he said, were so great, that flesh and blood could not withstand them. He concluded with observing, that Bengal was the brightest jewel in the British crown.

Governor Johnstone replied to lord Clive's defence, in which he very ably arraigned his lordship's conduct, exposing the flimsiness and futility of the arguments brought in defence of it. He stated, that the highest duties that ever were collected on salt in Bengal were £72,000 a-year; the general medium was £40,000. The whole had been farmed for £32,000 a-year. The company, he insinuated, lost £300,000 in the progress of the frauds, as he called them, in the coinage. He did not mean, he said, to impeach his lordship's veracity, but he always understood, that the president had a certain per centage on all coinage; no doubt, as his lordship had said it, he made no profit of the great opportunity that occurred, but that he left that likewise to his friends; yet he could hardly admit, after such recent instances of his abilities, that he was so entirely ignorant of the mixture of metals, as his modesty would incline the house to believe. Do not all men know, continued he, that the purity of coin is a principal consideration in government, and that it is of the most dangerous consequence to tamper with it by any fraudulent mixtures? He asked, if his lordship could deny, that money was coined with 30 per cent. alloy? He objected to the bill before the house, and said, the British legislature should not move in the affairs of Asia, unless it acted with dignity and effect.

The bill was read a second time, and then laid by. The season was too far advanced for a business of that magnitude, and so complicated in its nature, to be properly discussed. A sensible and well-informed writer says, it seems pretty evident, that administration had no serious intention of entering deeply into that matter for the present, and that the subsequent movements, during the remainder of the session, were only intended to keep it alive, and to make, or find, some openings for that great revolution which it has since established in the affairs of the company. It was perhaps farther necessary, that this business should be so far entered into, as that the company should continue entangled in the hands of the parliament during the recess. However this may be, it is more than probable that no part of this plan was understood by the gentlemen who were the immediate actors in bringing the affairs of the company under consideration, and that they were actuated by very different motives.

So much light had been thrown on the transactions in India, and the conduct of the East India company's servants there, that the expediency of setting on foot a strict enquiry into the abuses of power, which had been long practised with impunity, was very evident, as well as that some salutary and effectual regulations should be adopted for the future prevention of those evils. Many were led to infer, from the facts which had come to light, how unequal a company of merchants were to the superintendance of such vast concerns of a civil nature, in which the lives and fortunes of millions of people were involved; and that the government of such opulent and extensive dominions should be subordinate to the superintendance and control of the state.

At length, a select committee, consisting of thirty-one members, was chosen by ballot, to enquire into the nature and state of the East India company, and the affairs in the East Indies. The objects of their enquiries were so various and extensive, that, before the rising of parliament, they applied for leave to sit during the recess.

While Mr. Sullivan's bill was before the house, a motion was made by sir Henry Haughton, for leave to bring in a bill for the relief of protestant dissenters, with respect to subscription to articles of faith. This attempt to gain an exemption from human imposition in matters of belief, was suggested by the favourable disposition which many members of the house of commons shewed, in the course of the debates on the clerical petition, to dissenting ministers, who were compellable by law, under heavy penalties, to subscribe to the doctrinal articles of a church, to which they did not belong, and from which they could derive no advantages, either in promotion or emolument.

By the act of toleration, which was passed immediately after the revolution, the free exercise of religious worship was allowed to such protestants as dissented from the establishment of the church of England, and their principles were allowed to be taught in private schools, on condition that such ministers and schoolmasters subscribed, before a justice of peace, to the doctrinal parts of the thirty-nine articles, a non-compliance with which exposed them to heavy pains and penalties, if they officiated either as pastors or tutors. So that, in fact, the liberty hereby granted reached only to such as adhered to the doctrines taught by Calvin, and who were, on that account, called Calvinists, which was almost the universal persuasion at that time; but, in the course of almost a century, great changes have taken place in the sentiments of protestants of all denominations, and as the principles of dissenters allow a greater latitude of opinion, and lead them more directly to free enquiries into the doctrines derived from scripture, such changes of sentiment were more likely to spread among them, than in the established church, whose tenets carry with them a prescriptive right to our assent. It is true, the penalties enacted against such dissenters, as did not subscribe in the manner enjoined, were not inflicted; but the same candour and moderation, which suffered them to become absolute, dictated their total repeal. The bill was carried through the house of commons by a great majority; but, upon a second reading in the house of lords, it was thrown out by 102 lords, including proxies, against 29.

On the 1st of May, lord North entered on the business of ways and means, for raising the supplies for the services, which had been voted early in the session, by opening his budget. The grants which had been made were calculated to amount to £5,886,253, and a million and a half 3 per cent. consolidated bank annuities, and South sea annuities, were paid off at £90, with a douceur of four lottery tickets, at £12 10*s.* each, for every £100 stock subscribed. The land-tax was brought back to 3*s.* in the pound; exchequer bills were continued to the usual amount; the East India company's annual payment was brought in aid, and the produce of the sinking fund was anticipated from the 5th of April, 1772, in the sum of £1,856,723.

His lordship, on this occasion, spoke with great exultation of the state of the kingdom, and the happy prospect which presented itself of a long continuance of peace; the probability of that happy event, he said, was greater than he had known it in his time; and should it continue for ten years, the expectation of which was no ways chimerical, seventeen millions of the national debt might be discharged, by pursuing the plan which had then been laid before the house. The diminution of the annual interest, payable on the national debt, arising from these regulations in the finances, would raise the income of the sinking fund, so as that, in conjunction with the ordinary taxes upon land, malt, and so forth, to make the yearly revenue amount to seven million. If, when arrived at that point, the nation should be forced into a war, it is not likely to cost us such enormous sums as when we stood single against France and Spain, and at the same time protected two sovereigns. If, said his lordship, we embark no farther in expences, than we did in wars preceding the last, our yearly disbursements would be, at an average, about seven millions, so that we shall be enabled to maintain such a war, without any additional taxes. We do not, said he, stand in need of any conquests, our dominions are at least as extensive as we could wish, and their improvement, not their extension, should be our chief aim. This opens to us a prospect, at least, of gradually reducing the national debt; a step, which will necessarily raise our credit and consequence in Europe, and terrify our enemies into pacific measures.

With this flattering picture, the house in general were extremely well pleased. In a time of profound peace, the national debt engages no one's attention, but a few speculating politicians, who look farther than the present moment. No stock holder wishes to receive his principal, but upon such terms of advantage, that he may replace his money in the public funds, at several per cent. profit. The terms on which this redemption was made, were lucrative beyond example; and the minister did not labour to conceal his opinion, that some persons might be more fortunate than others in an early subscription; but no one could set his name for more than £10,000 stock.

The house seemed wrapped in the contemplation of the permanent prosperity of the nation; and although nothing more erroneous than the general doctrine laid down, was ever delivered by a first lord of the treasury, yet the objections started were confined to the mode of discharging the million and a half. Besides the unnecessary profit which was allowed the stock holder, the blending indiscriminately two stocks, which statedly and invariably preserved a difference of 2 per cent. in their market price, was censured as highly injudicious. It was observed, that it was a maxim with administration to increase our expences according to the increase of our income. The minister was asked, if he would not, in the course of ten years, talk of new establishments, or payments of civil list arrears?

It is worthy of remark, on what slight foundation the salutary effects of a ten years' peace were built. The revenue, during the preceding year, had not increased, but had rather fallen off; the condition of the East India company, which the house was in possession of only a week or two before the vaunt was made, afforded the strongest reasons for apprehending that they were in no condition to make good their stipulated annual payment in future; and without it, although the land-tax seemed fixed, in perpetuity, at three shillings in the pound, during peace, a rate unprecedented in former times, the ordinary revenue would be quite inadequate to the objects proposed.

But supposing a coincidence of fortunate events, to realize the calculations of the minister, and we should not have been forced into a war, until the yearly revenue amounted to seven millions, with what shadow of reason could even such an income be supposed equal to the expences which would then be incurred? At the commencement of the war which king William waged with Lewis XIV., the charges were defrayed by supplies, raised and paid within the year; all the loans were supposed to be temporary, and to end with the collection. Too soon, however, the pernicious mode of borrowing on the credit of the supplies was introduced; which created opposite interests between the governors and the governed, and a debt of thirteen millions was incurred during that reign. In the next the national debt was increased twenty-six millions more, in consequence of a war, which continued twelve years. Notwithstanding almost universal peace prevailed for the twenty-seven years which followed the treaty of Utrecht, yet the national debt had, in that space of time, increased six millions; and during three years' war with Spain singly, and five years' war with Spain and France united, thirty-two millions were added to the national incumbrance. So that the wars waged by king William and queen Anne may be said to have been maintained at the expence of about two millions per annum; and the first war in the reign of George II. at four millions per annum. According to the progressive increase of expences, in every department, since committees of enquiry and accounts have been overruled, similar exertions could not be renewed at a less charge to the nation than five millions per annum. How then would a revenue of seven millions be adequate to carrying on the war, when more than four millions was swallowed up every year in a peace establishment? The session of parliament was closed, on the 9th of June, by a speech from the throne.

The dispute concerning the Middlesex election had not subsided, except that sir George Saville, every session, made what he called his annual protest against the decision of the house on that business, which passed without much debate; however, it was now revived, by being investigated in a new mode.

A cause was tried before lord Mansfield, at Westminster-hall, upon an action brought by Mr. Alderman Townsend against the collector of the land-tax, for distraining a large quantity of hay belonging to Mr. Townsend, upon his refusing to pay the assessment of the land-tax, he not being fully represented in parliament, and consequently he considered the tax as an illegal imposition. After the matter of Mr. Wilkes's different expulsions, rejections, and final incapacitation had been stated to the jury by Mr. Serjeant Glynn, and the house of commons seating Mr. Luttrell, although he had the fewest votes, the serjeant told them, if they coincided in opinion with him, that the county of Middlesex was not fully and fairly respresented, they would find for the plaintiff; but if they thought the present house of commons had authority to impose such a tax, the defendant was justified. He then produced the evidence of the poll books, the sheriff's return, &c. to prove that Mr. Wilkes was the legal representative for the county of Middlesex. The attorney-general, who was retained for the defendant, did not appear. Mr. Wallace, who was also retained, made no other reply than by producing the act of parliament, under the authority of which the collector had acted. Lord Mansfield then told the jury, that the question before them was, in fact, no other than, Whether there was at that time any legislative power in this country? If they acknowledged there was, then they must find for the defendant; and that as to the evidence offered to be produced by the serjeant, it was his opinion, that it was not by law competent, and was inadmissible. The jury, with little or no hesitation, found for the defendant. Mr. Townsend, who was present in court, then declared, that the affair should there end.

On the 14th of August, lord Hillsborough resigned his post of secretary of state for the American colonies, as well as that of first lord of trade, and was succeeded in both by the earl of Dartmouth. Soon after his retiring from these offices, he was advanced to the rank of earl of Great Britain. Lord Dartmouth, in parliament, had voted for the repeal of the stamp-act, and since that event had always opposed the taxation of America. From the advancement of this nobleman, therefore, it was concluded, that a new system of government would take place with respect to the colonies. The earl of Harcourt succeeded lord Townsend in the lieutenantcy of Ireland, when the latter was appointed master-general of the ordnance; on the death of the earl of Albemarle, general Conway obtained the government of the isle of Jersey, when sir Jeffery Amherst succeeded as lieutenant-general of the ordnance, and was afterwards called to the privy-council. Lord Stormont was appointed ambassador-extraordinary at the court of Versailles, in the room of the earl of Harcourt. Mr. Jenkinson was appointed vice-treasurer of Ireland, and Mr. Charles Fox a lord of the treasury in his room.

The nation had now enjoyed a nine years' peace; and that active spirit, so prevalent in this country, and characteristic of the people, discovered itself in great and laudable undertakings, which tended to facilitate inland traffic, and to open a ready communication between great trading towns, by means of navigable canals. The commerce with America indeed languished, in consequence of the disagreement which had broke out between this country and these colonies; the beneficial commerce with Portugal was on the decline; the Levant trade too, once so profitable on account of the demand which it caused for our manufactures, as well as for the productions of our West India islands, and on account of the balance which accrued from it, was no longer important. The southern parts of France had for many years availed themselves of the advantage which their situation afforded, and undersold us in all the Turkish ports. But the loss of this trade was now compensated by the great increase of the commerce with Russia, in consequence of the advances made in civilization throughout that extensive empire; and the endeavours used by the empress to introduce, among the higher orders of the state, the arts and manners of the polished kingdoms of Europe. Notwithstanding this circumstance, our foreign trade, taken in the aggregate, was much on the decline; and the balance was against us in many parts of Europe, owing to the great increase of luxury throughout the kingdom; in proof of which, although our gold coin was reduced to a disgraceful state of deficiency, yet considerable quantities were clandestinely exported, particularly by the Jews.

Asia was the quarter of the world, from whence the nation enjoyed an influx of riches. Numbers of those who had acquired fortunes in India, returned every year to their native country; these in general being eager to purchase estates, the value of land rose to a height which it had never before reached; the public and private banks were full of cash; insomuch, that it has been said to have been in the contemplation of government, to reduce the legal rate of interest from five to four per cent., for notwithstanding these appearances of wealth in the nation, the public funds were considerably lower than they had been soon after the peace took place.

This state of the kingdom was very favourable to the enterprise and industry of the manufacturer and merchant, as it facilitated the procurement of money on personal security; but, at the same time, it encouraged a very destructive mode of raising money, by drawing and negotiating bills of exchange, and issuing notes of hand, for which no valuable consideration was given in the first instance; and the ease with which an imaginary capital was thus raised and maintained, occasioned the abuse to be carried to such an excess, as in the end threatened the destruction of all confidence between man and man. People of no fortune, or even such as were actually insolvent, without having incurred the suspicion of it, were enabled to keep up an appearance of opulence for a time, and to pursue desperate schemes, under the vain expectation of speedily becoming rich. Dissipation and extravagance were at once the causes of such practices, and the effects produced by them. The mass of unthinking men grew unmindful of their expences, because they were enabled to raise present money to defray them; whilst others were driven to such expedients, when profusion had wasted their fortunes. Another practice, which was equally prevalent at the time now spoken of, was hazarding desperate stakes on the fluctuations of the public funds. It is true, that the mischievous practice of stock-jobbing has prevailed almost ever since the creation of a national debt; but the great fluctuation in the price of India stock, about this time, afforded greater scope than usual to the insatiate gamester. Sir G. Colebrooke, an adventurer, whose conduct was neither under the restraints of prudence nor of principle, and who had risen in a few years from the condition of a servant to be a partner and chief manager in a very respectable banking-house, having for some time speculated with success in the alley, and realised a fortune, became intoxicated with his elevation; he rivalled peers, and even East India nabobs, in his profuse mode of living; and, confiding in the supposed superiority of his penetration, made contracts for the delivery of India stock to an immense amount, at a short future day, fully assured of its falling considerably in the intervening time. In this expectation he was however deceived; the stock rose to a great height, and himself and his partners were involved in one sudden ruin. Commercial credit was greatly affected by this failure, especially as it was immediately followed by the ruin of other eminent bankers, and many considerable merchants. The concussion was dreadful; all the airy bubbles of substantial consequence in the trading world, now burst at once. In this state of general distrust and alarm, the bank of England refused to discount all bills; and many men of the most unquestionable property, who had embarked in large concerns, felt all the embarrassments of poverty, being unable to raise immediate money on any kind of security. Many wealthy families were totally ruined by the failure of others. The opulent tradesman was no longer considered as an object of envy by the country gentleman, who now beheld him as deriving all his consequence from precarious and delusive dependencies, while the landholder, although perhaps obliged to live in a manner more circumscribed, held his fortune by too permanent a tenure to be endangered by the indiscretions of others. This violent shock, however, in its consequences, served to place commercial intercourse on a more solid and beneficial basis, by inculcating wholesome caution and prudent reserve.

CHAPTER XXII.

GEORGE III.

[1772, 1773.]

Meeting of Parliament—Embarrassments of the East India Company—Plan for sending out Supervisors—Secret Committee chosen by the House of Commons, to enquire into the state of the Company—Report made by the Chairman—Discussion of the rights which the Company possessed by virtue of their Charter—Bill to restrain the Company from sending out Supervisors—Petitions of the Proprietors of India Stock to the House—Revenue drawn from the Company by Government—Abuses in Bengal—Conduct of Administration towards the Company arraigned—Proceedings of the House of Lords—Protest—Enquiry into the Expedition against the Caribbs—Condition of the Island of St. Vincent at the Peace—Augmentation of the Half-pay of Captains in the Navy—The East India Company apply to Parliament for a Loan—Regulations proposed by Lord North—Reports from the Select Committee—The Company permitted to export their Teas duty free—Remonstrance—Address from the Company to Parliament—Bill for regulating the Company's Affairs, as well in India as in Europe—Charges exhibited against Lord Clive—Reasons which probably operated to defeat the Enquiry—Protest of the Lords against the Bill for regulating the East India Company—The Loan refused on the Conditions prescribed—The Company compelled to accept it—Vast Influence acquired by Government—State of Finance for the Year 1773.

WHILST the commercial part of the nation was shaken by these unexpected events, the parliament was called to meet early in the winter, in consequence of the no less alarming state of the East India company.

1772. NOVEMBER the 26th, his majesty opened the session of parliament by a speech from the throne; in which he told them, that he had called them thus early together, that they might have an opportunity of being fully informed of the true state of the East India company's affairs, and that they might make such provisions, for the common benefit and security of all the various interests concerned, as they shall find best adapted to the exigencies of the case.

THE flattering prospects which the company's servants in Bengal had held out, of the immense wealth which would be derived to the proprietary, from the territorial acquisitions there, had proved no other than vain delusions. The company had accepted bills from India, to the amount of more than a million sterling, which was four times the amount which they had allowed the council to draw for; and, in consequence of the failure of returns from thence, was indebted to the bank for money borrowed, on the revenue of the customs, for duties on goods; and had not a sufficient sum in their treasury to make good their quarterly payment of £100,000 to government.

THE manner in which the company had been set at nought by its servants in India, whilst the most positive orders of the directors were either evaded or utterly disregarded, had led it to send out supervisors in the year 1769. These gentlemen were invested with very extensive powers, by the exercise of which, it was hoped, that a general reform would have been brought about, and a radical cure of these growing evils effected. But the ship, in which they were embarked, was never heard of after she sailed from the cape of Good Hope, so that the mal-administration in Hindostan continued without restraint or control. The bill which Mr. Sullivan brought in during the last session of parliament, but which the house rejected, aimed at new-modelling entirely the government of Bengal. During the summer, the company had resolved on sending out supervisors to India, and six gentlemen were nominated to that important trust.

When the address, in answer to the king's speech, was moved for in the house of commons, by the honourable Mr. Fitzpatrick, he expatiated on the enormous abuses practised in India, and represented the company as being in a ruinous and desperate condition. Lord North drew a different picture. He said, that from every thing he could learn respecting the state of the company, their embarrassments, though grievous for the present, were not of such a nature as to weaken their stability; that their vast stock of teas, and the merchandize imported from their different settlements, all which were safely deposited at home, besides their property in India, and what were floating on the seas, proved that their present embarrassments were only temporary, and ought not to affect the credit of the company. He then made a motion, that a committee of secrecy, consisting of thirteen persons, should be chosen by ballot; which, after considerable opposition, was adopted by the house.*

This committee was furnished with full powers, and it was laid down to them, as an instruction to take into particular consideration, the measure of sending out a commission of supervisors to any part of our territories in the East Indies. The select committee, which had been chosen the last session, was then revived, more perhaps from a respect to the members who composed it, than from any views which the minister entertained, of accomplishing his purposes by its means.

The chairman of the secret committee reported to the house, on the 7th of December, that the East India company, notwithstanding their acknowledged distresses for want of money, were preparing to send out a commission of supervisors to India, the expence attending which was calculated at £120,000 per annum, which would still add to their distress, and recommended that a bill should be brought in to restrain them, for a limited time, from sending out supervisors; and a bill was brought in accordingly.

All the powers of eloquence, and force of reasoning, were called forth in the discussion of this momentous point. The attorney and solicitor-general contended, that the character of the company did not empower it to appoint supervisors. The malversations which had been so long practised with impunity in the East, were represented as too enormous for any effort of the court of directors to correct; and that the powers which government possessed were alone capable of restoring the inhabitants of Hindostan to the secure enjoyment of liberty and property, curbing rapacity and violence, and directing the revenues of that extensive country into their proper channels. The subject naturally led to the enquiry, whether a company of merchants, acting under a charter, have a right to conquer or retain dominions, and establish civil regulations there, independent of the state to which they belong.

In the progress of this restraining bill through the house, Mr. Sullivan delivered a petition from the East India company against it; in which, with all deference to the wisdom and supreme authority of parliament, they represent the bill as subversive of those rights which they hold under their charter, the privileges of which have been purchased by their predecessors from the public, for a valuable consideration, confirmed by several acts of parliament, the provisions of which the petitioners are not in any degree conscious of having violated.

It then complained, that the report of the secret committee, upon which the bill was to proceed, was erroneous, with respect to the calculation of the expences; and, if their affairs had been examined in a public manner, the petitioners might have had an opportunity of attending to their several interests. The report, which would then have been made, would have been very different from that which has appeared. It then stated, that the expences of the commission was designed to have been defrayed from a part of the savings proposed to be made thereby, so that the creditors of the company could not have been injured in any degree, but must have been, on the contrary, greatly benefited. It suggested the dangerous consequences to the company arising from such a bill, which would prevent them from taking the necessary steps for the arrangement of their affairs, and deprive them of the means of fulfilling their engagements to the public; and concluded with claiming, with all humility, the benefit of the law of the land, and the public faith of the nation, for the free enjoyment and exercise of the rights and powers which they held under their charter, and prayed that they might be heard, by themselves or their counsel, against the bill.

* The gentlemen chosen were, Mr. Alderman Harley, chairman, (whose great uncle, the first earl of Oxford, was an arbitrator, chosen to adjust the interests of the two East India companies, when they were united, 1701,) lord Frederic Campbell, lord Palmerstone, Mr. Rigby, Mr. Stanley, Mr. Jenkinson, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Fitzpatrick, Mr. Burrell, Mr. Ryder, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Eames, and Mr. Gilbert.

Counsel being hereupon admitted, it was given in evidence at the bar of the house, that government had received, by the net duties and the stipulated £400,000, little less than two millions annually from the company, which, at the same time, had lost a million by the indemnity agreement upon tea, of which £700,000 went to government, and the remainder to the purchasers. The whole of the company's receipts of dividends, during the five last years, scarcely amounted to £900,000 more than 6 per cent. upon its capital, which was the lowest trading dividend that had ever been made, during the most expensive and dangerous war. It appeared upon the whole, that the company's mercantile profits, during the above period, amounted on an average to £464,000 annually, which would have afforded a dividend of $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; so that while government profited to the great amount of two millions, the proprietary, instead of reaping any benefit, lost considerably that share of the dividend, which the profit of their trade only, independent of the territorial revenues, would have afforded.

These facts were much insisted on by the counsel, who were heard on the third reading. The abuses in India, particularly at Bengal, were represented with equal precision. In the military establishment there, the annual expence of 30,000 soldiers, not 4000 of whom were Europeans, amounted to above a million. At fort St. George, where an army of 23,000 men was maintained, of which 4400 were Europeans, the annual expence was near £300,000. By putting the Bengal army on a similar footing with that at fort St. George, the expence ought to be very little more than £400,000. If this reform could by any means be brought about, the saving to the company would exceed half a million annually.

The same gradation of profusion was observed in the civil establishment. At Bengal, 171 civil servants annually cost the company £300,000, and at fort St. George 114 civil servants cost only 50,000. These were said to be proper objects of regulation; and it was evident, that great savings, and such as prodigiously exceeded the expences of supervisors, might be made.

Besides the regulations necessary to be introduced into the civil and military establishments, other œconomical plans might be adopted. Great abuses had been committed in making additional fortifications, and building barracks. The whole expence of forts, since 1765, the time when the select committee at Bengal was first instituted, amounted to more than £1,200,000. The natives were likewise grievously oppressed, not only by heavy duties on all the necessaries of life, but by a tax called Malooi, which was levied under pretext of repairing bridges, roads, &c. the produce of which was divided among the committee.

Until the select committee of lord Clive had the direction of affairs, the civil and military expences of the company at Bengal had never exceeded £700,000. The next year, 1766, they came up to £900,000, and so on gradually, till at length, in 1771, they amounted to £1,800,000 sterling. This detail clearly demonstrated, that a commission of able and upright men, vested with just power and authority, might save the company sums, against which the expence of the supervisors would weigh but light in the scale. The counsel contended, that the company claimed a right of managing their own concerns, by the powers vested in them by their charter, and likewise in return for signal services which they had rendered to the nation.

Thus the evidence given in at the bar, and the pleading of counsel, served to establish facts which were not before doubted, namely, the great delinquency of the company's servants; but they did not tend to confirm the belief, that the company was competent to the redress of these abuses, especially as the select committee at Calcutta, from whence these enormities had sprung, was formed for the purpose of correcting such evils.

The important question was, whether the present exigency and imbecility of the company were such as warranted the interposition of parliament. Lord George Germain acknowledged the bill to be a great stretch of parliamentary authority, and not to be justifiable, but by the most cogent necessity, which precedes all other law; but he saw, in that instance, the necessity pressing upon the house to interfere, in the clearest manner.

Lord John Cavendish was of a different opinion. He said, When extraordinary remedies become the ordinary engines of government, you may be assured you have a weak ministry. Men of superior, and even of common abilities foresee, and endeavour to prevent great evils; and if, in the fluctuation of human events, such evils should nevertheless arise, they know how to remove them, without offering violence to the general system; to those sacred institutions, which are to human society what gravitation is to the constitution of the universe.

On this occasion Mr. Burke displayed all those rare qualities of the head and heart, with which he was so eminently gifted. He observed, that in 1767, parliament took the state of the East India company's trade and revenue into consideration, for the doing which five reasons were assigned: the maintenance of the public faith—the support of public credit—the increase of the company's trade—the increase of its revenues—and the security of the stock-holders. This grand and salutary plan was entered upon. Books upon books, and papers upon papers, were brought up and piled upon the table. The subject was considered and reconsidered; debate succeeded debate, and resolution followed resolution. One and forty times did the house sit on this business, and more than once till four o'clock in the morning. What was the result? Quid ferat hic tantum dignum promissor hiatu? What did this mountain in labour bring forth? No mouse truly, but a fair round sum of £400,000 a year to government. In this manner did parliament provide for the maintenance of the public faith, and the support of public credit! In this manner did parliament increase the company's trade and revenue, and give security to the stock-holders! When the company came down handsomely, and furnished a reasonable sum to pay off the arrears of the civil list; arrears so honourably and usefully contracted, the five reasons were forgot. The eyes of parliament were dazzled, and could no longer see how to make any regulations for securing the permanence and stability, of that lucrative bargain which it had made. The company, without the aid of precedent, without the light of experience, without chart or compass, was allowed to steer at random through this perilous ocean. What wonder that they lost their course! The wonder would have been, if, assisted by no lights but by those communicated by servants, interested through the fear of past embezzlement, and the hope of future peculation, to mislead, they had not been bewildered and lost. The distress of the company arises from the improvidence of administration, and the short-sightedness of parliament, suitable to its form and constitution. He added, Or am I mistaken? Were the affairs of the company designedly left in confusion? Were the directors left without any effectual control over delinquent servants? Was the collection of the revenues left without any check? Was the tyranny of a double government, like our double cabinet, tolerated with a view of seeing the concerns of the company become an absolute chaos of disorder, and a means of giving government a handle for seizing the territorial revenue? I know that this was the original scheme of administration, and I violently suspect that it never has been relinquished. If the ministry have no sinister view, if they do not mean by this unconstitutional step to extend the influence of the crown, they will now speak out, and explicitly declare their intentions. Their silence may be justly construed into a confession of such a design, and they will thenceforth be considered as the determined enemies of the liberty of their country. God knows that the places and pensions and expectancies furnished by the British establishment, are too powerful for the small remains of patriotism and public spirit that remain in our island. What then will become of us, if Bengal, if the Ganges pour in a new tide of corruption? Should the evil genius of British liberty so ordain it, I fear this house will be so far from removing the corruption of the East, that it will be corrupted by it. I dread more from the infection of that place, than I hope from the virtue of this house. Was it not the sudden plunder of the East that gave the final blow to the freedom of Rome? What reason have we to expect a better fate? I conjure you, by every thing which man ought to hold sacred; I conjure you, by the spirits of your forefathers, who so nobly fought and bled for the cause for which I now plead; I conjure you, by what includes every thing, by your country, not to yield to the temptations which the East, in the hands of the crown, holds out; not to sink into the gulph of corruption, and to drag after you your posterity, your country. I obtest heaven and earth, that in all places, and at all times, I have hitherto rejected the gilded hand of corruption, and endeavoured to stem the torrent which threatens to overwhelm this land. Upon the whole, the bill is dangerous in itself, as being the first step towards a total invasion of the company's territories in Bengal; and should we admit the motives which lead to it to be good, yet such a step is dangerous as a precedent; I do not, however, deny that the house has power to pass it, but you have not the right. There is a perpetual confusion in gentlemen's ideas, from inattention to this material distinction; from which, properly considered, it will appear that this bill is contrary to the eternal laws of right and wrong; laws that ought to bind all men, and, above all, men in legislative assemblies! Upon a division, the bill passed, by a majority of 153 to 28.

In the house of lords, it met with a faint opposition, but was productive of a protest, in which, among many other reasons assigned, it was opposed because it appears that the company were not only authorised by law, but bound in duty to appoint a commission for regulating their affairs, and correcting abuses. It might have been alleged against the company, that the neglect of applying legal powers for the ends for which such powers were given, was a matter of delinquency in that corporation, and might have subjected them to process in the courts below, or to an adverse proceeding in parliament. It is a government, the protesters conceive, full of deceit as well as violence, where men are to be punished if they decline, or to be restrained if they endeavour to exercise their lawful powers. The bill passed by 26 to 6. No sooner was this business dispatched, than the two houses adjourned for the Christmas recess.

When the parliament was re-assembled, the honourable Mr. Thomas Townshend moved for an enquiry into an expedition which had been made against the Caribbean Indians, dwelling on the island of St. Vincent in the West Indies. 1773.

This island, together with those of St. Lucia and Dominica, had been formerly considered, both by us and the French, as neutral, and the natives as lawful possessors of the soil. When St. Vincent's became subject to Great Britain at the peace of Fontainbleau, the French planters had settled in the northern or leeward parts, whilst the native Caribbeans occupied the windward or southern districts. When orders were issued from the treasury for the sale of lands in the ceded islands, the French possessors on this spot were required to pay certain stipulated sums for the lands which they occupied, the right by which they held them being considered as invalid; orders were given, that the Caribbs should not be disturbed in their possessions, whilst they observed a quiet and inoffensive demeanour. Among these Caribbs were about 1600 fighting men. The new settlers, who arrived from England, soon beheld with a jealous eye the fertile plains which were occupied by these people. They proposed an exchange of lands, by which these Indians would possess a part of the island equally convenient for their occupations of hunting and fishing, but, being overrun with wood, unfavourable for cultivation. This proposed exchange was approved by government at home, but rejected with great spirit by the Caribbs, who insisted on their right of retaining the lands which they possessed, in the same independent manner in which they had hitherto held them; declaring that they acknowledged no more subjection to the king of Great Britain than they had formerly done to the monarch of France. This firm maintenance of their natural rights was represented by the rapacious planters as a dangerous extirpating spirit, which exposed the new colony to continual danger of being overwhelmed; and it was submitted to government, whether it was not expedient to transport this unhappy people, either to the coast of Africa, or to the desart island of St.

Matthew. The latter scheme was at length complied with, on condition that they could not be brought to submit to the English government, and instructions were sent by lord Hillsborough to provide them with every necessary accommodation, and shew them the most humane treatment, both in their conveyance to, and establishment in their new settlement. But as the Caribbs were highly irritated at being thus dispossessed of their native possessions, and as there was no force on the island sufficient to execute the orders in April 1772, general Gage was directed to send two regiments from North America to St. Vincent's, and a force nearly equal thereto was collected from the other islands. The arrival of these troops, together with some men of war, which were designed to co-operate in the attack, no ways intimidated the Caribbs, who defended themselves with their bows and arrows, and other missile weapons, in the use of which they were very expert. The rainy season, which was then set in, and the want of proper huts to shelter the troops, caused great sickness among them, the accounts of which, that were transmitted to England, joined to the supposed injustice of the war which was waging, gave birth to enquiry; which, however, was deferred from time to time, in expectation of some official advices being received. It was not until the 12th of February 1773, that witnesses were examined at the bar, some of whom represented the Caribbs as a quiet, friendly, and fair-dealing race of men, who had been driven to acts of hostility by the injustice and avarice of the new settlers from England, whilst others described them as perfidious and cruel with violent passions, indulging a lawless freedom in the gratification of them, and from their attachment to the French, as dangerous neighbours, especially in a new settlement. The evidence being gone through, Mr. Townshend made two motions, the first of which was, "that this expedition to St. Vincent was undertaken without sufficient provocation on the part of the Caribbs, upon the representation of interested men, and must, if successful, end in their total extirpation. The second, "that the military were sent out in an improper season of the year, and that it was likely to end in the ruin of some of the best troops in the service."

After much debate, the house divided; for the first motion 88, against it 206; for the second 78, against it 99.

Whilst the subject was thus agitating in parliament, a treaty was entered into between the Caribbs and major-general Dalrymple, who commanded the king's troops, by which the former agreed to become the subjects of the king of Great Britain, to take an oath of fidelity and allegiance, to submit to the laws and government of the island, so far as related to their intercourse, and to all transactions with the white inhabitants; but in their own districts, and in all matters that related to each other, they were to retain their antient customs and usages. They by the same instrument ceded a large tract of valuable land to the crown, in consideration of those parts of the island, which they retained, being secured to them and their posterity for ever.

The sale of lands, in the ceded islands, was a measure which had drawn on ministry much censure. The exigencies of the state were urged in its defence, and the large sums which would thereby be brought into the treasury; but although the lands were sold, the sums received by government were very inconsiderable, so that the scheme evidently tended iniquitously to enrich individuals, without benefiting the state; notwithstanding which flagrant malversation, no enquiry was set on foot, so that it was not the East India company alone that was plundered by its servants.

February 9th, lord Howe brought up a petition from the captains of the navy, praying a small addition to their half-pay. Lord North informed the house, that no matter which was to affect the public revenue, ought to be agitated there, without the consent of the crown, given by some of its officers; he did not, however, mean to oppose the petition on that ground, and would give his consent to its being brought up, but he meant for many cogent reasons to oppose it through every stage.

Notwithstanding the authority which declared against the petition, and that the three most eminent naval commanders, Hawke, Saunders, and Keppel, were prevented from attending on account of indisposition, the house in general seemed heartily to enter into the interests of the petitioners.

Lord Howe stated to the house the grounds on which the request of the petitioners was founded, by taking a view of the manner of paying and providing for the captains of the navy, from the time of their having a permanent existence as a military body, to the establishment by which their pay was now regulated. He described the manner in which they were provided for in times of peace, during the reigns of Charles II., James II., king William, and queen Anne, and shewed, that until the year 1715, when they were put on the footing in which they had ever since continued, they were always highly rewarded, by posts of considerable profit, by particular gratifications, and by a half-pay double to what they now received. His lordship therefore moved, that the petition might be referred to a committee in order to consider the same, and report their opinion to the house.

Lord North acknowledged the merits of the petitioners, and their claims on their country for favour and support; but lamented that the present situation of our finances would not admit of any additional expences being incurred, however forcible the plea which might be urged for them. He observed, that by granting the petition this house would be importuned with many more. The military would next solicit relief; and he was informed that the shipwrights meant to prefer a petition for an advance of their wages, and it would be impossible for the state to comply with the request of such numerous bodies.

Sir Gilbert Elliot, treasurer of the navy, entered into an historical detail of the public provisions made for the navy, both in times of non-employment and actual service, from the reign of Henry VIII., when a naval force was first regularly established, to that of king William, and concluded with stating some pertinent facts which occurred in the latter reign. In the year 1692, the pay of a captain in the navy was 27*s. per diem*, with an allowance of twelve servants, at 6*d.* per day each, which made the whole 33*s.* The year after, a different arrangement took place; the pay was raised to 30*s.* and the allowance for servants struck off. During both these regulations the half-pay was 15*s.* The year 1699 was remarkable for a variety of œconomical reforms, among which the expences of the naval department were retrenched. The full pay of captains was reduced from 30*s.* to 20*s.* with which likewise the half-pay list was to conform. Soon after the peace of Utrecht it underwent another considerable reduction, which brought it to the rate at which it now stood. He did not however wish that the house should comply with the present application.

In support of the petition it was alleged, that not more than £5000 or £6000 per annum would be required to gratify the wishes of so respectable a body of men, to whom the nation owed the highest obligations; and it was asked, Is that a sum to affect a great opulent nation at the end of a ten years' peace, when France, notwithstanding her defeats, distresses, and public insolvency, had the good policy to make a provision for her navy captains. The large sums which, in the last session, had been voted for virtú, and other purposes of much less national concernment, were placed in contrast to the present parsimonious humour.

Upon a division, the petition was received by a majority of nine, the numbers being 154 to 145. Upon which occasion the first lord of the treasury found himself again in a minority. An address was soon after presented to his majesty, that an addition of 2*s.* a day might be paid to the half-pay of navy captains; which brought it to about £110 per annum. When the bill came out of the committee, lord North not only supported it, but proposed that it should be extended to increasing the pay of captains in the navy, commanding fifth and sixth rates, in actual service; but this amendment was overruled.

Notwithstanding the deplorable state of affairs in the East Indies, a twelvemonth had passed, in which parliament had directed its attention merely to negative the plans for reformation which the directors and proprietary had adopted; during which time, a wide scope was given to that spirit of rapacity which universally prevailed in India. The time was, however, at length arrived, for the minister to change his ground, whilst such events had occurred as tended to gratify every wish which the most ambitious statesman could form.

At a general court of proprietors of India stock, held on the 24th of February 1773, the question was decided by ballot, whether an application should be made to parliament for a loan of a million and a half, or so much as should be wanted by instalments for four years, at £4 per cent. per annum, with liberty of repaying the same, as soon as the company may be able, by payments of not less than £300,000. It was carried 405 to 199.

In consequence of this resolution, a petition was presented to parliament for that purpose; and it was therein farther proposed, that the company should not make a dividend of more than 6 per cent. until one half of the proposed loan was discharged, when they might raise their dividend to 8 per cent.; and, after the whole loan was discharged, that the surplus of the net profits arising in England, above the said dividend, should be appropriated to the payment of the company's bond debt, until it was reduced to a million and a half, and from thence, that the surplus profits should be equally divided between the public and the company. It was also requested, that the company should be released from the heavy penal interest incurred by the non-payment of money, owing in consequence of the late acts for the indemnities on teas, and also discharged from the annual payment of £400,000 to the public, for the remainder of the five years specified in the agreement.

A committee of the whole house proceeded to take into consideration the affairs of the East India company. Lord North entered on the business by disclaiming the idea, that the company, in their present exigency, had a claim of right upon the public for relief. He represented the vast sums, which had been paid into the exchequer by the company, as bearing no proportion to the revenues drawn from the Asiatic territories. The depredations of their servants in India, neither the minister nor the house of commons were any ways accessary to, or answerable for; but the granting relief to the company was a matter of necessary policy and expediency, although in no degree a claim of right or justice. He then entered largely into the state of the company, and declared it to be a fact, that the directors had proposed a dividend at the very time when the company was in little better than an insolvent state, and before the next September the company would be deficient £1,300,425. To extricate this great commercial body from so alarming a situation, various plans had been suggested. One was, that the company might be empowered to borrow money, upon bond, to the amount of what they wanted; but he disapproved of that method, as they had already stretched their credit too far in that way. Funding the company's bills was another expedient named; but this, his lordship said, would not answer the purpose, because it would not bring immediate relief. So that, upon the whole, he thought it for the interest of the public, that the relief granted to the company should come from the public, at the same time taking the necessary precautions to prevent the like distresses befalling the company in future. He therefore proposed two resolutions to be adopted by the house, by which a loan of £1,400,000 should be granted, and not more than 6 per cent. be divided among the proprietors, until the whole should be repaid; that the company be allowed to divide no more than 7 per cent. until their bond-debt be reduced to a million and a half, and no more than 8 per cent. before the participation of profits between the public and the company shall take place. The latter proposition was rejected. At the same time his lordship waved the particular discussion of the question, concerning the company's claim of exclusive right to its territorial possessions, yet insisted on a prior right in the state, from whence he inferred the justice and legality of interposing its authority, in all cases, in the company's affairs, and supported his assertion by the opinion of very sound lawyers, whom he styled the luminaries of the age, who had declared, that such territorial possessions as the subjects of any state shall acquire by conquest, are virtually the property of the state, and not of those individuals who acquire them.

Although the question of right in the company, to receive the revenues from Bengal, was not at the time the subject of debate; yet such an opinion being incidentally delivered by the premier, drew forth replies, and it was insisted, that when the state makes a solemn and authentic delegation of its authority to a distinct and separate body, it cannot, consistently with justice and public faith, lay claim to possessions which that body may legally acquire. And it was insisted, that the company's possessions in India were not strictly conquests, but farms held from the prince, who was their proprietor and rightful owner, and that a question of property of that nature was to be decided in a court of justice, and was not a proper subject of discussion for the house of commons, where the public, who was a party in the cause, would sit in judgment.

At length, after the subject in general had been much discussed, lord North informed the house, that, in answer to the petition of the East India company of the 2nd of March, the king had left the sole determination of the affair to that house. His lordship then proceeded to state the propositions which he had to make to the house; the first of which was, "That it is the opinion of this house, it will be more beneficial to the public, and the East India company, to let the territorial acquisitions remain in the possession of the company for a limited time, not exceeding the term of six years, to commence from the agreement between the public and the company."

"That no participation of profits shall take place between the public and the company, until after the repayment of the £1,400,000 advanced to the company, and the reduction of the company's bond debt to a million and a half.

"That after the payment of the loan advanced to the company, and the reduction of their bond debt to the sum specified, three-fourths of the net surplus profits of the company at home, above the sum of 8 per cent. upon their capital stock, shall be paid into the exchequer for the use of the public, and the remaining one-fourth shall be set apart, either for farther reducing the company's bond debt, or for composing a fund for the discharge of any contingent exigencies the company may labour under."

These conditions, proposed by the minister, differed in many particulars from those offered by the company. An essential difference was in the distribution to be made of the surplus profits between the company and the public, after the reduction of their bond debts, and being able to divide to the proprietary 8 per cent. per annum on their capital. Indeed, this was not the first instance in which parliament interfered to regulate the conduct of the company; for in the year 1730, an act passed, by which the interest on the company's stock was reduced from £5 to £4 per cent. but it was in compliance with a petition from the company. As the regulations now proposed were only the forerunners of very extraordinary innovations in the government of Bengal, many objections were made to them. Mr. Burke took a comprehensive view of the subject; or, as he himself afterwards called it, "a bird's eye view." I have studied, said he, God knows, hard have I studied, even to the making dog's ears in the statute books, and I now publicly and solemnly declare, that all you have been doing, and all you are about to do, in behalf of the East India company, is impolitic, unwise, and entirely repugnant to the letter as well as the spirit of the laws, the liberties, and the constitution of this country. I will venture to prophesy, that this company, viper-like, will in the end prove the destruction of the country which fostered it in its bosom. He founded his prediction on the total want of principle, so observable among all ranks and degrees of people, caused in a great measure by the profusion, dissipation, and profligacy of those who had brought with them the spoils of the East to contaminate their native country. The people, he said, were grown so indifferent to the welfare of their country on the one hand, and so grossly corrupt on the other, that there was no proposal, how destructive soever to the liberties of the kingdom, which a minister could make, but what the people would readily comply with. In the proceedings relative to the East India company, the people followed the cry of the ministry, changed as they changed, and varied their tones to keep even a discordant sameness with their masters. He added, Men have not strength of mind to think for themselves; the higher ranks are all supineness, all indolent acquiescence, all ignorance,—the vulgar are a set that will abuse at random, and are to be led on to commit crimes the most atrocious, if headed by some despicable wretch, who has an interest to promote by raising commotions. He observed, that to broach such sentiments was a conduct ill-suited to acquire popularity, nor did his opposition to the ministry arise from any latent view of getting into employment. It was dictated by the full assurance which he had that the measures then pursuing were such as had the completion of the plan of despotism for their end; that this plan he had hitherto opposed, and would continue so to do with all his powers; and he would sooner have the East India company totally overthrown, than have the basis of the English constitution undermined, or a single pillar, which contributed to the support of so excellent a structure, receive the slightest shock. The propositions passed without a division.

The report of the select committee, which had been printed, brought to light such oppressive and tyrannical transactions in the East, as excited general indignation, and left the minister at full liberty to prescribe the mode of redressing these grievances.

In the further consideration of East India affairs, lord North moved that the house should allow the company to export such part of the tea at present in their warehouses, as they should think proper, to British America, duty free. He represented such a permission as highly beneficial to the company, who had seventeen millions of pounds weight of that commodity in their hands. Soon after a second petition from the East India company was presented to the house of commons, complaining that some of the most material articles of the propositions made to the house, on the 2nd of March, were substantially rejected. They therefore represent it as unreasonable for parliament to require any farther terms, after the loan which they had requested should be repaid. It stated the great losses which the proprietors had sustained, and the expences they had incurred, in acquiring and securing the territorial revenues in India, at the risk of their whole capital, while the public have reaped such good advantages. It complained of the limitation made of the company possessing the territorial acquisitions in India to six years, as an arbitrary act, and insisted that they had undoubted right to those possessions, against which right no decision exists, nor has any formal claim ever been made. The dictating in what manner the surpluses of their net profits, after dividing 8 per cent., shall be applied, they remonstrate against, because such disposal of their property, otherwise than by their own consent, by a general description, comprehending their trade as well as revenues, is not warranted even by the largest pretensions that have ever been formed against them. It concludes with praying, that any claims against the possessions of the company, that can be supposed to give rise to such restrictions, may receive a legal discussion, from which, whatever may be the event, they will at least have the satisfaction of knowing what they may call their own.

The minister, finding the house so well disposed to concur in any measures which he should propose, proceeded to lay before it his plan for regulating the affairs of the company, as well in India as in Europe; he therefore moved, that the court of directors should in future be elected for four years, six members annually, but none to hold their seats longer than four years. 2. That no person shall vote at the election of the directors, who has not possessed his stock twelve months. 3. That the stock of qualification, instead of £500, be £1000. 4. That the mayor's court at Calcutta should, for the future, be confined to small mercantile causes, to which only its jurisdiction extended before the territorial acquisition. 5. That, in lieu of this court, thus taken away, a new one be established, consisting of a chief justice and three puisne judges. 6. That these judges be appointed by the crown. 7. That a superiority be given to the presidency of Bengal, over the other presidencies in India.

In the course of lord North's speech, he hinted, that other regulations would be necessary, among which he particularly named, that the company should communicate their advices from Bengal to the treasury or secretaries of state, and that the company's servants should, under heavy penalties, bring all their fortunes home in the company's ships. He said, an entire reformation could not be looked for immediately; the interests of Bengal might perhaps require the annual care of parliament.

Such important regulations, in which an unprecedented stretch of power was justified by the necessity of the case, met with strong opposition; but every clause in the bill was carried by a great majority. The East India company, the city of London, and those proprietors who possessed votes, by holding £500 stock or upwards, but less than £1000, presented separate petitions, and counsel were heard in behalf of the company and of the £500 stock-holders. The case of the latter, indeed, was peculiarly hard, as the practice of splitting stock, by collusive transfers, which the new regulations were established to prevent, was confined to those who held several thousand pounds stock, who would hereby continue to avail themselves as effectually of splitting stock as before. Where they formerly made two votes, they could now indeed make only one; but that single vote was of prodigiously more consequence, after 1200 voters were disfranchised. This was punishing one body of men for the faults of another, and changing the East India company from a democracy into an oligarchy. The act of power by which this innovation was made, might, upon the same principle of expediency, be exercised to disqualify freeholders of 40*s.* a year from voting for members of parliament, and fixing the qualifications at £10 per annum. The great decrease in the value of money, since the time when a freehold of 40*s.* a year was made a qualification for giving a vote for a member of parliament, has rendered such a possession very inconsiderable; but India stock has sometimes more than doubled its original value, which gives a much greater degree of consequence to the holders of it, than when the regulation was made in the year 1702.

WHILST this arduous business was thus advancing towards a completion, the house took into consideration the several reports from the select committee, and the committee of secrecy. Each of these committees had strictly enquired into the conduct of the proprietors' servants in India, from the commencement of the war with Surajah Dowlah in 1756, which had brought to light transactions of the blackest dye. General Burgoyne, as chairman of the select committee, said, that he looked upon the deposing of Surajah Dowlah, and bringing about a revolution in favour of Meer Jaffier, the signing a fictitious treaty with Ormichund, a black merchant, and confidante of Surajah Dowlah, together with the terms obtained from the new nabob, to be the origin of all those troubles, which have operated to the temporary distress, if not the total destruction of the company. The general then proposed the following resolutions, and said, that, if they met with the approbation of the house, he had another motion to make. 1. That all acquisitions made under the influence of a military force, or by treaty with foreign powers, do of right belong to the state. 2. That to appropriate acquisitions so made to the private emolument of persons entrusted with any civil or military power of the state is illegal. 3. That very great sums of money, and other valuable property, have been acquired in Bengal, from princes and others of the country, by persons entrusted with the military and civil powers of the state, by means of such powers, which have been appropriated to the private use of such persons.

THE two great law officers maintained different sentiments on this subject. The solicitor general used a variety of arguments against the resolutions, whilst the attorney-general supported them. A general dissatisfaction prevailed. So long as the company were enriched by their settlements, the austerity of justice was relaxed; but when the plunderers extended their depredations beyond the property of Asiatic princes, and embezzled the revenues of their masters, their crimes appeared in all their enormous magnitude, and called aloud for exemplary punishment. The three resolutions were carried almost unanimously.

HOWEVER this zeal to punish abuses of power soon after subsided; for when general Burgoyne, some few days after, resumed the subject, and spoke of the deposition of Surajah Dowlah, and the various monopolies introduced, and stated the immense sums which the company's servants had received under the denomination of presents, or had extorted by taxation from the impoverished states of the Indian princes, at the time when they made these profuse presents, and moved the house to resolve, that the right honourable Robert lord Clive, baron Plassey in the kingdom of Ireland, in consequence of the powers vested in him in India, had illegally acquired the sum of £234,000, to the dishonour and detriment of the state, many leading members opposed the motion on a variety of grounds.

A CHARGE so directly brought, occasioned lord Clive to enter very fully into his own defence. With much address, he pleaded the thanks which he had received from the directors when he returned home, after his splendid victories, as an approbation of his conduct, in fabricating the fictitious treaty which deceived Ormichund, and which, he said, he would again have recourse to, were he placed in similar circumstances; whereas, in fact, the proprietary knew nothing of that transaction at the time when their thanks were voted. His lordship shewed the critical necessity which prevailed, in certain situations, where the English power and fortune in Asia depended solely upon rapid, well-timed, and extraordinary measures.

Notwithstanding this grand delinquent was clearly proved to have acted fraudulently and rapaciously in some instances, yet he could be considered in no other light than as the deliverer of the East India company; his bravery, his address, his talents, so admirably suited to the occasion, his generosity and disinterestedness in most instances, together with the undisturbed possession in which he had so long enjoyed his vast fortune, all pleaded strongly in his behalf.

Perhaps other considerations operated to quash this enquiry. Much wealth would have indeed been acquired to the state, by the forfeitures incurred in consequence of a parliamentary process; but such a rigid scrutiny, although it would have produced a present advantage, would have been attended with many consequences, which the wisdom of the present times is solicitous to prevent. The fortunes which are to be acquired in India, by adhering invariably to the line of conduct which strict integrity chalks out, are perhaps in general very inadequate to the views of those who migrate to those distant regions, whilst a lust of power, and a passion for amassing immense wealth, to gratify the calls of ambition, are leading features in the character of the age. Riches have long been considered as a substitute for virtue, and it would have been highly unprofitable to have left the managers of the English East India company's concerns in the kingdom of Hindostan, and the peninsula of India, no other alternative than to have returned home with the more moderate acquisitions, honourably made by a long course of service; or, if grown wealthy by oppressions, to have clandestinely transported themselves and their plunder to a foreign, and most probably a rival country.

Evidence was heard at the bar of the house, to support the charges brought against lord Clive. His lordship's defence was likewise read, after which he made a short speech, and concluded with these words: "Take my fortune, but save my honour;" whereupon he immediately retired.

General Burgoyne then made the following motion; That it appears to this house, that Robert lord Clive, baron Plassey in the kingdom of Ireland, about the time of deposing Surajah Dowlah, nabob of Bengal, and the establishment of Meer Jaffier on the musnud, did, through the influence of the powers with which he was entrusted, as member of the select committee, and commander-in-chief of the British forces, obtain and possess himself of two lacks and 800,000 rupees as member of the select committee, a further sum of two lacks of rupees as commander-in-chief, a further sum of 16 lacks of rupees, or more, under the denomination of private donations; which sums, amounting together to 20 lacks, and 800,000, were of the value in English money of £234,000, and in so doing he abused the power with which he was entrusted, to the evil example of the servants of the public. Mr. Hans Stanley moved, that the question be divided, and the latter part of the motion, which conveyed the censure, be left out, which, after warm debates, was agreed to, and the house, by merely establishing the fact, seemed by implication plainly to give it sanction. It would have been more for the credit of the nation to have rejected the motion entirely, than thus to have drawn the sting of it.

A motion was then made by Mr. Wedderburne, at five o'clock in the morning, that lord Clive did at the same time render great and meritorious services to this country, which passed in the affirmative, and finished the enquiry.

Whether the premier on this occasion chose to appear the friend of public virtue, although he was fully apprised that the measure which was calculated to serve it would not be adopted, or that, without exerting his influence as a minister, he followed the dictates of his feelings as a man, certain it is that he contended for the censure against lord Clive making part of the resolution.

A fortnight was wasted in this fruitless attempt to punish delinquents, after which the minister's bill to regulate the East India company was resumed.* Governor Johnstone said, that the appointment of a general council and judges by the crown, was in his opinion annihilating the company, and transferring the monopoly to the crown; a measure equally unjust to the company, and injurious to the nation. He was clear that the company could extricate themselves without accepting the loan from parliament. Although they had creditors, they were not clamorous ones. The treasury, indeed, might be importunate, and against that the company must be prepared. On the 10th of June, the bill being gone through, and the blanks filled up, it was moved, that this bill do pass, which was agreed to, 131 to 21, and lord North was ordered to carry it to the house of lords. The salaries of the judges were thereby fixed at £8000 to the chief justice, and £6000 a year to each of the other three. The appointments of the governor-general and council were fixed, the first at £25,000, and the four others at £10,000 each annually. A clause was inserted, whereby every proprietor possessed of £3000 stock was entitled to two votes, of £6000 stock to three votes, and of £10,000 stock to four votes, at future elections for directors.

A few days after, a petition was presented from the East India company, declaring that they were determined to submit to the temporary difficulties which might attend the present situation of affairs, rather than receive the loan offered to them, upon the severe condition prescribed. The house was strongly of opinion, that the option of refusing the loan should not be left in the company, but that the acceptance of it should be made compulsatory by parliament.

In the house of lords, the duke of Richmond opposed the bill with great spirit; but the majority in its favour was nearly as great there as in the house of commons. A long protest was soon entered against the bill, signed by thirteen peers, in which one of the strong objections urged is, that it only transfers patronage, without conferring new powers. The same noble peer moved, that a conference should be held with the commons, as no parliamentary information was then before them; which, being rejected, produced another protest, signed by seven peers. The bill was carried through with amazing celerity, and passed the house on the 19th of June.

The regulations made in the administration of affairs in the East Indies by this act, did not differ essentially from those which had been proposed in Mr. Sullivan's bill, which had been brought in the preceding session, except that the salaries settled on the officers were much larger, and that the appointment to the new offices was vested in the crown.

When the great Hampden contended with the crown for the payment of 40*s.* which he considered as illegally levied, it was not within the compass of human foresight to predict, that, in little more than a century, that noble zeal, in the support of the just rights of mankind, would be lost in this country. When the parliament, after the peace of Ryswick, refused to comply with a request made by their king, and deliverer, that he might retain his Dutch guards, the members, who were then such austere guardians of liberty, against the encroachments of regal power, little thought that even their sons might be senators, when parliaments would become the mere echo of the minister; and that the most essential alterations would take place in the condition of the prince and the people, without any alarm being excited, or the body of the nation having any apprehension of the change. But when the manners of the people alter, their form of government will undergo a corresponding modification. Simplicity and frugality embrace liberty as the parent of every blessing; refinement and luxury spread a general indifference among the people; they become blind to consequences, and inactive in a general cause; circumstances which furnish ministers with golden opportunities to effect their purposes.

Lord North stated the debt due from the company to government, with the interest, to be £954,000, which, together with half a million to the bank, more than swallowed up the whole loan.

The expence of the navy this year was as follows:

	£
Seamen	1,040,000
Ordinary of navy	424,019
Building, rebuilding, and repairing ships	421,554
	1,885,573

The expence of the military establishment, including forces and garrisons in Europe, Africa, the ceded islands, and North America, was as follows:

	£
Army, ordnance, Greenwich hospital	1,390,204
Half-pay	112,903
Army-extraordinaries	249,708
	1,752,815

CHAPTER XXIII.

GEORGE III.

[1773, 1774.]

Meridian Splendor of Lord North's Administration—Comparative View of the American Colonies and the Mother Country—Discovery of the Letters written by the Governor and Lieutenant-governor of the Massachusett's Bay—The House of the Representatives petition the King to remove those Officers—Report of the Privy-council thereupon—Tea destroyed at Boston—General Conduct of the Americans on the arrival of the Teas—Meeting of Parliament—Message from his Majesty—Bill for shutting up the Port of Boston—Regulation of the Government in the Province of the Massachusett's Bay—Debate on a Motion to repeal the Duty on Tea—Bill for the Impartial Administration of Justice—Lord North's Plan of Finance for the Year 1774—Quebec Act—Death of the King of France—American Congress formed—Petitions to the King—Sudden Dissolution of Parliament—Probable Causes which led to it.

THE period at which we are now arrived is the meridian splendor of lord North's ministry. His conquests in the East were as extensive as those of Alexander, and effected with no less rapidity; but then he needed not, like that monarch, to weep that he had no other world to conquer; the western hemisphere opened to his view a prospect different indeed, but not less extensive, and equally demanding the abilities of a great minister. A controlling power over two such extensive, rich, fruitful, and populous territories as Hindostan and North America, exhibited a stupendous idea of human authority and power, which no other country ever possessed, and which no other minister ever exercised. The points to be attained in the different countries were as opposite as the climate which prevailed in each. In the East Indies, the object was to repress a spirit of rapacity, oppression, and tyranny, which led men in power to violate the rights of humanity, without remorse or limitation; in the western region, the professed purpose was to check and repress an exuberance of freedom, proceeding from an active industry, unassuming equality, and general happiness. We have already seen the conduct pursued towards our eastern possessions; it remains that I now speak of the other section of the globe.

THE colonies and mother country presented, at this time, in strong opposition, the lineaments of their different ages. Great Britain, grown old in prosperity, became proud, assuming, impatient of every restraint, or of the slightest contraversion of her mandates, but at the same time improvident and lavish. An apostate from those principles to which she had been habitually attached; indifferent to the welfare of others, mistaken in what constituted her own. America, on the other hand, rising in all the vigour of advancing maturity, without specie, but rich in the products of a genial soil, the labours of a hardy race of seamen, and a growing commerce. The want of the precious metals, though attended with some inconveniencies, contributed greatly to the character and manners of the people. It served to place happiness rather in what was to be enjoyed; than in what was to be amassed. Avarice appeared in all its deformity in the eyes of a people who had no titled greatness to aspire to, and with whom honest industry was a security against extreme necessity. In such a country, and in such an age, a man possessing a philosophic and reflecting mind would wish to live; and there have been times, in which it would have been considered as the glory and happiness of a prince to reign over subjects so free, so increasing, and so happy, ere the science of finance gave oppression a new form. But America was much more at her ease than England, and she must be brought to contribute a reasonable proportion to the necessities of the parent state, whence originated the beloved idea of subjecting America to internal taxation. Her population too increased in a more rapid degree than that of any other country had been known to do. According to estimates made, which have never been controverted, some of the North American colonies doubled their inhabitants in sixteen years whilst the population of the British Isles was not supposed to be on the advance. From whence it was self-evident, that the colonies, in a much shorter time than fifty years, would be equal in population to the mother country, perhaps much more populous; and, when arrived at such an height, what probability was there that the present subordination would continue?

So long ago as the year 1733, an act was passed, which laid certain duties on all foreign spirits, molasses, and sugars imported into the plantations; these imposts were submitted to, and the distinction between commercial regulations and internal taxation was not dwelt on, until the fatal introduction of the stamp-act; which, upon every principle of national interest, without considering the question of legal right, or the expediency of exerting our power, should either have been inflexibly adhered to, or that kind of taxation abandoned for ever. The evil genius of this country caused neither the one nor the other to happen. The stamp-act was repealed, and a duty laid upon teas and various other articles imported into America. This was no more an internal tax than the former one on sugars, indeed the duties last levied were on merchandize from Great Britain, the others on foreign products; but the Americans chose so to consider it, and many other causes of discontent prevailed. Had Great Britain at that time been distinguished for public spirit, love of liberty, and scrupulous attention to a rigid œconomy in the expenditure of public money, the effects of which appeared in seizing every proper means of reducing the national debt; and had the Americans been called upon by an administration pursuing such views, to contribute to such a purpose, their feelings would not have revolted from the demand. Indeed, they did not dispute the propriety of the mother country making a requisition, they only asked to be permitted to raise the contribution by acts of their own assemblies. Had such a mode been assented to here, the opposite extremities of the Atlantic would have been united in one common cause, and the British constitution would have grown permanent even from age itself. Mutual confidence could alone build up such a fabric, for although the two countries were united by common ancestry, by professing the tenets of protestantism, by commercial and friendly intercourse, and the exchange of reciprocal benefits, yet they were separated by an ocean of 3000 miles expanse, which, whilst it promoted that amicable commercial intercourse, created distinct interests in the two countries, which began to foment jealousies and mutual disgust. Each country reasoned according to the opinions most prevalent there, and every age has its leading sentiments. The one carried the principles of civil liberty, and the natural rights of mankind, to a great height; the other was no less tenacious of the doctrine of subordination to the parent state, and submission to the regulations made by the legislature. Had the contest arisen half a century ago, many of the arguments which were urged on each side would not then have been produced. A government, founded on the principles of freedom, could not possibly be brought into a more perplexing situation, than that into which the dispute with the colonies threw Great Britain. Perhaps no sovereign ever swayed the sceptre of these realms, that was in any way equal to the object to be effected, except queen Elizabeth. That great princess, who came to the throne at a most critical period, knew how to accommodate herself to the temper of the times. She possessed all the soothing arts which are calculated to persuade; and knew as well both when and how to enforce obedience. She was served by some of the ablest statesmen that this country ever produced, and extended her views more into futurity than any one of her successors, the great Nassau only excepted.

A GENERAL dissatisfaction prevailed in America, and agreements had been entered into, not to import any merchandize from Great Britain, which had greatly affected the commerce of this country, although these engagements were not strictly observed on the part of the Americans. Their governors, who were appointed by the crown, but paid by the people, were unanimous in their manner of representing the spirit of opposition which prevailed among the colonies. In each province contentions between the governor and the house of representatives were frequent, and obstructed the public business in every session. The New England provinces were the most forward in these disputes; and in the Massachusett's bay they rose to the greatest height. There, no terms had been kept, for a considerable time, between sir Francis Bernard, the governor, and the assembly, which each charged the other with being the cause of the dissentions. In the year 1770, that gentleman was first recalled, and Mr. Thomas Hutchinson, a native of America, and lieutenant-governor, succeeded him; whereupon Mr. Andrew Oliver, also by birth an American, who was secretary of the province, became lieutenant-governor. Some letters, which were written by these gentlemen, to persons in power and office in England, in the year 1768 and 1769, happened to be procured by Dr. Franklin, who resided in London as agent for the house of representatives of the Massachusett's bay, and were by him transmitted to Boston. Many passages in these letters gave great offence to the Bostonians, particularly the following in one of governor Hutchinson's letters; "I never think of measures necessary for the peace and good order of the colonies without pain. There must be an abridgement of what are called English liberties. I relieve myself by considering, that in a remove from the state of nature to the most perfect state of government, there must be a great restraint of natural liberty. I doubt whether it is possible to project a system of government, in which a colony 3000 miles distant from the parent state shall enjoy all the liberty of the parent state. I am certain I have never yet seen the projection. I wish the good of the colony, when I wish to see some further restraint of liberty, rather than the connection with the parent state should be broken; for I am sure such a breach must be the ruin of the colony." Speaking of the combination of the American merchants, he says, "But it is not possible that provision for dissolving the combinations, and subjecting all who do not renounce them to penalties adequate to the offence, should not be made, the first week the parliament meets. (1773) Certainly all parties will unite in so extraordinary a case, if they never do any other."

IN consequence of the discovery of these letters, an address from the representatives of Massachusett's bay to the king, was transmitted from Boston to their agent, and by him delivered to the American secretary. In it they petition his majesty to remove their governor and lieutenant-governor, whose conduct had a natural and efficacious tendency to interrupt and alienate the affections of his majesty, whom they style their rightful sovereign, from his loyal province, and to destroy all harmony and good will between Great Britain and the colonies. They likewise charge their governor and his lieutenant with having been among the chief instruments in introducing a fleet and an army into the province, to establish and perpetuate their plans. This address was afterwards laid before a committee of the privy-council, who reported the charges in the petition to be groundless, vexatious, and scandalous, and that the petition ought to be dismissed.

IT has been already observed, that an act of parliament was passed towards the close of the last session, enabling the East India company to export teas, duty free. In consequence of which, the company resolved upon a mode of trade which they had never before adopted, and instead of disposing of their teas at public sale, freighted several ships for the American colonies, on their own account, and appointed agents there for the disposal of their cargoes.

MANY strong reasons were urged against this measure. It could not be expected to afford the company any relief from their present embarrassments, as the returns could not be made expeditiously, nor perhaps punctually, even if the teas should find a good market as the most strenuous adviser of the measure could expect. But if the excess of their stock of teas was disposed of at public sale, the merchants would become purchasers to a very large amount, and the time of payment could, in that case, be ascertained. It was even calculated, that a sum of money might be raised by that means, sufficient to extricate the company from their difficulties. A gentleman distinguished for his abilities, and who was well acquainted with the disposition of the Americans, as well as the interests of the company, told the chairman, that the company were criminally absurd, because they were presenting themselves as the butt in the controversy, where they would probably come off with the loss of all their merchandize. However, it was the favourite plan of administration, that the company should become their own factors.

Notwithstanding the colonies actually received their teas at 9*d*. a pound cheaper than they had formerly done, yet they were not thereby induced to purchase them. They said, that the East India company were quitting their usual line of conduct, and wantonly becoming the instrument to give efficacy to an odious law. Throughout the colonies, the most violent opposition to the landing of the teas prevailed; and, without any interchange of sentiment, every port town along that extensive coast was actuated by the same spirit.

When the tea ships were expected to arrive, the agents appointed to receive them were compelled to renounce their engagements, and solemnly bind themselves not to act; the people delegated committees in different towns and provinces, to whom they gave the most extensive powers. Merchants were compelled to submit their books to the inspection of these regulators, who assumed the power of imposing tests, and inflicting punishments, on such as opposed their proceedings. A custom-house officer, named Malcolm, was tarred and feathered, and in that manner led about the town of Boston. These violent measures were not confined to those places which had shewn the most active disposition to contend with the mother country; the more peaceable and orderly provinces, on this occasion, departed from their former principles, and became equally violent in opposing the landing of the teas.

When three of the company's ships arrived at Boston, in December 1773, the captains, alarmed at the spirit which prevailed among the people, offered to return to England, without landing their cargoes, if they could obtain the proper discharges from the tea-consignees, the custom-house, and the governor; but, though these officers would not venture to land the tea, yet they refused the captains a discharge, whilst their cargoes remained on board, for the delivery of which they were chartered by the company. The night after the governor had given his refusal, a number of armed men, disguised like Mohawk Indians, went on board the ships, and in less than four hours emptied every chest of tea on board the ships, amounting to 342, into the sea, without the least damage done to the ships, or any other property; which having done, they retired. It is remarkable that the governor, the civil power, the garrison of Fort William, and the armed ships in harbour, were totally inactive on this occasion. At all the other American ports, where tea ships arrived, the inhabitants obliged the captains to return without breaking bulk, (as the people of Boston were desirous of doing) except at Charlestown in South Carolina, where the teas were landed and put into a damp cellar, whereby the whole became rotten and useless.

On the 13th of January, 1774, his majesty opened the session of parliament with a speech from the throne, before the news of this outrage had arrived. In it he observed, that the state of foreign affairs afforded full leisure for the legislature to attend to the improvement of our internal and domestic situation, and to the prosecution of such measures as more immediately respected the preservation and advancement of the revenue and commerce of this kingdom; among these objects, the state of the gold coin was particularly recommended to the attention of parliament.

The house sat near two months before any measures were taken concerning the affairs of America, notwithstanding the alarming advices which had been received from thence soon after its assembling. At length the premier delivered a message from his majesty, informing the house, "that in consequence of the unwarrantable practices carried on in North America, and particularly of the violent and outrageous proceedings at the town and port of Boston, with the view of obstructing the commerce of this kingdom, and upon grounds and pretences immediately subversive of the constitution, it was thought fit to lay the whole matter before parliament; fully confiding, as well in their zeal for the maintenance of his majesty's authority, as in their attachment to the common interest and welfare of all his dominions; that they would not only enable him effectually to take such measures, as may be most likely to put an immediate stop to these disorders, but would also take into their most serious consideration, what farther regulations and permanent provisions may be necessary to be established, for better securing the execution of the laws, and the just dependence of the colonies upon the crown and parliament of Great Britain.

Immediately after the delivery of this message, upwards of 100 papers, respecting American affairs, were brought up; they consisted of copies and extracts of letters from the different magistrates and officers in America, and the votes and resolutions of the inhabitants of Boston, with many other authentic documents. An address being returned to his majesty, strongly expressing the readiness of the house to comply with the purport of the royal message, the minister soon after moved for leave to bring in a bill, "for the immediate removal of the officers concerned in the collection and management of his majesty's duties and customs, from the town of Boston, in the province of the Massachusett's bay, in North America, and to discontinue the landing and discharging, lading and shipping of goods, wares, and merchandize, at the said town of Boston, or within the harbour thereof." His lordship entered into a justification of the governor's conduct, whom he described to have taken every method which discretion dictated, or good policy authorised, for the security of the East India company's property, the safety of the consignees, and the preservation of order and quiet in the town. The military force in the castle, and the ships of war in the harbour, might indeed have been called in to save the tea from destruction; but as the leading men in Boston had always made great complaints of the interposition of the army and navy, and charged all disturbances, of every sort, to their account, he, with great prudence and temperance, determined from the beginning to decline a measure, which would have been so irritating to the minds of the people; and might well have hoped, that by this confidence in their conduct, and trust reposed in the civil power, he should have calmed their turbulence, and preserved the public tranquillity.

He said it was henceforth impossible for our commerce to be safe in the harbour of Boston, and it was highly necessary that some port should be found for landing of our merchandize. That it was no new thing for a whole town to be fined, although thereby some few innocent individuals might suffer, when the authority of such a town had been as it were asleep and inactive. He instanced the city of London, in Charles II.'s time. When Dr. Lamb was killed by unknown persons, the city was fined for it; and the case of Edinburgh in captain Porteus's affair, when a fine was set upon the whole city; and also at Glasgow, where the house of Mr. Campbell was pulled down, part of the revenue of the town was sequestered to make good the damage. Boston, he observed, was much more criminal than either of the three cities he had mentioned, for that town had been upwards of seven years in riot and confusion; all the disturbances in America had originated there.

The lord mayor of London presented a petition of several natives and inhabitants of North America, then in London; which stated it to be an inviolable rule of natural justice, that no man should be condemned unheard; and that, according to law, no person or persons can be judged without being called upon to answer, and being permitted to hear the evidence against them, and to make their defence. If judgment be immediately to follow an accusation against the people of America, supported by persons notoriously at enmity with them, the accused unacquainted with the charge, and, from the nature of their situation, utterly incapable of answering and defending themselves, every fence against false accusation will be pulled down. They asked, by what rule of justice can the town be punished for a civil injury, committed by persons not known to belong to it? The petitioners conceive, that there is not an instance, even in the most arbitrary times, in which a city was punished by parliamentary authority, without being heard, for a civil offence not committed within their jurisdiction, and without redress having been sought at common law. The instance brought of the city of London was for a murder committed within its walls, by its citizens, in open day; but in this case, arbitrary as the times were, the trial was public in a court of common law, the party heard, and the law laid down by the judges. In the case of Edinburgh, indeed, parliament did interpose, but this was to punish the commission of an atrocious murder within her gates, and aggravated by an over act of high treason, in executing, against the express will of the crown, the king's laws. Both these cities had by charter the whole executive power within themselves; and, in both cases, full time was allowed them to discharge their duty, and they were heard in their defence. But neither has time been allowed in this case, nor is the accused heard, nor is Boston a walled town, nor was the fact committed within it, nor is the executive power in its hands, as it is in those of London and Edinburgh. On the contrary, the governor himself holds that power, and has been advised by his majesty's council to carry it into execution. If it has been neglected, he alone is answerable; and perhaps the due course of law is operating there to the discovery and prosecution of the real offenders. The petition strongly insisted on the excessive rigour and injustice of the act, its tendency to alienate the affections of America from this country, and the certainty that her attachments cannot long survive the justice of Great Britain.

The reply to the pleas urged in this petition was, that the case called for immediate redress. It was unbecoming the dignity of parliament to suffer chicane and subterfuge to evade the execution of substantial justice. It was asked, if the house doubted either the reality or degree of the offence, or of their own competency to enquire into and punish it. Lord North would not undertake to say what would be the consequence or event of this measure; but he was strongly of opinion it would be salutary and effectual.

Little opposition was shewn to the bill at its introduction; but, on its third reading, strong efforts were made to change the sentiment of the house.

Governor Johnstone predicted to the house, that the effect of this bill must be a general confederacy to resist the power of this country. He called it irritating, tempting, nay, inviting men to those deeds by ineffectual expedients, the aberrations of an indecisive mind, incapable of comprehending the chain of consequences which must result from such a law. The question of taxing America, he said, was sufficiently nice to palliate resistance, if the subject had never been disputed in this country; but, after the highest characters of the state had declared against the right of this country to impose taxes on America, for the purposes of revenue, after the general voice of the senate had concurred in repealing the stamp-act upon that principle, there is so much mitigation to be pleaded in favour of the Americans from this circumstance, allowing them in an error at present, that it will be the height of cruelty to enforce contrary maxims, with any degree of severity at least, before due warning is given. It is in vain to say that Boston is more culpable than the other colonies. Sending the ships away, and obliging them to return to England, is a more solemn and deliberate act of resistance than the outrage committed by persons in disguise in the night, when the ships refused to depart. In extending this kind of punishment to the other colonies, every one must see the danger, and yet it cannot be approved of. For one, the same arguments will apply to others. If a similar punishment were applied to the colony of Virginia, the revenue would be reduced to £300,000 a year, besides the loss of all foreign contracts, and perhaps of that beneficial trade for ever. Those gentlemen, he continued, who are in the secrets of the cabinet, and know how assuredly every proposition from thence is adopted by this house, may be warranted in their sanguine acclamations in favour of this measure; but the general mass, who must be equally ignorant with myself of what is to follow, can have no excuse for giving their assent so readily for punishing their fellow-subjects in so unprecedented a manner, and their eager zeal serves only to shew how ready they are to obey the will of another, without exercising their own judgment in the case. My opinion is, that if coercive measures are to be adopted, an effectual force should be immediately carried into the heart of the colony resisting, to crush rebellion in the bud, before a general confederacy can be formed. For my own part, I am convinced from experience in the colonies, that good government may be maintained there, upon rational grounds, as well as in this country.

That the power of restoring the port of Boston to its former rights should be absolutely vested in the crown, was objected to. Is it necessary, it was asked, either for punishment of the Bostonians, or for satisfaction to the East India company. Such a regulation could only be made for the purpose of establishing a precedent, of delivering over whole towns and communities to an arbitrary discretion in the crown. Until now, no precedent could be produced, of a maritime city being deprived of its port, and then left to the mercy of the crown to restore the port or not at pleasure.

No division took place, and the bill was immediately carried to the lords.

In the debate on this bill, Mr. Charles Fox appeared for the first time among the minority. In the course of this session, he had frequently shewn himself adverse to the opinions of the first lord of the treasury, and about the time when this bill began to be agitated, he quitted his seat at that board.

In the house of lords, the earl of Shelburne took an active part in opposing the bill. He presented to that house a similar petition to that which had been laid before the house of commons, from the natives of America residing in and about London. The bill was supported by the lords Mansfield, Gower, Lyttleton, Weymouth, and Suffolk; and opposed by the duke of Richmond and Manchester, the marquis of Rockingham, the lords Camden, Shelburne, and Stair. It passed the house the 30th of March, only five days after it was brought in, and received the royal assent the next day.

The bill enacted, that from and after the 1st of June, 1774, it shall not be lawful for any person to ship, for exportation, goods from any quay or wharf within the town or harbour of Boston; nor are goods, wares, or merchandize, brought from any other country, to be landed there, under pain of the forfeiture of the said goods, and of the boat, lighter, or vessel, out of which they may be taken. Fourteen days are allowed to such ships or vessels as may happen to be in the harbour of Boston on or before the 1st of June. When it shall be made to appear to his majesty in council, that peace and obedience to the laws shall be so far restored in the town of Boston, as that the trade of Great Britain may be safely carried on there, and the customs duly collected; if his majesty in council shall judge the same to be true, he may by proclamation or order of council, assign and appoint the extent, bounds, and limits of the port or harbour of Boston, and of every creek or haven within the same, and so many quays and wharfs, for the landing and shipping of goods, as he shall judge fit and expedient, after which it shall again become a port. But this restoration of the privileges of the port of Boston his majesty is not empowered to grant, until full satisfaction has been made to the East India company, by the inhabitants of Boston, for the damage sustained by the destruction of their goods, and to the officers of revenue and others, who suffered by the riots and insurrections in the several months of November, December, and January.

Whilst the Boston port-bill was depending in the house of lords, the prime minister, in the other house, proceeded further to develope the plan concerted by government for the subjugation of the refractory colonies, by moving for leave to bring in a bill relative to the Massachusett's bay, and the house being resolved into a committee, his lordship introduced the bill by saying, that an executive power was much wanted in that province, and that it became highly necessary to strengthen the hands of magistracy there. The force of the civil power consisted in posse comitatus, which was composed of the very people who had committed all the riots and outrages which had happened for many years past; so that the preservation of the peace was not to be looked for from them, and if the democratic part shew that contempt of the laws, how is the governor to execute any authority vested in him? He has not the power of appointing magistrates, or of removing them. The council alone have that power, and they are dependent on the people. His lordship inferred from thence, that there was something radically wrong in that constitution. If the governor issued out a proclamation, there could hardly be found a magistrate to obey it, and it was necessary to have the concurrence of seven of the council to give validity to an act of the governor. Where there is such a want of civil authority, can it be supposed that the military, be they ever so numerous, can be of the least service. For, continued his lordship, I shall always consider a military power, acting under the authority and control of a civil magistrate, as a part of the constitution; but the military alone ought not to act, and cannot do so legally.

He proposed, by this bill, to take the executive power from the hands of the democratic part of the government in that province, that the governor should act as a justice of peace, and that he should have the power to appoint the officers throughout the whole civil establishment, such as the sheriffs, provosts, marshals; the chief justice and judges of the supreme court excepted; all which officers should be removeable by his majesty. Town-meetings to be declared illegal, unless held by the special consent of the governor, or upon the annual election of certain officers, which it is the people's province to choose. He proposed to put juries upon a different footing, which regulation he acknowledged to have been suggested by lord George Germaine. These regulations, he apprehended, would effectually purge that constitution of all its crudities, and give strength and spirit to the civil magistracy and to the executive power.

WITH a view to qualify these severe acts, some members in the house of commons, who had assented to the Boston port-bill, particularly Mr. Rose, Fuller, and the honourable Constantine Phipps, were of opinion, that something of a conciliatory and redressing nature should accompany them, as a probable means of rendering them efficacious. The advocates for such a measure pleaded that parliament, whilst it resented the outrages of the American populace, ought not to shew a disposition to irritate the orderly and well-affected part of the colonies. That if such had satisfaction in the matter of taxes, they would become instrumental in restraining the inferior and more turbulent from outrages; and that this sacrifice to peace would be at very little expence, as the produce of the tax was of no importance to Great Britain. Such arguments were meant to pave the way for a motion to repeal the duty upon tea. The debate chiefly turned upon the policy of the repeal at this particular time.

LORD North denied that the tea-tax was an inconsiderable revenue, and strongly contended, that no acts of lenity should accompany their restrictive acts. To repeal at this time, would shew such a degree of wavering and inconsistency, as would defeat the good effects of the vigorous plan, which, after too long remissness, was at length adopted. Parliament ought to shew that it will relax in none of its just rights, but enforce them in a practical way. The legislature ought to shew that it is provided with sufficient means of making itself obeyed, whenever it is resisted. If the tax upon tea is repealed, other demands will be made on the part of America, which, as soon as complied with, will be followed by others, until even America herself is surrendered. If the house persisted in that wholesome severity, which it had begun to exercise, there was no doubt but obedience on the part of the Americans would be the result. Let but Great Britain maintain her rights with firmness, then peace and quiet will soon be restored.

THE house divided upon the question, whether a committee should be appointed to take into consideration the repeal of the duty; ayes 49, noes 103.

THIS question being dismissed, the house proceeded to the second reading of the bill for regulating the government of Massachusett's bay. In support of it Mr. Welbore Ellis asserted, that it was the duty of the crown to take away or alter charters, if they were found deficient of the purpose intended. Then the American papers on the table were sufficient evidence of the fact, that it was not necessary to have any farther hearing on either side. Great inconveniencies, he said, had arisen from the present form of government, which frequently retarded business, but which would be removed by this bill. Mr. Charles Jenkinson said, it was right to take away charters if they were abused, and to govern the Americans, as they were not capable of governing themselves. Mr. Jeremiah Dyson contended, that the house proceeded not as a court of justice, but in their legislative capacity, regulating and supplying the deficiencies in charters which had been granted by the crown.

ON the other side, general Conway pleaded that the Americans had done no more than every subject would do in an arbitrary state, where laws are imposed against their will. He thought taxation and legislation in that case inconsistent; and asked, Have you not a legislative right over Ireland? Yet no one will say we have a right to tax Ireland. He predicted, that these acts respecting America would involve this country and its ministers in misfortunes—and he wished it might not be added—in ruin.

MR. Pownall, who had been some years governor of Massachusett's bay, spoke ably on the form of government in that province, and concluded with characterizing the Americans as a conscientious, religious, peaceable set of people; and added, that a more respectable set of men did not exist in all his majesty's dominions.

Mr. Dowdeswell pleaded strongly and ably that the province should be heard, before an act was passed which would entirely deprive it of its chartered rights. He presented a petition from Mr. Bollan, agent for the council of the province, praying that the bill might not pass into a law, until he should have time to receive answers from thence to letters which he had sent. The prayer of this petition, he said, was so perfectly reasonable, that it appeared impossible to be rejected out of the court of the inquisition. The petition was rejected. The bill was carried on the second reading, without a division.

Lord North then proposed a third bill, which he hoped would effectually secure the province of Massachusett's bay from future disturbances. He said, the juries of that country were not established after the manner in which our juries here are, and therefore were not so likely to give to each offender that impartial trial, which, by the laws of this country, he was entitled to. By the bill which he meant to propose, whenever it should be found in that country that a man is not likely to meet with a fair and impartial trial, the governor should be empowered to send him to any of the other colonies, where the same kind of spirit has not prevailed; but if it should be thought that he cannot have a fair and impartial trial in any of the colonies, in such a case the party accused shall be sent to Great Britain, to be tried before the court of King's-bench, the expences of which trial to be drawn for out of the customs of England. Such a measure, he trusted, would shew to America, that this nation is roused to defend its rights, and to maintain the peace and security of its colonies, and, when roused, that the measures taken are not cruel nor vindictive, but necessary and efficacious. His lordship proposed that the bill should continue in force for three years, and declared it to be the last measure that parliament would take, after which it required, that his majesty's servants there should be vigilant in the execution of their duty, and keep a watchful eye over every encroachment upon these newly-created powers, and not suffer the least degree of disobedience to their measures to take place in that country. The customary relief of troops, he said, which was four regiments, were ordered for Boston, and general Gage would go out with them as commander-in-chief and governor of the province. He then moved for leave to bring in a bill for the impartial administration of justice, in the cases of persons questioned for any acts done by them, in the execution of the laws for the suppression of riots and tumults in the province of Massachusett's bay in New England, and produced precedents to warrant the measure, which were, that the habeas corpus act had been suspended in the year 1745. The smugglers apprehended, for offences committed on the coast of Sussex, had been made triable in the county of Middlesex, and the Scotch rebels in England.

The opposition denied the necessity of this act, even on the supposition that justice might be perverted in New England; because, in such cases, the prerogative of the crown might step in, and the governor might reprieve any one who appeared to be convicted illegally or unjustly.

Colonel Barré declared he rose with great unwillingness to oppose this bill in its very infancy, before its features were well formed, and to claim that attention which the house seemed to bestow, with great reluctance, on any arguments in behalf of America, whilst their proceedings, as they were, had the least colour of justice, he said, he desisted from opposing them, and although the bill for shutting up the port of Boston contained in it many things most cruel, unwarrantable, and unjust. Yet as it was couched under those general principles of justice, retribution for injury, and compensation for loss sustained, he desisted from opposing it. The bill was a bad way of doing what was right, but still it was doing what was right. As to the bill then before the house, he pronounced it to be unprecedented in any former proceedings of parliament, and unwarranted by any delay, denial, or perversion of justice in America. It was so big with oppression and misery to that country, and with danger to this, that the first blush of it was sufficient to alarm and rouse him to opposition. It went to stigmatize a whole people, as persecutors of innocence, and men incapable of doing justice, without a single fact being produced, on which to ground the imputation. On the contrary, the instances which have happened are direct confutations of such charges. The case of captain Preston was recent; this officer and some soldiers had been indicted at Boston for murder, in killing some persons in the suppression of a riot; they were fairly tried, and fully acquitted. It was an American jury, a New England jury, a Boston jury, which tried and acquitted them. Captain Preston has under his hand publicly declared, that the inhabitants of the very town where their fellow-citizens had been slain, acquitted him. This is the very case the act supposes. Is this the return made them? Is this the encouragement given them to persevere in so laudable a spirit of justice and moderation. He denied that the cases of trials for smuggling, and of treason, in the last rebellion, did at all apply to the present case, because the inconveniencies of prosecution or defence were comparatively insignificant, on account of the little distance to which the trials were removed. He took notice of lord North's expression, "We must shew the Americans that we will no longer sit quiet under their insults," and called it mere declamation, unbecoming the character and place of him who uttered it. He asked, in what moment have you been quiet? Has not your government, for many years past, been a series of irritating and offensive measures, without policy, principles, or moderation? Have not your troops and your ships made a vain and insulting parade in their streets and in their harbours. It has seemed to be your study to irritate and inflame them. You have stimulated their discontents into disaffection, and you are now goading their disaffection into rebellion. Can you expect to be well-informed, when you listen only to partisans? Can you expect to do justice, when you will not hear the accused?

After having endeavoured to shew that the bill was without precedent to support it, or facts to warrant it, he proceeded to represent the consequences which it was likely to produce. A soldier feels himself so much above the rest of mankind, that the strict hand of the civil power is necessary to check and restrain the haughtiness of disposition which such superiority inspires. What constant care is taken in this country to mind the military, that they are under the restraint of the civil power? In America their superiority is felt still more. Remove the check of the law, as this bill proposes, and what insolence, what outrage may you not expect? Every passion that is pernicious to society will be let loose upon a people unaccustomed to licentiousness and intemperance. These people, who have been long complaining of oppression, will see in the soldiery those who are to enforce it upon them, whilst the military, strongly prepossessed with the idea of that people being rebellious, unawed by the civil power, and actuated by that arbitrary spirit which prevails in the best troops, will commit violences, which might rouse the tamest people to resistance, and which the vigilance of their officers cannot effectually restrain. The inevitable consequence will be open rebellion, which you profess by this act to obviate. I have been bred a soldier, he continued, and have served long. I respect the profession, and live in the strictest habits of friendship with many officers; but there is not a country gentleman of you all, who looks upon the army with a more jealous eye, or would more strenuously resist the making them independent of the civil power, than myself. No man is to be trusted in such a situation. It is not the fault of the soldier, but the vice of human nature, which, unbridled by law, becomes insolent and licentious. When I stand up an advocate for America, I feel myself the firmest friend of this country. We owe our greatness to the commerce of America. Alienate your colonies, and you destroy the genuine supply which nourishes your own strength. Let the banners of rebellion be once spread in America, and you are an undone people. You are urging this desperate, this destructive issue. You are urging it with such violence, and by measures tending so manifestly to that fatal point, that though a state of madness only could inspire such an intention, it would appear to be your deliberate purpose. You have changed your ground; you are becoming the aggressors, and are offering the last of the human outrages to the people of America, by subjecting them in effect to military execution. I know the vast superiority of your disciplined troops over the provincials; but beware how you supply the want of discipline by desperation. Instead of sending them the olive branch, you have sent the naked sword. By the olive branch I mean a repeal of all the late laws, fruitless to you, and oppressive to them. Ask their aid in a constitutional manner, and they will give it to the utmost of their ability. They never yet refused it, when properly called upon. Your journals bear the recorded acknowledgments of the zeal with which they have contributed to the general necessities of the state. They may be flattered into any thing, but they are not to be driven. Have some indulgence to your own likeness. Respect their sturdy English virtue, retract your odious exertions of authority, and remember, that the first step towards making them contribute to your wants, is to reconcile them to your government.

An old member, who was very rarely adverse to the ministry, strenuously opposed this bill, and concluded his speech with these remarkable words: "I will now take my leave of the whole plan. You will commence your ruin from this day. I am sorry to say, that not only the house has fallen into this error, but the people approve of the measure. The people, I am sorry to say, are misled. But a short time will prove the evil tendency of this bill. If ever there was a nation running headlong to ruin, it is this."

On the 8th of May, sir George Saville moved for leave to present a petition, from the natives of America resident in London, against the two bills then depending; which was admitted.

In this petition it was asserted, that a charter so granted, as that of the third of William and Mary, to the province of Massachusett's bay, was never before altered, or resumed, but upon a full and fair hearing; that therefore the present proceeding is totally unconstitutional, and sets an example which renders every charter in Great Britain and America entirely insecure. The appointment and removal of the judges at the pleasure of the governor, with salaries payable by the crown, puts the property, liberty, and life of the subjects, depending on judicial integrity, in his power. The petitioners perceive a system of judicial tyranny at this day imposed upon them, which, from the bitter experience of its intolerable injuries, has been abolished in this country.

It then proceeded to state the objections to the other bill, for the more impartial administration of justice in the province of Massachusett's bay, many of which were similar to those urged by colonel Barré, which have been already stated. The bill, says the petition, by giving a dispensing power to the governor, advanced as he is by the former bill above the law, and not liable to any impeachment from the people he may oppress, must constitute him an absolute tyrant. No history can shew, nor will human nature admit, of an instance of general discontent, but from a general sense of oppression. The petitioners wished they could possibly perceive any difference between the most abject slavery and such entire submission to a legislature, in the constitution of which they have not a single voice, nor the least influence, and in which no one is present on their behalf. They regarded the giving their property, by their own consent alone, as the unalienable right of the subject, and the sacred bulwark of constitutional liberty. To deprive the colonies, therefore, of this right, is to reduce them to a state of vassalage, leaving them nothing they can call their own, nor capable of any acquisition but for the benefit of others. They entreated the house to consider, that the restraints which the examples of such severity and injustice impose, are ever attended with the most dangerous hatred. In a distress of mind which could not be described, the petitioners conjured the house not to convert their zeal and affection, which have hitherto united every American hand and heart in the interests of England, into passions the most painful and pernicious; most earnestly they beseeched the house not to attempt reducing them to a state of slavery, which the English principles, which they inherit from their mother country, will render worse than death. The bill for regulating the government of Massachusett's bay, was that same day carried by a majority of almost five to one.

In the house of lords, the absolute necessity of a powerful and speedy remedy for the cure of a government, which was so totally debilitated as that of Massachusett's bay, was the chief reason assigned for the haste with which the bill was carried through, for declining to hear evidence at the bar, and for departing from the ordinary rules by which judicial proceedings are regulated. The lords in administration endeavoured to prove, that the process was not of a penal nature, so far from it, that it was beneficial and remedial. They went so far as to assert it to be a great improvement in the Massachusett's form of government, because it brought it nearer to the English model. All these assumptions were controverted by the minority lords, who strenuously opposed the bill, without being able to make any converts to their opinion. It passed on the 11th of May, 92 against 20. The licentiousness of the people was thus to be suppressed by the licentiousness of power. A protest was, however, entered on the journal, which was signed by eleven lords.

1774. In this protest it was maintained, that the rights which the inhabitants of Massachusett's bay enjoyed, by virtue of their charter, could not be properly taken away, without the definite legal offence, by which a forfeiture is incurred, being first clearly stated and fully proved, and the parties affected by such proceedings should have notice of the process, in order that they might plead in their own defence. Such a mode of proceeding is not technical formality, but substantial justice. It proceeded to say, that if the numerous land and marine forces which were ordered to assemble in Massachusett's bay, were not sufficient to keep that single colony in any state of order, until the cause of its charter can be fairly and equally tried, no regulations in this bill, nor in any other brought into that house, are sufficient for that purpose. Another objection made was because the appointment of all the members of the council, which this bill vested in the crown, is not a proper provision for the equilibrium of the colonial constitution, the crown being empowered to increase or lessen the number of the council on the report of the governor, which tends to destroy freedom of deliberation, and wholly to annihilate its use. The regulation respecting the sheriffs was another innovation strongly objected to in this protest, the appointment of them being by the will of the governor only, without requiring in the person appointed any local or other qualifications, and making that officer changeable by the governor and council, as often, and for such purposes, as they shall think expedient, is a power which the British constitution has not trusted to his majesty and his privy-council. Hereby the invaluable right of trial by jury is turned into a snare for the people, who have hitherto looked upon it as their main security against the licentiousness of power. It concludes with saying, "If the force proposed shall have its full effect, that effect, we greatly apprehend, may not continue longer than whilst the sword is held up. To render the colonies permanently advantageous, they must be satisfied with their condition.

The reception given to the other bill, which went to regulate the administration of justice in Massachusett's bay, in the house of lords, was similar to that which changed the nature of its government, where it was carried by 43 to 12. The minority lords, on this occasion, likewise entered a very strong protest, in which they assigned, among other reasons for their dissent from the bill, that, after the proscription of the port of Boston, the disfranchisement of the colony of Massachusett's bay, and the variety of provisions which have been made in the session for new-modelling the whole polity and judicature there, this bill is an humiliating confession of the weakness and inefficacy of all the proceedings of parliament, by supposing that it may be impracticable by any means which the public wisdom could devise, to obtain a fair trial there for any who act under government. By the bill, therefore, it is virtually acknowledged, that the British government is universally odious to the whole province, and that it is or may become hateful to the colonies, which is to publish to all the world, in terms the most emphatical, the little confidence the supreme legislature reposes in the affections of so large and so important a part of the British empire. The bill therefore amounts to a declaration, that the two houses of parliament know no means of retaining the colonies in due obedience, but by an army, rendered independent of the ordinary course of law in the place where they are employed. They likewise dissent, because they think that a military force, sufficient for governing upon this plan, cannot be maintained, without the inevitable ruin of the nation; and lastly, because the bill seems to be one of the many experiments, towards an introduction of essential innovations into the government of the empire.

Towards the close of the session, the house of commons took into consideration the state of the gold coin, some regulations respecting which had been made in the preceding session, and by a royal proclamation, which had been issued for that purpose. Evidence was given at the bar by some of the officers of the mint, and a gentleman from the bank, which went to prove the vast quantities of gold coin which had been diminished, and many resolutions were agreed to by the house. The deficient coin was called in, without any loss being sustained by the holders, and a recoinage took place. The whole amount of the gold coin, brought into the mint in consequence of the various regulations made in the year 1773 and 1774, amounted to upwards of twenty-three millions. We are told by a celebrated calculator, that in February 1772, $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. might be got by melting heavy guineas; gold in coin not being permitted to be exported to any large amount, whilst bullion was under no prohibition. What encouraged this kind of traffic was, that the balance of trade had been generally against us ever since the conclusion of the last war, arising from the increase of luxury and the national debt; for by the latter large sums were annually sent out of the kingdom, in payment of interest. The same writer gives it as his opinion, that enough had been done to restore the gold coin by the first coin act; and that all which was afterwards done had been nothing but a preparation of the coin for melters and exporters.

A BILL had passed the house of lords, with little notice, and but weak opposition, for the purpose of making more effectual provision for the government of the province of Quebec, in North America, and was brought to the commons on the 18th of May. On the second reading it was very strongly opposed.

BY his majesty's proclamation, dated 7th of October 1763, the countries, territories, and islands, ceded by the peace, were declared to be formed into four distinct governments, viz. Quebec, East Florida, West Florida, and Grenada, by virtue of letters patent, under the great seal of Great Britain; and the respective governors were vested with express power and direction, that, as soon as the state and condition of the said colonies would admit thereof, they should, with the advice and consent of the members of their respective provincial councils, summon and call the general assemblies within the said governments respectively, in such manner and form as is used and directed in those provinces and colonies in America, which are under the immediate government of the crown. And the governors were thereby farther empowered, by the consent of the council and representatives of the people so summoned, to make, constitute, and ordain laws, statutes, and ordinances, for the public peace, welfare, and good government of their colony, as near as may be agreeable to the laws of England, under such restrictions and regulations as are used in other colonies. And until such a form of government can be established, all persons inhabiting in, or resorting to, those colonies were assured of the royal protection, for the enjoyment of the benefit of the English laws; for which purpose courts of judicature were directed to be constituted, to determine all causes, as well criminal as civil, according to law and equity, and as near as may be agreeable to the laws of England, with a right of appeal to the king's privy-council, under the usual limitations and restrictions.

THE Quebec bill went to establish most important regulations. Its first object was to affix new boundaries to the province, in doing which, it in fact renounced the claims which had been made by commissioners appointed by the British court, to settle with the French the limits of Nova Scotia or Acadia, after the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, for it made the province of Quebec, or Canada, to extend along the southern coast of the river St. Lawrence, from Chaleur bay almost to Crown Point; to maintain the contrary to which was the principal business of that commission. The bill, in farther describing the new limits to the province, carried them over the whole interior country which lay behind the New England provinces, together with those of New York and Pennsylvania, to the borders of the Ohio. The limits would most probably have been extended quite to the back of Georgia, if the charter granted to the province of Virginia had not conveyed the right to all lands westward, quite to the river of Mississippi; so that here the progress was stopped, and it struck off westward, through no less than ten degrees of longitude, to the eastern banks of the Mississippi, from whence it proceeded northward, until it touched the southern boundary of the lands granted to the Hudson's Bay company, being from about the fortieth to the fiftieth degree of latitude.

These regions, in which nature delights in the majestic, include the five great lakes, were much more extensive than the kingdom of France, and are capable of subsisting a larger number of inhabitants. The other grand object in the bill was to new model the government of a province, thus extended to the circumference of a mighty empire. It granted the free exercise of the religion of the church of Rome, subject to the king's supremacy, and granted to the clergy of that church the power of holding, receiving, and enjoying their accustomed dues and rights, with respect to such persons only as shall profess that religion; a right being reserved in his majesty, to make such provision, out of the rest of the accustomed dues and rights, for the encouragement of the protestant religion, and for the maintenance and support of the protestant clergy, within the province, as shall appear necessary and expedient. In all matters of controversy relative to property and civil rights, within the province of Quebec, resort to be had to the laws of Canada, as the rule for their decision. The governor, lieutenant-governor, or commander-in-chief, with the consent of the legislative council, have the power of enacting new laws, except such as lay on any tax or duty, and repealing or altering old ones; but all such acts must receive the royal approbation to be in force. Real and personal estates might be disposed of by will, if executed either according to the laws of Canada or England. The criminal law of England was by this bill continued in the province. The provincial assembly was abolished, by being suspended in the following terms: "And whereas it is at present inexpedient to call an assembly, it is suspended, and the council is to consist of no more than 23, or less than 17, composed of persons resident in the province, and appointed by the king."

Mr. Dunning called it the most pernicious bill ever offered to parliament. He represented the form of government thereby given to the inhabitants of Canada, as essentially the same in form, and more liable to abuse, than the one they had formerly enjoyed under the crown of France; and that the ecclesiastical establishment granted to them was intended to cheat them out of their civil liberties as British subjects. It was intended, he said, to operate two ways; first, for establishing arbitrary power in that vast extent of country; and secondly, to employ that power, thus modified and rendered obedient to the will of the possessors, in assisting to overthrow the liberties of America. Mr. Thurlow (attorney general) stated to the house the different governments which had prevailed in Canada from the first settling in that country by the French, and contended that it was dangerous, cruel, and unprecedented, to establish new laws in a conquered country. General Carleton, governor of Canada, was examined. He shewed the inconsiderable number of protestants settled in Canada, compared with those who professed the Roman catholic faith. The inhabitants in general, he said, liked the old French laws in preference to the English form of government, and he was of opinion, the bill then depending would not be generally relished. In the progress of the business many other witnesses were examined, viz. Mr. Hay, chief justice of the province; Mr. Mazeres, cursitor-baron of the exchequer, and late attorney-general there, and agent to the English inhabitants of Canada; Dr. Marriott, the king's advocate-general in England; Mons. Lolbiniere, a French gentleman of considerable property in Canada. It was proposed, that general Murray, who was the first British governor in the colony, and continued in that capacity several years, should be summoned to attend; but it was overruled. The information obtained by these witnesses was principally as to the preference given by the French inhabitants to the French or English laws, and it seemed pretty evident that different sentiments prevailed among different ranks and conditions. The gentry made choice of the French code; the middle order and peasantry preferred the English laws.

A PETITION was presented to the house from Thomas and William Penn, owners of a great part of the province of Pennsylvania, representing the great injury their property would receive by the bill, and praying to be heard by counsel. Another petition was presented, signed by several merchants trading to Canada, which set forth, that several clauses in the bill would materially affect their property. Counsel was heard at the bar, in behalf of both petitions. A petition was likewise presented by the city of London against the bill. Serjeant Glynn insisted that it was a breach of the royal promise, contained in the proclamation in the year 1763, which declared, that all persons who would go over to Quebec should be entitled to the same laws and protection as they had had in England, whereas the bill before the house went to establish French laws, and the Roman catholic religion. In reply to the attorney-general he shewed, that it was far from being unprecedented to introduce a new code of laws into a conquered country; Ireland and Wales were proofs thereof.

In support of the bill it was urged, that the laws which regarded personal property, and contracts between man and man, were much the same in France as in England. The French had no notion of a trial by jury, and disliked it as an innovation. The treaty of Paris, it was said, had secured to the French Canadians the free exercise of their religion, as far as was consistent with the laws of England; and our penal laws, with respect to religion, it was asserted, did not extend beyond this kingdom as the king's supremacy did, and the Roman catholics of Canada were obliged by the act to give a proof of their allegiance by taking an oath which was prescribed against all such papal claims as interfered therewith. The securing to the Romish clergy their tythes, by the act, was no more than placing them in the condition which they stood in at the conquest, subject, however, to this disadvantage, that no person professing the protestant religion was to contribute any thing to their support. The extension of the boundaries of the province, beyond the limits described in the proclamation, was justified by the plea, that several French families were settled in remote parts of the country, beyond the former districts, and an entire colony was established among the Illinois Indians.

The opposition to the bill was founded on the notorious incongruity which appeared, in a British legislature establishing a form of arbitrary government in any part of the empire. Such a conduct was unknown in the history of this country, and would have been execrated at any other time than the present. The setting aside the assembly of the province was imputed to the utter dislike which the ministry bore to such popular deputations, as well as to all the rights of the people at large. The measure was called an experiment for setting up an arbitrary government in one colony, which may be more patient of it than the rest, in order to extend by degrees that mode of ruling to all the others. It was asked, Why is a trial by jury abolished in suits at law? Can the people be thought to have an objection to trust their property to a tribunal, to which they have trusted their lives? They insisted, that the grand security of liberty is the power of having civil actions tried by a jury, as in cases of arbitrary imprisonments, and many other violations of the right of the subject. The redress has been always sought in such a way. The English residing in Canada, and the merchants of Great Britain, who trusted their property on a presumption that it was under the protection of the English laws, would be greatly aggrieved in being subjected to French customs, and French forms of trial. The regulations made with respect to the religion of the country, was much objected to. Every one seemed willing to allow the most extensive toleration to the Roman catholic religion; but many warmly opposed the establishment of that religion throughout the province, and giving protestantism no more than a toleration. The popish clergy gain a legal parliamentary right to a maintenance; the protestant clergy are left at the king's discretion. Both ought at least to be put on an equal footing, and legal support provided for both.

This bill occasioned debates and larger minority upon each division than any of the bills respecting America, which had been before the house of commons this session. Many amendments were made to it, and the minority laboured hard to give a trial by jury at the option of the parties; but in this they failed, as well as in obtaining for the Canadians the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus. In consequence of the amendments it was sent back to the lords for their concurrence; which furnished lord Chatham with an opportunity of entering very fully into the merits of the bill. The amendments were agreed to, 25 against 7. The lord mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, presented an address to his majesty, praying that he would not give his royal assent to the Quebec bill, immediately on receiving of which, he went to the house of peers, and gave his royal assent to such bills as were ready, of which this bill was one, and then put an end to the session.

It is very remarkable that all the regulations made in this session of parliament, respecting the government of the American colonies, were in exact conformity to governor Hutchinson's idea of colonial administration, as expressed in an extract from one of his letters, which we have given. By extending the limits of the province of Quebec to all lands situated behind the northern and middle colonies, which were not expressly included in any charter, if any settlements were already made by any of the colonists, on parts out of their limits, which was very probable, such settlers would be immediately deprived of their democratic form of government. It also circumscribed the old colonies within certain limits, which, if in future times they should be found too narrow for their increased population, those who sought new possessions would be obliged to relinquish their chartered form of government.

Another act, which affected the province of Quebec, received the royal assent at the same time; the purport of which was to establish a fund, towards further defraying the charges of the administration of justice, and support of the civil government, within that province. The French had laid duties on rum, brandy, and other liquors imported into the province of Canada, now called the province of Quebec, and upon all dry goods imported into, and exported from, that province; all of which by this act were taken off, and in their stead was laid a duty of 3*d.* per gallon on brandy and other spirits, the manufacture of Great Britain. On West India rum, or other spirits, 6*d.* per gallon; on American 9*d.*; rum or spirits of foreign manufacture 1*s.* Molasses and syrups were to pay similar duties, according to the ports from whence they were brought. The same act obliged every person keeping a house of public entertainment, or retailing wine or other liquors, to take out a licence, for which he was to pay 30*s.* The revenue arising from the duties on merchandize was appropriated to defraying the expences of the administration of justice, and the support of the civil government in the province. The money arising from licences was granted to his majesty. This act, therefore, served to establish in the province both commercial and internal taxation, as well as the right of parliament to dispose of the money raised by taxes there, either to the support of the province, or for any other purpose they should think proper to apply it to. This act was essential to the perfection of that system of government which was framed for Quebec. Notwithstanding which, it was little noticed, either in its progress through the two houses, or by the people at large.

On the 10th of May, 1774, died Lewis XV. king of France, in the 65th year of his age, and 59th of his reign; who was succeeded by his grandson, Lewis XVI., then almost twenty years of age. The young king had been four years married to a princess of the house of Austria. On his accession, he found his kingdom recovering from that state of confusion into which it had been plunged by the improvidence of his predecessor, but who, in the latter part of his reign, had applied every method to rectify the disorders of state. Lord North took occasion to speak of this event in the house of commons. He said, a great and good prince was dead, who was a man of an amiable and peaceable mind; but his successor was not only wise and œconomical, but a pacific prince, who would not enter into any unnecessary war to try projects. The new reign produced a new minister of finance, Mr. Turgot. The edicts issued during his administration were phænomena in the political world; an absolute king rendering account to his subjects, and inciting his people to claim a right, which it has been the business of all absolute kings and their ministers to extinguish in the minds of men; but the regulations which he aimed at introducing excited so strong an opposition, that he was soon obliged to quit his post, which was given to a man, who afterwards accomplished what the other had attempted in vain, by introducing a very general reformation in the government and affairs of France, so far as the public revenue was concerned.

Meanwhile the consequences which were expected to follow from the exemplary punishments inflicted on the colony of Massachusett's bay, were not realised. The spirit of rivalship, which used to prevail in the American sea-port towns, now no longer subsisted. No merchant discovered the slightest disposition to advantage himself by the shutting up of the port of Boston; and the colonies in general, instead of deprecating that vengeance of the mother country towards themselves, which they saw fallen on one province, considered it as a common cause, and were forward to express their adherence to the principles which had incurred such heavy punishment. An agreement was drawn up at Boston, which was called, A Solemn League and Covenant, the subscribers to which bound themselves, in the most solemn manner, to suspend all commercial intercourse with Great Britain, until the Boston port-bill, and the other obnoxious acts of parliament, were repealed, and the colony of Massachusett's bay fully restored to the rights which it derived from its charter. The people, not only in the New England governments, but in the other provinces, entered into this new league with the utmost eagerness. A general congress was held at Philadelphia, in the beginning of September, 1774, deputies to which were chosen by the houses of representatives of each province. The smaller colonies sent two, and the larger ones seven. The whole number of delegates amounted to fifty-one. The province of Georgia alone did not accede to the confederacy. In this general assembly each colony had no more than a single vote, whether its deputation was more or less numerous.

On the 30th of September, 1774, the parliament was suddenly dissolved by a royal proclamation, after having sat six years, and the writs for electing a new house of commons were returnable on the 29th of November following. As this was a very unexpected measure, because an unusual exertion of the regal prerogative, no similar instance having happened for almost thirty years, it gave the ministry great advantages in the election of members. Indeed the exigencies of the crown and the state of public affairs were such, that administration could not allow that the next session of parliament should be employed in framing such popular acts, as constantly take place in the last session of parliament. The ministry had very important, and not very agreeable objects before them: the one was to pay off the debts incurred upon the civil establishment, and to obtain an increase in the annual revenue; the other, to bring the Americans to unconditional obedience; and only a house of commons which was just entered on its functions could venture to concur in such designs.

Although the parliament which was now dissolved had, in some particular instances, been adverse to the minister, and left him in a minority; a conduct which had ever been considered, in former administrations, as portending his removal; yet no one of these instances was succeeded by any diminution of the minister's influence, in any of the grand objects pursued by government. On the contrary his lordship seemed, like Antæus, to gain strength by every fall. In no parliament, since the revolution, did the crown obtain so great an increase of influence as in this. A parliament, in the reign of Richard II., was called, the wonder-working parliament, because it punished the judges and ministers with severity, and endeavoured to reconcile the king and his people. Other parliaments have likewise been distinguished by titles expressive of the general tendency of their conduct, on which account that house of commons which increased the national debt upwards of sixty millions, during the preceding war, was called by some the prodigal parliament. On the same principle, the thirteenth parliament of Great Britain might with propriety be entitled, the regal parliament. At the close of it, lord North appeared to be firmly established in his high office; indeed his abilities were admirably adapted to the conducting of affairs in the house of commons, by his steady attention and application to business, his coolness in debate, and talents as a speaker. For having now sat in three parliaments, he had corrected very strong natural impediments, which lay in the way of his becoming an orator, and had acquired a very agreeable and persuasive elocution, which he employed, with great address, in foiling the attacks made upon him from various parts of the house. On all occasions he maintained his dignity, without appearing to assume or dictate.

These qualities led a learned law-officer of the crown to remark in the house, that although many members might be ready to name some one whom they considered as better qualified to act as prime minister, according as their party attachments or private friendships influenced their judgments, yet all those gentlemen, he believed, would agree in acknowledging, that, next to the man of their choice, no one was so eligible as the lord who then held that post; from whence he inferred that he was actually the best qualified for it, when partiality and prejudice were gratified; all parties agree in their second nomination; impartial reason will declare such an one pre-eminently meritorious.

CHAPTER XXIV.

GEORGE III.

[1774, 1775.]

Evils foretold on the first Settlement of Colonies in America—General Gage appointed to the chief Command—First Meeting of the American Congress—Feelings of the English People—Lord Chatham's Motion in the House of Lords—Mr. Burke's System of American Government—Conduct of the Earl of Effingham—Sentiments of the European States respecting the Contest between England and America—Evacuation of Boston by the English—Battle of Bunker's Hill and other Operations.

WHEN the design of establishing colonies in North America first became a national object, in the reign of James I., the speculative politicians of the age raised many objections to the measure, and foretold, that after draining the mother country of inhabitants, the colonies would shake off her yoke, and establish for themselves an independent government. More than a century and a half, however, had elapsed, and neither of these predictions had been realised. Experience had shewn, that the depopulation of Great Britain, by emigrations to America, was not to be feared, and the apprehension of the colonies declaring their independence does not appear to have been entertained, by the government of England, till the conclusion of the peace between France and Spain. Notwithstanding this security, it was evident that a time would arrive, when the northern continent of the New World, being overspread by a race of men, active, enterprising, and enthusiastically attached to freedom, would regard restraints as oppressions. The time at length approached, when the establishment of parliamentary taxation appeared to the Americans as an act of unjust and arbitrary violence; and it was obvious, that whenever their population should have trebled its present amount, that accession would lead them to disregard those prohibitions, which deprived them of the liberty to work up the materials which their earth yielded, for the purposes of civil life. The present race of Americans did not openly complain of the commercial restrictions which were laid upon them, but their immediate descendants, yet unborn; if it had happened that an uninterrupted course of prosperity had nurtured them into a contempt of secondary importance, they would have thought such burdens too grievous to be endured; at least, the history of mankind will warrant such a supposition, for subordination can be expected only from the weak to the strong. When such a revolt should have caused them to be upbraided with ingratitude to their parent state, they might have replied, "We have enriched you by our commerce whilst we were your dependants, we will still continue to do so on the footing of friends and equals; but our state of minority is now past.

AN independent condition is always accompanied by an independent spirit. Even a colony of Frenchmen, in whose breasts allegiance to their king was, at that period, the most active public principle, when they grew sufficiently numerous and powerful to support themselves, would have looked to independence as their right.

THE nature of the government established in British America, and the conduct of our kings towards the colonies, had uniformly been such as to encourage, instead of checking an independent spirit. The general law of descent, in the New England provinces, is the extension of that which is known among us by the title of gavel-kind, for the children equally share the patrimony, which effectually bars the acquisition, or at least the perpetuity of large fortunes, and greatly promotes a republican spirit.

It has been asserted, that when a plan of taxation for America was proposed to sir Robert Walpole, he rejected it, saying, "Let such measures be adopted by my successors, I never will undertake so intricate a business." It is, however, certain, that his administration was the precise time for introducing such a form of government, as should correct whatever had been found to be wrong, or too indulgent, in the charters, and for familiarising the people to the mode of internal taxation, rather than to the burdens of it, which might have gradually increased in proportion to their ability of bearing them. The more opulent and considerable Americans should have been ennobled, and composed a legislative body in each province, to check the democratic tendency of the popular assemblies.

In short, it required the most penetrating eye, the most determined hand, and the most enlightened head, to establish such a system of government, among the rising colonies, as would have secured their attachment and obedience throughout a series of ages; and the proper time for adopting these establishments was, when they were beginning to reckon their population by millions. To introduce an hierarchy might be what the friends of perpetual subordination would rather have wished than supposed practicable. Fifty years before, address and management might have proved successful in warping the natural disposition of the people in civil establishments; but in religious matters the Americans were ever inflexible.

The views of the legislature towards America, before the commencement of the present reign, were entirely occupied about raising the colonies from a state of imbecility to a vigorous maturity; which was no sooner effected, than popular discontents and unsettled government at home greatly lessened that respect and awe, in which Great Britain had been held. We are now to relate the events which happened immediately after passing those restrictive acts of parliament, which shut up the port of Boston, and gave a new form of government to the colony of Massachusett's bay; a time when mutual distrust was rankling into bitter enmity.

That the coercive measures taken by government might produce their desired effect upon the people, general Gage was appointed commander-in-chief of the forces in North America, and governor of Massachusett's bay. This gentleman had resided many years on the American continent, had filled many respectable posts, and had rendered himself popular by his general conduct. On his arrival at Boston in May, 1774, Mr. Hutchinson, the late governor, embarked for England.

Such was the prevailing temper of the people, as to render them little inclined to welcome, with sincere gratulations, any governor who might be placed over them, however they might venerate the personal qualities of the man. Nothing like dismay or remorse had been excited on the arrival of the act of parliament, by which the port of Boston was to be shut up. That which was meant as a punishment for sedition and violence, served only to rouse a more general spirit of resentment and opposition. The people felt the weight of the chastisement rather as citizens than as traders, and were more incensed at what they thought an arbitrary deprivation of their natural rights, than depressed by the prospect of ruin which it laid before them. Copies of the act of parliament were printed, and dispersed with great expedition over the whole continent of North America, south of the river St. Lawrence, and the cause of Boston was represented as the cause of all. The alarm became general. At many places the act was burnt with great solemnity. The day on which it became in force was devoted to fasting, prayer, and humiliation, throughout the whole continent, with very few exceptions. This devotional fervour was accompanied with a very spirited conduct, which the governors of the respective districts in vain attempted to oppose.

The new governor of Massachusett's bay was probably little prepared to meet so general and determined a confederacy. As he had heretofore had many opportunities of acquainting himself with the temper and disposition of the Americans, it would be a libel on the British cabinet to suppose that he had not been consulted on the effect which was likely to be produced from this decisive proceeding of Great Britain, in which case, the opinion which he held cannot be doubted; for, by accepting the government, he shewed that he flattered himself with the expectation of restoring tranquillity: but human expectancy is the vainest of all vain things!

The first time the governor met the provincial assembly was merely to open his commission, to signify in form to that body the restrictive act of parliament respecting the port of Boston, and to appoint the next meeting to be held at Salem, on the 2nd of June following, for the dispatch of business. This assembly, when convened there, adhered closely to the example of the English parliament in the reign of Charles I.; they made the consideration of grievances precede all other business.

A resolution was passed in the house of representatives, that a general meeting of committees for the several colonies was expedient, and, at the same time, they named five gentlemen to represent that province, and voted £500 for their use. The governor refused to confirm this resolution, so that it became invalid; whereupon the assembly recommended to several towns and districts, to raise the money by equitable proportions. The house then came to many resolutions, with great secrecy, unanimity, and dispatch; recommending to the inhabitants of the province entirely to renounce the consumption of India teas, and, as far as possible, to discontinue the use of all goods imported from the East Indies, and from Great Britain, until the public grievances of America should be radically and totally redressed; in order to which, it was recommended that they should give every possible encouragement to the manufactures of America.

The governor, having obtained intelligence of these proceedings, sent his secretary to make declaration of his dissolving the assembly. He found the door locked; and, having sent to acquaint the speaker that he had a message from the governor to deliver to the house, he received for answer, "that the doors must be kept fast." The secretary, being thus debarred admittance, caused proclamation to be made on the stairs of the dissolution of the general assembly, which put a final end to the existence of that body in the province of Massachusett's bay, as founded on the charter granted by king William and queen Mary. Still, however, some feeble efforts were made, by a small number at Boston, to deprecate the vengeance of the mother country, and a sum of money was raised, for the purpose of indemnifying the East India company for the tea which had been destroyed; but notwithstanding the governor exerted all his influence in cherishing and increasing this propensity to obedience, it was borne down by the tide of popular fury, until the arrival of the act of parliament which deprived the colony of Massachusett's bay of its charter, and introduced a new form of government there, which served to alienate the minds of the small remnant, who had till then retained their principles of loyalty uncorrupted.

The people of Massachusett's, (zealously attached, not only to the principles, but even to the forms which prevailed in the last century, during the grand conflict between the king and the puritans,) subscribed a confederacy, which they called, A Solëmn League and Covenant, whereby they bound themselves to maintain no kind of intercourse whatever with Great Britain, from the 31st day of August following, until the Boston port-bill and the subsequent American acts should be repealed. The parties to this agreement engaged themselves farther not to consume or purchase any kind of goods which might arrive after that time; and whoever should import or vend any goods, the manufacture of Great Britain, were deemed enemies to their country, and cut off from all social intercourse. In civil contentions, neutrality is held to be criminal; such, therefore, as would not subscribe to this test, had their names made public, as enemies to their country, and abettors of the attempts to enslave it. A philosophic moderation, as it is non-efficient upon the impetuous multitude, must be disclaimed, when the interests and passions of men cause civil distractions; hence the advocates for liberty are frequently hurried into acts of tyranny. It may be affirmed, that England had never less freedom than under the government of the long parliament, and afterwards under Oliver Cromwel.

The violence of the people at Boston was, however, somewhat overawed by the arrival of large bodies of troops at different times; and the justices of Plymouth county signed a congratulatory address to general Gage, in which the establishment of committees of correspondence, and the compact entered into by the solemn league and covenant, were reprobated. The gentlemen of the county of Worcester also signed a protest against all riotous and seditious practices. The province of New York, though not inclined to yield obedience to the regulations of the British parliament, was yet averse to become a party to that open opposition which their northern neighbours had shewn, and preferred the milder expedient of stating their grievances to parliament in an humble address, which the majority of their house of representatives agreed to. No such means of reconciliation were sought by the province of Maryland; the people there vying with those of Boston in their unqualified resentment. The extensive province of Virginia was on very bad terms with lord Dunmore, its governor. That province first appointed a committee of correspondence, in order to propose to the other colonies, that deputies from each should be appointed to meet annually, in general congress, there to deliberate upon such measures as became necessary for the common interest of America.

Even the capital of Pennsylvania, a city whose very name denotes brotherly love and good-will, and which its benevolent founder ardently wished should ever prevail among the inhabitants, so far from declining to become a party in the contention with Great Britain, readily received delegates from each of the colonies, the two Carolinas included, and which composed a general congress, which first sat on the 5th of September, 1774. The colony of Georgia alone was not represented in this assembly. These deputies were chosen by the houses of representatives, from each of the twelve old colonies; viz. New Hampshire, Massachusett's bay, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, Jersey, Maryland, Virginia, Pennsylvania, the counties on the Delaware, North and South Carolina; the smaller of which sent two deputies, and the largest ones seven. The whole number of delegates amounted to fifty-one. In this general assembly of the American states, each colony had no more than a single vote, whether its deputation was more or less numerous. So that a contrariety of opinion, among the deputies from any particular province, if the majority was in favour of the measure, did not occasion a dissenting voice in the congress. New Hamsphire and Rhode Island sent two deputies each, New Jersey and Maryland four, Virginia six. The sense of any colony could not be taken, if their deputation was equally divided in their opinions.

The first acts of this body were declaratory of the allegiance which the American states owed and acknowledged to their sovereign, of their affection to Great Britain, their dependence upon her, and of the benefits and favours which they had received from their parent state. In the most explicit terms they declined any wish of becoming separated from and independent of Great Britain; but, at the same time, they declared themselves entitled to a participation of all the rights and privileges of British-born subjects. That the power lately assumed by parliament was unjust, and the only cause of all the present uneasiness; that the late acts, respecting the capital and province of Massachusett's bay were unconstitutional, oppressive, and dangerous. These sentiments were expressed in a public act, which they called a declaration of rights, in which they kept close to the example set them by the third parliament in the reign of Charles I. The specification of their rights is full and explicit, and was followed by an enumeration of their grievances. As the most effectual means to obtain a redress the congress recommended to the several colonies, to abide by those agreements which they had entered into, not to import or consume any British goods or merchandize, or any East India teas, or the products of the British West India islands, after the first day of December, 1774, from which time they would wholly discontinue the slave-trade. There were many other articles recommended, but nothing was authoritatively enjoined.

Congress afterwards agreed to petition his majesty; they likewise framed an address to the people of Great Britain, and another to the inhabitants of Quebec. In the petition they laid a variety of grievances before the throne, distinct from and independent of the present subject of dispute. The addresses were drawn up with great ingenuity and force of reasoning; the first was designed to shew, that the people of England had, in the last century, contended with their kings, for the preservation of the same rights which the Americans were now deprived of by a British parliament. They insisted that the oppression was essentially the same, although the oppressors were changed. But not altogether relying on the efficacy of this appeal to the justice of the nation, the addressers endeavoured to gain it over to the cause of America, by representing that the certain consequences of unconditional submission, being exacted from her, would be the subversion of the constitution of the mother-country; and the tyranny of an aristocracy being engrafted on that of the crown.

The address to the inhabitants of Quebec aimed at persuading them, that they were cajoled out of those natural rights, which had been secured to them at the last peace, by the insidious act which established the Roman religion in Canada. The principles laid down were supported by the authority of the greatest political writers of France, and these French Americans were invited to become parties in a league which equally concerned all. Little else was transacted in this first session of the congress, which was closed on the 26th of October following. These proceedings in America, which indicated the most determined opposition to the measures which had been adopted by the British legislature, being sufficiently known in England, the king met this new parliament. The first lord of the treasury entered upon his parliamentary campaign under circumstances of peculiar embarrassment. All the predictions which he had delivered concerning that submissive temper which would be produced by wholesome severity were falsified, and no alternative remained, but to plunge the nation into a civil war, or to degrade it by undoing whatever had been done. If, in this situation, the minister could console himself with the reflection, that he was neither the original framer of any one of those acts, nor their strenuous supporter in the cabinet; yet such a declaration would have availed him little in the house of commons, against an active opposition, who, by shifting their ground, could attack him, with equal advantage, upon his unimportance in the cabinet, as his delusive expectations in the senate.

The speech from the throne was couched in as mild terms as the state of affairs would admit of, without renouncing the point contended for. It neither described the general defection of the colonies, nor spoke of any one colony, as being in a state of actual rebellion. Lord Beauchamp moved for the address, and expressed himself with some warmth on the conduct of the Americans. The disposition of the new parliament was quickly seen by the style of the address, which was presented in answer to the speech; and although the opposition attempted to counteract the views of the ministry, by proposing an amendment, which gave rise to a long and spirited debate, yet upon a division of the house, their numbers appeared comparatively small.

But however ministry were proved to have been deceived in their expectations from America, yet the sudden dissolution of parliament became, from that very disappointment, the means by which they continued in power. Things were now brought to a crisis, that a house of commons, guided by the voice of the people, which in the concluding session of parliament is essential to their immediate views, dared not to have proceeded upon a plan of coercion. It was indeed now generally understood, that the new-modelling the form of government throughout North America, and securing that continent to Great Britain, by introducing such regulations as might form habits of subordination and obedience, was the favourite object of the sovereign, and to propose the means by which such a renovation of loyalty might be effected, was the surest introduction to royal favour; notwithstanding which, the nation was very much divided in opinion concerning the proper conduct to be observed towards America. Some were for coercion, because they hoped to derive a revenue therefrom; and the lowest plebeians, whom neither nature nor education had qualified to decide upon an intricate subject, thought themselves able to adjust this dispute, by only asking the plain question, Why should not the Americans pay taxes as well as we? National pride, as well as an idea of national interest, strongly enforced the same doctrine. Superadded to these considerations, motives neither national nor laudable actuated not a few to foment the quarrel with America; such as the prospect of lucrative contracts, appointments, and a distribution of the confiscated estates of the American ringleaders. All these were powerful incentives to action; however, the contrary opinion was rescued from contempt, both by the numbers and the consequence of those who avowed it. The country gentlemen, although the pillars of prerogative, foresaw that the land-tax must be advanced to 4*s.* in the pound, as soon as the sword be drawn; and, although the ability of Great Britain to enforce her laws was not doubted, yet whether a revenue could be drawn from America, should her submission be secured, appeared highly problematical. The commercial interest was yet more deeply affected by an open rupture. The colonies stood indebted to the British merchants about four millions sterling, which, though a vast sum, was no more than the amount of a twelvemonth's commerce. This respectable body of men not only saw themselves deprived of a most lucrative trade, but cut off from all hope of obtaining speedy payment of the sums due to them, and in danger of losing them for ever. A numerous body of manufacturers derived their only means of subsistence from the intercourse with the colonies, and therefore considered the non-importation agreement, which their consumers had entered into, as the greatest possible evil, and were anxious for a reconciliation upon any terms. Besides these classes of men, whose particular and immediate interests urged them to become strenuous advocates in the American cause, there were many people, who, though influenced by no private or interested views, could neither see the justice nor expediency of compelling the Americans to absolute submission, and the operative principle of private interest among the bulk, gave an energy and force to such speculative reasoning.

The meeting of parliament was the important moment for action; the sense of the house had been taken as soon as it was assembled, and it had been found to be in perfect unison with the former parliament, so that the temper which dictated the resolutions of the cabinet, was likely to infuse itself into the legislative part of the constitution. The great question now was, Whether British spirit should be opposed to American spirit; whether bold, vigorous, and judicious exertions should be immediately made to crush that opposition, before it had gained strength, which it was found could not be terrified into acquiescence. In such a situation, to temporise was to yield; delay and irresolution added fuel to the flame: but in conducting this momentous business, the confidential servants of the crown shewed themselves better qualified for drawing the nation into hostile measures, by secret and imperceptible steps, than at once to bear down opposition in both countries by the spirit and ability which were conspicuous in their plans. The nation was lulled into security by the number of seamen, for the year 1775, being reduced to 16,000 men; the land forces were also fixed at 17,547 effective men, officers and invalids included, a smaller force than the preceding year.

Whilst administration seemed totally to have forgotten the state of affairs in America; addresses were presented both to the king and to the parliament, from the city of London, and various parts of the kingdom, representing the dreadful consequences which the enforcement of the late rigorous acts would produce; and expressing an earnest desire, that a reconciliation with America might take place. A petition from the merchants residing in London, and trading to America, was presented to the house of commons by Mr. Alderman Hayley; a similar one from Bristol, by Mr. Burke; the West India merchants and planters also stated in a petition, how deeply they were concerned in this dispute; stating, that an interruption of the intercourse between the British American continent and those islands, was likely not only to deprive the latter of the means of sending their produce to Europe, but to cause a great body of people to perish for want of sustenance. A committee of the house of commons was appointed, to whom these petitions were referred.

In the mean time, the petition from the American congress to the king had been transmitted to London; but the agents appointed to present it were informed, that his majesty could not possibly receive any thing which came from that body, as such a step would be acknowledging its legality

On the 26th of January, sir George Saville moved, in the house of commons, to present a petition from three American agents, viz. Messrs. Bollen, Franklin, and Lee, stating, that they were authorised by the American congress to present a petition of that assembly to the king, which petition his majesty had referred to the house; the petitioners therefore desired to be heard at the 1776.

bar in support of it, being, as they said, able to throw great light on the subject. The granting of this prayer was strongly opposed, from the same reason which excluded the petition from the throne, and it was thrown out by a majority of 218 to 68. As it was well known that the Americans had formed great expectations from this application, and the minister, only three days before, had assigned as a reason of the delay in proceeding on the American business, that such a petition was coming over, and that it was of so conciliatory a nature, as to make way for healing and lenient measures, and for reconciling all matters in an amicable manner, such a conduct appeared somewhat paradoxical, and indicated, that no kind of compromise could take place; at the same time, it might be plainly inferred, that this austerity on the part of government was just then assumed.

Such being the temper which dictated measures, the application by the general assembly of the province of New York, to the house of commons, was not permitted to lie upon the table. The city of New York was the rival port to Boston; the Yorkists were as much distinguished by their love of gaiety and pleasure, as the Bostonians were for their austere and rigid demeanor. A people so opposite, in interests and habits, could only be compelled to unite through necessity; and hence the former were desirous of making their peace with Great Britain upon terms, though they abhorred the idea of unconditional submission; but the ministry thought such a qualified allegiance not worth obtaining.

All negotiation being now at an end, Franklin soon after embarked for Boston, where he was received with every mark of respect and confidence. His unremitting exertions in the cause in which he was engaged, contributed essentially to its support and furtherance. The ministry, who well knew how dangerous an enemy this man was, had declared the northern colonies to be in a state of actual rebellion before his departure; state necessity therefore pointed out to them, that he should be detained in England. Mr. Pitt, when he declared general warrants to be illegal, at the same time acknowledged that he himself had issued them upon great emergencies. The parliament, which approved the measures pursuing against America, would most assuredly have indemnified both the advisers and executors of such a stretch of power as the detaining this man. Upon the same principle, it would have been a proper conduct in general Gage to have prevented the conveyance of arms and ammunition out of the town of Boston, which were, however, carried off without question or molestation.

As soon as the house of lords met after Christmas, the earl of Dartmouth, then secretary of state, laid before it the official papers received from America, upon which occasion the earl of Chatham inveighed with great spirit against the dilatoriness of administration, and moved "to address his majesty to cause orders to be issued to general Gage, that he remove the forces from the town of Boston, as soon as the season of the year, and other circumstances indispensable to the safety and accommodation of the troops, may render it practicable." He urged the necessity of such a step, as the means of opening a way for settling the dangerous troubles in America, by beginning to allay ferments and soften animosities there. He said, the time now lost might produce years of calamity, and pledged himself that he would not desert for a moment the conduct of this mighty business, from the first to the last, unless nailed to his bed by the extremity of sickness; but would knock at the door of a sleeping ministry, and rouse them to a sense of their imminent danger.

The times were greatly changed since this wonderful man "moulded the attentive senate; charmed, persuaded, exalted;" and, by the force of his matchless eloquence, annihilated all opposition. He now addressed an assembly, whose preconceived opinions were not to be shaken by the strongest arguments. He could now no longer gain upon his audience by touching their master-passion, and placing full in their view the advancement of their country's dignity and power. He now maintained a doctrine quite repugnant to the pride, the prejudice, and, as it was imagined, the interest of those who heard him. Wrapped in the contemplation of their own grandeur and irresistible strength, they considered all predictions of disgrace, humiliation, and ruin, as the images of a sick fancy, the suggestions of a melancholy mourner; yet all these disadvantages did not deter this venerable statesman, whose "old experience" had attained to "somewhat like a prophetic strain," from predicting, with great confidence, the consequences which would infallibly result, if the measures which had been adopted were persisted in. He described the situation of the troops at Boston, as truly unworthy being penned up, and pining in inglorious inactivity, he called them an army of impotence and contempt, and to make the folly equal to the disgrace, they were an army of irritation and vexation; "you irritate your colonies to unappeasable rancour. It is not repealing this or that act of parliament, it is not repealing a piece of parchment, that can restore America to our bosom, we must repeal her fears and her resentments; and we may then hope for her love and gratitude. But now, insulted by an armed force posted at Boston, irritated with an hostile array before her eyes, concessions, if they could be forced, would be suspicious and insecure; but it is more than evident, that you cannot force them, principled and united as they are, to your unworthy terms of submission—it is impossible. We shall be forced ultimately to retract, let us retract whilst we can do it with honour. The violent oppressive acts must be repealed. I pledge myself for it, that you will in the end repeal them. I stake my reputation on it. I will consent to be taken for an ideot, if they are not finally repealed. Avoid then this humiliating, this disgraceful necessity. With a dignity becoming your exalted situation, make the first advances to concord, to peace and happiness; for that is your true dignity, to act with prudence and with justice. Every motive, therefore, of justice and of policy, of dignity and of prudence, urges you to allay the ferment in America, by a removal of your troops from Boston, by a repeal of your acts of parliament, and by demonstration of amicable dispositions towards your colonies. On the other hand, every danger and every hazard impend to deter you from perseverance in your present ruinous measures. Foreign war hanging over your heads by a slight and brittle thread; France and Spain watching your conduct, and waiting for the maturity of your errors."

The noble earl concluded his animated harangue in the following emphatical manner: "My lords, if the ministers thus persevere in misadvising and misleading the king, I will not say that they can alienate the affections of his subjects from the crown, but I will affirm that they will make the crown not worth his wearing. I will not say that the king is betrayed, but I will pronounce that the kingdom is undone." The motion was rejected 68 to 18.

This motion, made by the noble earl, was only preparatory to a bill which he had framed, for the purpose of conciliation with America, which he proposed to the house on the 1st of February; it went to repeal all the acts which had been passed in the former session, relative to America, in which were included the Quebec act, and another act, which regulated the quartering of soldiers. It also went to repeal eight acts of parliament, which had been passed in the present reign, from the fourth year thereof to the twelfth. It proposed to restrain the powers of the admiralty and vice-admiralty courts in America within their antient limits, and to establish the trial by jury in all such civil cases in which it had been lately abolished; the judges to hold their offices and salaries as the judges in England, quam diu se bene gesserint. It declared the colonies of America to be justly entitled to the privileges, franchises, and immunities granted by their several charters or constitutions, and that such charters ought not to be invaded or resumed, unless for misuse, or some legal ground of forfeiture. This bill, although rejected by a large majority, was yet supported by a much more numerous minority than the motion which preceded it.

This attempt to overturn all that government had done, with regard to America, seemed to rouse administration from their lethargic stupor. The minister presented a message from his majesty to the house of commons, recommending an augmentation of the forces by sea and land; which being complied with, and 2000 additional seamen, and 4383 land forces voted, the house being resolved into a committee on the American papers, he moved for leave to bring in a bill, to restrain the trade and commerce of the provinces of New Hampshire and Massachusett's bay, the colonies of Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Providence Plantation, in North America, to Great Britain, Ireland, and the British islands in the West Indies, and to prohibit such provinces and colonies from carrying on any fishery on the banks of Newfoundland, or other places therein mentioned, under certain conditions, and for a limited time. Still the severity of punishment was confined to the northern colonists, and the minister represented this restraining bill as a just retaliation, for those colonies refusing to trade with Great Britain. The fisheries both nourished the vigour and advanced the consequence of the New Englanders; fisheries not only supplied multitudes of their own people with food, but trained a race of seamen as robust, hardy, and undaunted as any upon the globe. The vessels employed therein were privileged to dispose of their cargoes in any ports south of cape Finisterre; so that the rigid disciples of John Calvin furnished the catholics of Portugal, Spain, and even of the Italian states, with their Lenten entertainment. The returns made in these voyages were brought to the ports of Great Britain, and became the payment for British manufactures, with which these ships were freighted home. To prohibit a commerce so extensive, and which employed several thousand Americans, was a bold step. It invested the governor of each province with such a power to discriminate between rebels and loyalists, as flesh and blood could scarcely be supposed capable of exercising disinterestedly and justly. It tended to convert into enemies a very powerful body of men, and no satisfactory proof was adduced that the fisheries could be carried on to an equal extent, and as effectually, from any of the ports of Great Britain or Ireland.

Whatever inconveniencies the New England colonists endured from this prohibition, they found means, however, to repay the injury in kind upon the British fisheries at Newfoundland; for, by withholding their wonted supplies of provision, all the distresses of famine were suffered for a considerable time, until they received a supply from Ireland, by which exhausted life was repaired; but the means of subsistence became from that time more precarious and less abundant.

The severity of this bill was disrelished by many friends of government, who had hitherto supported coercive measures towards America. In order therefore to quiet their scruples, the first lord of the treasury brought forward another American act, which bore a different complexion. This he professed to be a plan of reconciliation with the colonies, and thereby to invite them to return with confidence to the arms of Great Britain. It enacted, that the governor, council, and assembly of any province or colony, upon making provision, according to their abilities, for the common defence, (which provision should be disposable by parliament,) and for the support of the civil government and administration of justice in such province, if such contribution should be approved of by his majesty in parliament, then Great Britain should forbear, in respect of such colony, to levy any duties or taxes, such only excepted as may be expedient for the regulation of commerce; and the neat produce of such to be carried to the account of the province so acting.

The minister acknowledged it to be very probable that these propositions might not be acceptable to the Americans in general, as they certainly did not go to all their claims. The resolutions were, however, just, humane, and wise, and they would, he believed, think them well worthy of their attention; but whatever might be the fate of these measures, he felt that he had done his duty fairly and consistently. If it did no good there, it would do good here, it would unite the people of England, by holding out to them a distinct object of revenue; as it united England it would disunite America; there it would tend to separate the grain from the chaff; whatever province came first to make a dutiful offer, would be kindly and gently treated; but if but one province accepted the offer, the whole confederacy would be broken, and that union, which alone rendered them formidable, would be dissolved.

In every point of view, this bill did not produce the effect expected from it; for it neither strengthened the hands of government at home, nor made proselytes in America.

The great advantage on the side of government, throughout this parliamentary struggle, was derived from its unanimity; whereas the opposition was composed of such discordant parts, as were not likely to unite firmly and strenuously in any one point, but in endeavouring to disconcert the present system of politics; so that, whenever it became a question, what should substituted in its stead? many adopted the sentiment of the Roman poet, Nullius addictus jurare in verbo magistri. Lord Chatham's plan was not cordially relished by many who wished a reconciliation with America, and indeed independent of the particular views and private interests of the several leaders, (a source of disagreement sufficiently fruitful,) nothing could be more complicated than the business of adjusting a practical plan of reconciliation, which would meet the approbation of both countries, such as would cause their rising resentments to subside, their jarring interests no longer to clash, and the apprehension of future rivalship to be removed; this was so stupendous a work, as perhaps to surpass the powers of humanity, unsupported by the supreme authority of the state. It was, however, attempted (mangre royal patronage) by a man, in whom natural endowments, and acquired accomplishments, appeared in their full lustre. Mr. Burke laid before the house of commons, on the 22nd of March, 1775, thirteen resolutions for conciliation with the colonies. These he introduced by a speech fraught with masterly eloquence, in which he displayed a thorough knowledge of the principles of action, among mankind in a state of civil society, and of the proper political conduct resulting from such principles. He laid it down as an axiom, that we must govern America according to the true nature and peculiar circumstances of the people, and not according to our own imagination; nor according to abstract ideas of right, or mere general theories of government. He stated the rapid progress which America had made in population, and in the commerce carried on with Great Britain. He asserted, that the colonies in general owed little or nothing to any care of ours, and that they were not squeezed into their happy form by the constraints of a watchful and suspicious government, but that, through a wise and salutary neglect, a generous nature had been suffered to take her own way to perfection. He assigned, as the causes from whence a fierce spirit of liberty had grown up in the colonies, their origin—their form of government—the force of religious principles in the northern colonies—of manners in the southern—of education—and of the remoteness of situation from the first mover of government. Under the head of education he observed, that perhaps in no other country in the world the law is made so general a study as in North America; insomuch as that it was said, nearly as many copies of Blackstone's Commentaries had been printed and sold in America, as in England. This knowledge of law, some might say, ought to teach them more clearly the rights of legislature, their obligations to obedience, and the penalties of rebellion; but when great honours and great emoluments do not win over this knowledge to the service of the state, it is a formidable adversary to government. His reasoning, solid and irrefragable in itself, received all the embellishment which a fine imagination could bestow. In large bodies, said he, the circulation of power must be less vigorous at the extremities. Nature has said it. The Turk cannot govern Egypt, and Arabia, and Curdistan, as he governs Thrace. Perhaps ideas of liberty might be desired, more reconcileable with an arbitrary and boundless authority. Perhaps we might wish the colonies to be persuaded, that their liberty is more secure, when held in trust for them by us, (as their guardians during a perpetual minority,) than with any part of it in their own hands; but the question is not whether their spirit deserves praise or blame.

This able legislator then proceeded to deliver it as his opinion, that there were but three ways of proceeding relative to this stubborn spirit which prevailed in the colonies; namely, to change that spirit as inconvenient, by removing the causes; to prosecute it as criminal; or to comply with it as necessary. One means of changing the spirit was, by taking measures to stop that spreading population which was so alarming to this country, by the crown making no further grants of land. But this, he said, would by no means answer the purpose, there being already so much unsettled land in private hands, as would afford scope for an immense future population; and the numerous bodies which could obtain no settled habitation, would become hordes of English Tartars, which would be in time formidable to the fixed residents. He called this project "hedging in population," and pronounced it to be neither prudent nor practicable.

A more direct way of breaking their spirit would be to impoverish them, by arresting the noble course of their marine enterprises. This, he said, was more than the old, and, as he thought, the exploded problem of tyranny, which proposes to beggar its subjects into submission. But nature still proceeds in her ordinary course, and discontent will increase with misery; and there are critical moments in the fortune of all states, when they who are too weak to contribute to our prosperity, may be strong enough to complete our ruin. The temper and character which prevailed in the colonies, he thought unalterable by any human art; neither the natural nor moral causes could be changed.

As to the second mode of proceeding, to prosecute this spirit in its overt acts as criminal; he knew, he said, of no method of drawing up an indictment against the whole people; and in a quarrel among the component parts of a great political union of communities, nothing could be more completely imprudent than for the head of the empire to insist, that if any privilege is pleaded, against his will or his acts, that his whole authority is desired instantly to proclaim rebellion, to beat to arms, and to put the offending provinces under the ban. Such conduct may teach the provinces, that the government, against which a claim of liberty is tantamount to high treason, is a government in which submission is equivalent to slavery. If then the removal of the causes of this spirit of American liberty be for the greatest part, or rather entirely, impracticable; if the ideas of criminal process be inapplicable, or, if applicable, are in the highest degree inexpedient, what way yet remains? No way is open but the third and last, to comply with the American spirit, as necessary; or, if you please, to submit to it as a necessary evil. It is not what a lawyer tells me I may do, but what humanity, reason, and justice tells me I ought to do. Of what avail are titles and arms, when the reason of the thing tells me, that the assertion of my title is the loss of my suit; and that I could do nothing but wound myself with the use of my own weapons? The general character and situation of a people must determine what sort of government is fitted for them.

He urged, with great force of reasoning, the conduct of the legislature in early times, towards the kingdom of Ireland, the principality of Wales, and the county palatine of Chester; and contended, that the same principles which actuated our ancestors, in their conduct towards those countries, should govern us in our treatment of America. "It was not," said he, "English arms, but English constitution that conquered Ireland; it was the vital substance of free government in that kingdom." Wales, before it partook of those common rights, rode this kingdom like an incubus. That principality was an unprofitable and oppressive burden. Our ancestors at length found, that laws made against a whole nation were not the most effectual methods for securing its obedience; Wales, therefore, in the reign of Henry VIII., became possessed of all the rights and privileges of English subjects. About the same time, the county palatine of Chester obtained the same relief, in consequence of a petition presented to the king, which set forth, "that for want of being represented in parliament, the inhabitants of that country had been oftentimes touched and grieved with the acts and statutes made within the court of parliament, as well derogatory unto the most antient jurisdictions, liberties, and privileges of their county palatine, as prejudicial to the commonwealth, quietness, rest, and peace of your grace's most bounded subjects, inhabiting within the same." Parliament, he observed, so far from being offended at the free style of this petition, made the expressions used therein the very preamble to that act of redress, and consecrated its principle to all ages in the sanctuary of legislation. Thus was Chester, which had been little less distempered than Wales, cured by the same remedy; which demonstrates that freedom, and not servitude, is the cure of anarchy, as religion, and not atheism, is the true remedy for superstition.

The grand stimulus for coercive measures with America was, the full assurance which was entertained by many, that the colonies would go farther. That with their increasing strength they would increase their discontents, until they disclaimed all subordination. Now although the idea of a perpetual minority might have been treated as a chimera, engendered by pride upon selfishness, yet our orator knew too well the disposition of his audience to combat that sentiment; he therefore passed over superficially a point, which it was dangerous to discuss fully.

The system of colony government, which this able statesman had formed, was in every essential point analagous to that which had been framed by lord Chatham. Each renounced the idea of America being represented in the British parliament. Mr. Burke's plan went to repealing only one of the eight acts of parliament proposed by the noble earl in the other house; but, with him, it urged the necessity of repealing all the acts respecting America, which had passed in the last session of parliament, the Quebec act excepted; to regulate the courts of admiralty; and that the judges should be paid by the assemblies, and hold their posts during good behaviour. The basis on which the whole fabric rested, was the mode by which a revenue should be raised. Mr. Burke proposed, that all grants or aids to Great Britain, made by America, should be by resolutions in their general assemblies; the readiness of those assemblies to grant an equitable supply for the exigencies of the state, he inferred from the free grants which they had, at sundry times, made of large subsidies, according to their abilities. All these resolutions were rejected by a great majority.

Mr. Burke appealed to the public, by printing his speech; the public read, admired, and forgot it. In short, posterity alone is qualified to decide upon the merits of a politician, who attempts to reason down the pride of empire, and to persuade a warlike people to yield, when they imagine themselves able to dictate. No orator ever succeeded in a cause, wherein it was impossible for him to engage some active passion of the human soul in his interest.

Whilst the important dispute with America caused warm debates in both houses of parliament, and greatly divided the nation, a variety of publications issued from the press, in some of which the conduct of government was defended with great zeal, and in others as warmly attacked, sometimes by ridicule, and not unfrequently with abuse. Indeed the liberty of the press prevailed in its full extent. The ministry, instead of punishing abusive writers, retained in their pay such as were very eminent for that qualification; it having been thought more serviceable to the cause of government to bear down scurrility by scurrility, than to prosecute delinquents in the courts of law. To restrain the licentiousness of the press, used to be deemed necessary by ministers, but now a different kind of conduct was adopted; the abuse of the press was even countenanced, and became auxiliary to government. The natural attachment which mankind feels to order and decorum, cause men of sense and influence to be disgusted at the abuse and illiberality which is poured out; and the forbearance of government is construed into moderation, when perhaps their own emissaries are the delinquents.

The most able and respectable advocate for government was Dr. Johnson, a writer who had spent a long course of years in literary pursuits, no less laborious to himself than beneficial to mankind, and who was at length, by the well-directed bounty of his sovereign, rescued from those uneasy sensations, which must prey upon a man of genius, who is compelled to make writing a profession. This gentleman had ever avowed his political sentiments, which led him to be strongly attached to the house of Stuart, and to treat with asperity the conduct of the legislature towards that family; but he had at length, like many others who held the same principles, transferred his loyalty to the Brunswick line; it was, therefore, in the integrity of his heart that he undertook a defence of American taxation from the imputation of tyranny. In this piece he defended the doctrine of colonial subordination upon the principles of the law of nations; maintained that the colonists, by their situation, became possessed of such advantages as were more than equivalent to their right of voting for representatives in parliament; ridiculed the distinction made between internal taxation and commercial regulations, and argued, that as the parliament may enact for America a law of capital punishment, it may therefore establish a mode and proportion of taxation.

This work was published about the time that Mr. Burke delivered his celebrated speech in the house of commons. It is to the honour of human nature to have it remarked, that these two contemporaries, distinguished in the highest degree for the universality of their knowledge and learning, as well as for the elevation of their genius, notwithstanding they were strenuous supporters of very opposite political sentiments, lived in habits of the strictest friendship, and enjoyed "the feast of reason, and the flow of soul," amidst the turbulence of political contention. A glorious triumph over those weaknesses, of which the human mind is too susceptible, even when under the government of a sound understanding!

When parliament met in the beginning of the following year, the clamours of the nation, and the censures of foreign courts, were endeavoured to be answered and evaded by assurances of a conciliatory disposition, and by violent declarations against the treachery and perverseness of the Americans. The military preparations, on both sides, were active and extensive; but the first successes were on the part of the insurgents. The king's troops at Boston endured the utmost distress throughout the winter; while the provincials, who lay before that town, were well covered, and plentifully supplied with provisions. Early in the next year, they opened a battery near the water side, at a place called Phipps, and another on the other side of the town, which they began to bombard. General Home, surrounded with difficulties, soon discovered that the town was no longer to be retained. The confusion attending the embarkation of the troops and the inhabitants was not to be described; it was not merely the retreat of an army, but the emigration of a populous city; and, to add to the mortification of the fugitives, as the rear-guard were embarking, general Washington, with drums beating and colours flying, marched into the town.

In this state of the American dispute, we would wish to be indulged in making two remarks. The parliamentary regulations which had been made for the government of Massachusett's bay, in the beginning of the year 1774, not having been carried into effect, from the violent opposition shewn to that plan of government; and the civil institutions which their charter had established, being thereby abrogated, all the functions of legal authority were immediately suspended. No governor presided, no council assembled, no judges interpreted the law, no inferior officers exacted an observance of it. In such a state of anarchy, it was to be expected that the persons and property of individuals would be exposed to the depredations of lawless miscreants, who are to be found in greater or less numbers in every state, who by their crimes disgrace humanity, disturb the peace of society, and draw down the severity of the laws. But though the suspension of magistracy gave the needy and unprincipled a licence to do what was right in their own eyes, every one remained safe and unmolested. This colony had ever been characterized for an intolerant spirit in religion, and now stood accused of rebellion against the parent state, but its manners seem to have remained uncorrupted, insomuch that, in the course of eighteen years, it is said that only one criminal has been executed in the province. However we may abhor traitors, we cannot but admire such unexampled internal decorum!

Although defection had now spread over the American continent, yet two descriptions of men might have been expected to withstand the general contagion, at least utterly to renounce the idea of taking up arms against Great Britain, namely, the quakers, from principles of religion, and such military men who were natives of the British isles, but who had settled in America at the conclusion of the last war in considerable numbers; but the contrary proved to be the fact. Many of the younger quakers in Philadelphia formed themselves into volunteer companies, and the British officers, forgetting that doctrine of submission and subordination which they had imbibed with their tactics, took an active part with the Americans, and rendered the most essential service to their cause, by forming their husbandmen into soldiers.

Congress now sought to procure arms and ammunition for the insurgents, and as a royal proclamation had been issued, prohibiting the exportation of such articles from Britain, the public magazines were forcibly seized upon in many places. Mills were constructed, and manufactures established in Pennsylvania and Virginia, for making gunpowder, and American vessels visited the several European ports, from Cadiz even to Hamburgh. This activity was unremitted, whilst the antipathy which subsisted between the king's troops at Boston and the provincials was daily increasing, and foreboded speedy hostilities. Occasions for skirmishes were frequent; but the Americans pretend, that they cautiously avoided committing the first act of open hostility. They considered themselves as justified in taking up arms, for the purpose of self-defence, but disclaimed all design of attacking the king's troops. Whilst they observed this distinction, they contended, that according to the English constitution, they were not in a state of rebellion, or levying war against the king. Which side was the first aggressor in the affair at Lexington, (where a detachment of regulars, attempting to seize some cannon and ammunition, a sharp engagement ensued,) every man will decide upon according to his political attachments, for both parties disclaim it

However, this action in its consequences tended to beat up all America to arms. Congress being soon after re-assembled, (notwithstanding the American secretary had written circular letters to each colony, forbidding it in the king's name, and under pain of his displeasure, to elect deputies for the next general congress,) now began to assume the executive powers of government, and appointed Mr. George Washington, (a native of Virginia, and possessed of landed property there to the amount of £5000 per annum,) commander-in-chief of their forces. This gentleman had been trained to arms from his youth; but few opportunities had occurred in which he could gain military renown. His first exploit in arms, about the year 1754, proved unfortunate, but not disgraceful. The Americans esteemed the man, because they believed him to be as much distinguished by his personal virtues and talents, as by his fortune.

Twenty thousand provincials in arms now nemmed in the king's troops at Boston, and although large reinforcements from England and Ireland arrived about this time, with which came the generals Howe, Burgoyne, and Clinton, yet it was found impossible to extricate the army from this disgraceful blockade. The daring attempt of a party of Americans, headed by a Dr. Warren, to fortify an eminence which commanded the town, brought on the fierce and fatal action of Bunker's hill, where victory was dearly bought, with the lives of many veteran officers.* General Howe, who led the attack, was almost the only officer who remained unhurt, although in the hottest of the action, and with numbers continually falling beside him. The British trained to discipline and inured to service, twice retreated before a body of peasants, who then, for the first time, faced an enemy. The undaunted courage of the general, which was well seconded by his officers, retrieved the fortune of the day. Warren, the American leader, was killed in the action. Charlestown, which stood on the northern peninsula, at the entrance of Boston bay, and consisted of about 400 houses, was unfortunately reduced to ashes. The manner in which this post was attacked has been much censured: had the troops been landed on the isthmus, near the town of Cambridge, the American works, it has been said, might have been more easily forced, and their retreat effectually cut off; but Putnam lay with a considerable force at a small distance, which probably determined the general against this mode of attack. On the other hand, the American general is equally censured for not marching his men to support the party on Bunker's hill.

The important forts of Ticonderago and Crown Point, the former of which, when possessed by the French, had withstood the attack of a large army, were now surprised and taken by a body of American volunteers, formed in the back settlements, and commanded by a colonel Easton, and a colonel Ethan Allen; but it does not appear that either of these partisans acted under commissions from congress.

CHAPTER XXV.

GEORGE III.

[1775, 1776, 1777.]

The Americans declare themselves independent—New York taken by General Howe—Congress remove from Philadelphia to Baltimore—The House of Commons grant an Addition to his Majesty's Income—Lord Cornwallis takes Philadelphia—General Burgoyne and his Army surrender to General Gates.

SOON after the evacuation of Boston, general Howe arrived with the English forces at Halifax; and general Washington, apprehending that the British might make an attack upon New York, detached some troops to its assistance. Arnold, at the head of the provincials, continued at this time the blockade of Quebec; and, aware that the time when the succours from England were expected now approached, he redoubled his efforts to possess himself of that city, before any assistance should arrive; but the activity of general Carleton baffled all the American exertions. The timely arrival of the Isis man of war, and two frigates, enabled the British governor to march out and face the besiegers, who fled on all sides, leaving their artillery and stores behind them.

In the beginning of June, sir Peter Parker's fleet anchored in Charlestown bar. The land forces were commanded by generals Clinton, Cornwallis, and Vaughan. On the 20th of June, the English made a vigorous, but unsuccessful, attack upon a fort in Sullivan's island, in which the English shipping received great damage.

The American colonists, finding all prospects of a reconciliation with the mother country cut off, and perceiving their own internal strength and importance to increase, determined at once to throw off the yoke of dependence. On the 4th of July, the congress of the thirteen English colonies declared themselves independent.

The declaration published by that respectable body, on this occasion, is a master-piece of composition, and contains so many great and useful principles of politics, as well as a full statement of the complaints of the Americans, that it would be inexcusable to withhold it from the reader. It is as follows:—

"When, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands, which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth that station, to which nature and nature's God entitles them, separately and equally; a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires, that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by the Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its power in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to insure their safety and happiness. Prudence, indeed, will dictate, that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly all experience hath shewn, that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to abolish the forms to which they have been accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty to throw off such government, and to provide new guards for their future security. Such has been the patient sufferance of these colonies, and such is now the necessity which constrains them to alter their former systems of government. The history of the present king of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these states. To prove this, let facts be submitted to a candid world.

"He has refused his assent to laws the most wholesome and necessary for the public good.

"He has forbidden his governors to pass laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in operation till his assent should be obtained; and, when so suspended, he has utterly neglected to attend to them.

"He has refused to pass other laws, for the accommodation of large districts of people, unless those people would relinquish the right of representation in the legislature, a right inestimable to them, and formidable to tyrants only.

"He has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the repository of their public records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into his measures.

"He has dissolved representative houses repeatedly, for opposing with manly firmness his invasions on the rights of the people.

"He has refused, for a long time after such dissolutions, to cause others to be elected; whereby the legistative bodies, incapable of annihilation, have returned to the people at large for their exercise; the state remaining in the mean time exposed to all the danger of invasion from without, and convulsions within.

"He has endeavoured to obstruct the population of these states, obstructing for that purpose the laws for naturalization of foreigners; refusing to pass others, to encourage their migration hither, and raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands.

"He has obstructed the administration of justice, by refusing his assent to the establishment of justiciary powers.

"He has made judges dependent solely on his will for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries.

"He has erected a multitude of new offices, and sent hither swarms of officers, to harass the people, and eat out their substance.

"He has kept among us, in time of peace, standing armies, without the consent of the legislatures.

"He has affected to render the military independent of, and superior to, the civil power.

"He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution, and unacknowledged by our laws; giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation:

"For quartering large bodies of armed troops among us:

"For protecting them, by a mock trial, from punishment for any murders, which they should commit on the inhabitants of these states:

"For cutting off our trade from all parts of the world:

"For imposing taxes on us without our consent:

"For depriving us, in many cases, of the benefits of trial by jury:

"For transporting us beyond the seas, to be tried for pretended offences:

"For abolishing the free system of English laws in a neighbouring province, establishing therein an arbitrary government, and enlarging its boundaries; so as to render it at once an example, and a fit instrument, for introducing the same absolute rule into these colonies:

"For taking away our charters, abolishing our most valuable laws, and altering fundamentally the form of our governments:

"For suspending our own legislatures, and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever.

"He has abdicated government, hereby declaring us out of his protection, and waging war against us.

"He has plundered our seas, ravaged our coasts, burnt our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people.

"He is at this time transporting large armies of mercenaries, to complete the works of death, desolation, and tyranny, already begun with circumstances of cruelty and perfidy, scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous ages, and totally unworthy the head of a civilized nation.

"He has constrained our fellow-citizens, taken captive on the high seas, to bear arms against their country, to become the executioners of their friends and brethren, or to fall themselves by their hands.

"He has excited domestic insurrections among us, and has endeavoured to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers the merciless Indian savages, whose known rule of warfare is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes, and conditions.

"In every stage of these oppressions, we have petitioned for redress in the most humble terms; our repeated petitions have been answered only by repeated injury. A prince, whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a free people.

"Nor have we been wanting in attention to our British brethren. We have warned them, from time to time, of attempts made by their legislature to extend an unwarrantable jurisdiction over us. We have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration and settlement here. We have appealed to their native justice and magnanimity, and we have conjured them by the ties of our common kindred, to disavow these usurpations, which would inevitably interrupt our connections and correspondence. They too have been deaf to the voice of justice and of consanguinity. We must therefore acquiesce in the necessity which denounces our separation, and hold them, as we hold the rest of mankind, enemies in war, in peace friends.

"We, therefore, the representatives of the United States of America, in general congress assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name and by the authority of the good people of these colonies, solemnly publish and declare, that these United States are, and of right ought to be, Free and Independent States; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown; and that all political connection between them and the state of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved; and that, as free and independent states, they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent states may of right do. And for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honour.

THE colonies, in October following, entered into articles of mutual confederation and perpetual union. From this moment we may consider the thirteen states as entirely separated from Great Britain, and have only to record the vain attempts of the latter, to subjugate them by force of arms.

1776. MANY circumstances pointed out the reduction of the city and province of New York, as important and practicable. Admiral lord Howe, and his brother, the general, followed by an army consisting of 13,000 Hessians and Walbeckers, undertook the expedition. These forces arrived at Sandy-hook, near New York, from Halifax, about the beginning of July. The general landed his troops on Staten island, and was received with great joy by a number of loyalists; and, both in his passage thither, and after his arrival, was joined by such considerable bodies, that the greatest expectations of success began to be formed. Lord Howe joined his brother soon after, and, by a flag, sent circular letters to the governors of the colonies, informing them of the powers which Britain had vested in his brother and himself; similar notice was sent to general Washington, who returned for answer, (in a conference between him and adjutant-general Paterson, who carried the letter,) that as their powers were little more than powers to grant pardons, they who had committed no fault sought no pardon, and that they were only defending their most indisputable rights.

THE British commanders resolved to make their first attempt upon Long Island. This they preferred to New York, as it abounded with those supplies which their forces required.

THE British landed, with no opposition, between two small towns, Utrecht and Gravesend. The American works protected a small peninsula, having Wallabout bay to the left, and stretching over to Red Hook on the right, the East river being in the rear. General Sullivan, with a strong force, was encamped within these works at Brooklyne. From the east side of the narrows runs a ridge of hills, covered with thick wood, about five or six miles in length, which terminates near Jamaica. There were three passes through these hills; one near the narrows, a second on the Flatbush road, and a third on the Bedford road, and they are all defensible. These were the only roads that could be passed from the south side of the hills to the American lines, except a road which led round the easterly end to Jamaica. The Americans had 800 men on each of those roads, besides colonel Miles, who was stationed with a battalion of riflemen; thus the road was protected, from the south of the hills to Jamaica, and the movement of the British observed.

GENERAL de Heister, with a body of Hessians, took post at Flatbush in the evening. (August 26th.) In the following night, the greater part of the British army, commanded by general Clinton, marched to gain the road leading round the easterly end of the hills to Jamaica, and to turn the left of the Americans. He arrived, two hours before day, within half a mile of this road. One of his party fell in with a patrole of American officers, and took them all prisoners, which prevented the early transmission of intelligence. Upon the first appearance of day, general Clinton advanced, and took possession of the heights over which the road passed. General Gaunt, with the left wing, advanced along the coast by the west road, near the narrows; but this was intended chiefly as a feint.

THE guard, which was stationed at this road, fled without making any resistance. A few of them were afterwards rallied, and the American general, lord Stirling, advanced with 1500 men, and took possession of a hill about two miles from the American camp, and in front of general Grant.

AN attack was made very early in the morning, by the Hessians from Flatbush, under general de Heister, and by general Grant, on the coast, and was well supported for a considerable time by both sides. The Americans who opposed general de Heister were first apprised of the approach of general Clinton, who had come round on their left. They immediately began to retreat to their camp, but were intercepted by the right wing, under general Clinton, who got into the rear of their left, and attacked them with his light infantry and dragoons while returning to their lines. They were driven back till they were met by the Hessians. They were thus alternately chased and intercepted, between general de Heister and general Clinton. Some of their regiments nevertheless found their way to the camp. The Americans under lord Stirling consisted of colonel Miles' two battalions, colonel Atlee's, colonel Smallwood's, and colonel Hatche's regiments, who were engaged with general Grant. These fought with great resolution for about six hours. They were uninformed of the movements made by general Clinton, till some of the troops under his command had traversed the country in their rear. Their retreat was thus intercepted; but several, notwithstanding, broke through and got into the woods, many threw themselves into the marsh, some were drowned, and others perished in the mud, but a considerable number escaped by this way to their lines.

The king's troops displayed great valour throughout the whole day. The variety of the ground occasioned a succession of small engagements, pursuits, and slaughter, which lasted for many hours. British discipline, in every instance, triumphed over the native valour of raw troops, who had never been in action, and who were unacquainted with the stratagems of war.

The loss of the British and Hessians was about 450. The killed, wounded, and prisoners of the Americans, including those who were drowned, or perished in the woods or mud, considerably exceeded 1000. Among the prisoners of the latter were two of their general officers, Sullivan and lord Stirling, three colonels, four lieutenant-colonels, three majors, eighteen captains, forty-three lieutenants, and eleven ensigns. Smallwood's regiment, the officers of which were young men of the first families in Maryland, sustained a loss of 259 men. The British, after their victory, were so impetuous, that it was with difficulty they could be restrained from attacking the American lines.

In the time of the engagement, and subsequent to it, general Washington drew over to Long Island the greatest part of his army. After he had collected his principal force there, it was his wish and hope, that sir William Howe would attempt to storm the works on the island. These, though insufficient to stand a regular siege, were strong enough to resist a coup de main. The remembrance of Bunker's Hill, and a desire to spare his men, restrained the British general from making an assault. On the contrary, he made demonstrations of proceeding by siege, and broke ground within 300 yards to the left, at Putnam's redoubt. Though general Washington wished for an assault, yet being certain that his works would be untenable when the British batteries should be fully opened, he called a council of war, to consult on the measures proper to be taken. It was then determined, that the objects in view were by no means proportioned to the dangers to which, by a continuation on the island, they would be exposed. Conformably to this opinion, dispositions were made for a retreat. This commenced, soon after it was dark, from two points, the upper and lower ferries on East river. General M'Dougal regulated the embarkation at one, and colonel Knox at the other. The intention of evacuating the island had been so prudently concealed from the Americans, that they knew not whither they were going, but supposed, to attack the enemy. The field artillery, tents, baggage, and about 9000 men, were conveyed to the city of New York over East river, more than a mile wide, in less than thirteen hours, and without the knowledge of the British, though not 600 yards distant. Providence in a remarkable manner favoured the retreating army. For some time after the Americans began to cross, the state of the tide, and a strong north-east wind, made it impossible for them to make use of their sail-boats, and their number of row-boats was insufficient for completing the business in the course of the night. But about eleven o'clock the wind died away, and soon after sprung up at south-east, and blew fresh; which rendered the sail-boats serviceable, and at the same time made the passage from the city direct, easy, and expeditious. Towards morning an extreme thick fog came on, which hovered over Long Island, and, by concealing the Americans, enabled them to complete their retreat without interruption, though the day had begun to dawn some time before it was finished. By a mistake in the transmission of orders, the American lines were evacuated three quarters of an hour before the embarkation took place; but the British, though so near that their working parties could be distinctly heard, being enveloped in the fog, knew nothing of the matter. The lines were repossessed and held till six o'clock in the morning, when every thing except some heavy cannon was removed. General Mifflin, who commanded the rear guard, left the lines, and, by means of the fog, got off safe. In about half an hour the fog cleared away, and the British entered the works which had been just relinquished.

THE king's troops pursued their main object, the attack upon the city of New York, in the beginning of September, and took possession of it under the fire of five ships of war at Phipp's bay. These successes of his enemies threw general Washington into many and great difficulties. His troops were not veterans; they were dispirited and diseased.

AFTER the Americans had evacuated New York, they retired to the north end of the island on which the city is erected. In about four weeks, general Howe began to execute a plan for cutting off general Washington's communication with the eastern states, and enclosing him, so as to compel a general engagement on the island. With this view, the greater part of the royal army passed through Hellgate, entered the Sound, and landed on Frog's Neck, in West Chester county. Two days after they made this movement, general Lee arrived from his late successful command to the southward. He found that there was a prevailing disposition among the officers in the American army, for remaining on New York Island. A council of war was called, in which general Lee gave such convincing reasons for quitting it, that they resolved to withdraw the bulk of the army. He also pressed the expediency of evacuating fort Washington; but in this he was opposed by general Greene, who argued, that the possession of that post would divert a large body of the enemy from joining their main force, and, along with fort Lee, would be of great use, in covering the transportation of provision and stores up the North river, for the service of the American troops. He added farther, that the garrison could be brought off at any time by boats, on the Jersey side of the river. His opinion prevailed; though the system of evacuating and retreating was in general adopted, an exception was made in favour of fort Washington, and near 3000 men were assigned for its defence.

THE royal army, after a halt of six days at Frog's Neck, advanced near to New Rochelle. On their march they sustained a considerable loss by a party of Americans, whom general Lee posted behind a wall. After three days, general Howe moved the right and centre of his army two miles to the northward of New Rochelle, on the road to the White Plains, and there he received a large reinforcement.

ON the 12th of November, the Americans having retired, sir William Howe determined to improve the opportunity of their absence for the reduction of fort Washington. This, the only post the Americans then held on New York Island, was under the command of colonel Magaw. The royal army made four attacks upon it. The first, on the north side, was led on by general Kniphausen; the second, on the east, by general Matthews, supported by lord Cornwallis; the third was under the command of lieutenant-colonel Sterling; and the fourth under the command of lord Piercy. The troops under Kniphausen, when advancing to the fort, had to pass through a thick wood, which was occupied by colonel Rawling's regiment of riflemen, and from their well-directed fire suffered very much. During this attack, a body of British light infantry advanced against a party of Americans, who were annoying from rocks and trees, and obliged them to disperse. Lord Piercy carried an advance work on his side; and lieutenant-colonel Stirling forced his way up a steep height, and took 170 prisoners. Their outworks being carried, the Americans left their lines, and crowded into the fort. Colonel Rhal, who led the right column of Kniphausen, pushed forward, and lodged it within a hundred yards of the fort, and was there soon joined by the left column; the garrison surrendered by capitulation, by which the men were to be considered prisoners of war, and the officers to keep their baggage and side arms. The number of prisoners amounted to 2700. The loss of the British, including killed and wounded, was about 1200. Shortly after fort Washington had surrendered, lord Cornwallis passed over to attack fort Lee on the opposite Jersey shore.

THE garrison was saved by an immediate evacuation, but at the expence of their artillery and stores. General Washington about this time retreated to Newark. Having abundant reason, from the posture of affairs, to count on the necessity of a farther retreat, he asked colonel Reed,—Should we retreat to the back parts of Pennsylvania, would the Pennsylvanians support us? The colonel replied, If the lower countries will be subdued, and give up, the back countries will do the same. The general replied, We must retire to Augusta county in Virginia, numbers will fly to our standard for their own safety, and we must strive to carry on a predatory war, and, if subdued, we can cross the Allegany mountains.

When it was expected that the conquerors would retire to winter-quarters, they commenced a new plan of operations, more alarming than all their previous conquests. The reduction of fort Washington, the evacuation of fort Lee, and the diminution of the American army, by the departure of those, whose time of service had expired, encouraged the British, notwithstanding the severity of the winter, and the badness of the roads, to pursue the remaining inconsiderable continental force, with the prospect of annihilating it. By this turn of affairs, the interior country was surprised into confusion, finding an enemy within its bowels, without an army able to oppose it. To retreat was the only expedient left. This having commenced, lord Cornwallis followed, and was close in the rear of general Washington as he retreated successively to Newark, to Brunswick, to Princeton, to Trenton, and to the Pennsylvania side of the Delaware. The pursuit was urged with so much rapidity, that the rear of the one army pulling down bridges, was often in sight and within shot of the other army building them up.

On the day general Washington retreated over the Delaware, the Americans abandoned Rhode Island; and so great was the confusion occasioned by their disappointments, that it was scarcely believed that they would make any other attempt to oppose an enemy so uniformly victorious. While lord Cornwallis was marching triumphant through the Jerseys, and the British army were possessing themselves of every town and post along the Delaware, congress assembled, and formed addresses, and other expedients, for raising battalions upon principles better calculated for success than the former, and applied themselves to remove the languor occasioned by their late defeats. The congress met in Maryland, at Baltimore. Dissentions arose among them relative to the declaration of independence, and some of the members repaired to the commissioners for protection. About this time another disaster was added, by the loss of the famous partisan, general Lee, who was surprised and taken prisoner by colonel Harcourt. It was now that the Americans, struggling for their liberty, and the British monarch, struggling for their subjugation, suspended in equilibrium in the balance of fortune: the finger of providence touched the beam, and gravitated the scale of emancipation.

The Americans, having passed the Delaware, had the boats removed from the side of their pursuers, and thus arrested their progress; the commanders, however, of the British army, in all the security of conquest, cantoned them at Burlington, Bordenton, Trenton, and other towns of New Jersey, in the daily expectation of being able to pass into Pennsylvania by means of the ice, which is commonly formed about this time.

It appeared to them of all events the most unlikely, that their flying enemies, half naked, should, in the intensity of the cold season, turn and re-commence offensive operations. They indulged themselves in a careless inattention, which, in the neighbourhood of an enemy, however contemptible, cannot be justified. It is said, that when colonel Rhal, the officer commanding in Trenton, under some apprehension for that frontier post, applied to general Grant for a reinforcement, the general returned for answer,—Tell the colonel, that he is very safe; I will undertake to keep the peace in New Jersey with a corporal's guard.

But in the evening of Christmas day, general Washington made arrangements for crossing the Delaware in three divisions; at M. Konkey's ferry, at Trenton ferry, and at or near Bordenton. The troops which were to have crossed at the two last places were commanded by the generals Ewing and Cadwallader; they made every exertion to get over, but the quantity of ice was so great, that they could not effect their purpose. The main body, which was commanded by general Washington, crossed at M. Konkey's ferry, but the ice in the river retarded their progress so long, that it was three o'clock in the morning before the artillery could be got over. On their landing in Jersey they were formed into two divisions, commanded by the generals Sullivan and Greene, who had under their command brigadiers lord Stirling, Mercer, and St. Clair; one of these divisions was ordered to proceed on the lower or river road, the other on the upper or Pennington road. Colonel Stork, with some light troops, was also directed to advance near to the river, and to possess himself of that part of the town which is beyond the bridge. The divisions, having nearly the same distance to march, were ordered, immediately on forcing the out-guards, to push directly into Trenton, that they might charge the enemy before he would have time to form. Though they advanced by different roads, yet they arrived at the enemy's advanced post within three minutes of each other. The out-guards of the Hessian troops soon fell back, but kept up a constant retreating fire. Their main body, being hard pressed by the Americans, who had already got possession of half their artillery, attempted to file off by a road leading towards Princeton, but were checked by a body of troops thrown in their way. Finding themselves surrounded, they laid down their arms. The number which submitted was 23 officers and 886 men. Between 30 and 40 of the Hessians were killed and wounded. Colonel Rhal was among the former, and seven of his officers among the latter. Captain Washington, of the Virginia troops, and five or six Americans were wounded, two were killed, and two or three were frozen to death. The detachment in Trenton consisted of the regiments of Rhal, Losberg, and Kniphausen, amounting in the whole to about 1500 men, and a troop of British light horse. All these were killed or captured except about 600, who escaped by the road leading to Bordenton.

The British had a strong battalion of light infantry at Princeton, and a force yet remaining near the Delaware, superior to the American army. General Washington therefore thought it most prudent, on the evening of the same day, to recross into Pennsylvania with his prisoners.

The effects of this fortunate enterprise were presently discovered, in recruiting the American army. About 1400 regular soldiers, whose time of service was on the point of expiring, agreed to serve six weeks longer, on a promised gratuity of ten paper dollars to each. Men of influence were dispatched to different parts of the country, to rouse the militia. The rapine and impolitic conduct of the British operated more forcibly in expelling them the state, than either patriotism or determination to prevent their overrunning it.

Several skirmishes took place in January, which ended in favour of the provincials; soon after this they obtained possession of nearly the two Jerseys, saved Pennsylvania, and by a victory which general Washington gained over the British at Princeton, on the 3rd, in a great measure turned the balance of strength, and determined the advantages in their own favour. Dr. Ramsay, in mentioning the effect of these victories over the minds of the Americans, employs this strong language, "It was like a resurrection from the dead." 1777.

In England, an unusual inattention to the progress of the war prevailed generally. When the parliament assembled, on the last day of October, his majesty observed, that nothing could have yielded him more sincere satisfaction, than being able to announce to them a termination of the disturbances in North America; but so daring and desperate was the spirit of rebellion, that the colonies openly threw off all allegiance to the crown, and all political connection with this country, insolently rejecting all the means of reconciliation, offered them by the delegated commissioners. His majesty recounted the different successes on the side of New York, and the effectual attempts to recover Canada; and concluding with stating the continued assurances of amity he had received from the several courts of Europe.

The expences of the navy amounted to £3,205,505, exclusive of £1000, voted to Greenwich Hospital, and a million afterwards granted for the purpose of defraying the debt of the navy. The supplies for the land service were near to £3,000,000, although the extraordinaries for this service, in the preceding year, were not provided for.

In January, lord North moved for leave to bring in a bill, empowering his majesty to secure and detain persons suspected of high treason, committed in America; after warm opposition, the bill passed both houses by a considerable majority. Soon afterwards his majesty laid before the house a message, expressive of the concern he felt under the debts incurred by the expences of the household and of the civil government, which amounted, on the 5th of January, to £600,000. He relied on the loyalty and affection of his faithful commons, to enable him to discharge this debt, and to make some provision for the better support of his household in future, and of the honour and dignity of his crown. The house granted the sum of £618,340, for the discharge of the debt incurred; and, as a further provision, the annual sum of £100,000, besides the £800,000. When this bill was presented to his majesty, sir Fletcher Norton observed, in his speech to the throne, "Your faithful commons have not only granted to your majesty a large and present supply, but also a very great additional revenue; great beyond example; great beyond your majesty's highest expence. But all this, sir, they have done in a well-grounded confidence, that you will apply wisely what they have granted liberally; and feeling, what every good subject must feel, with the greatest satisfaction, that under the direction of your majesty's wisdom, the affluence and grandeur of the sovereign will reflect honour and dignity on his people." This noble and energetic speech was represented by the sychophants of the court, as an insult to the throne.

During the transaction of these affairs in the British parliament, the victory at Princeton revived the drooping spirits of the Americans; another army was soon collected, and all West Jersey was as rapidly recovered as it had been lost. It seems, however, strange, that all the fortresses in the country should be so hastily abandoned, when so large an army was at hand, to assist in their defence. The commander-in-chief has been charged with throwing aside the cares annexed to his important trust, and giving himself up to the blandishments of beauty, and the fascination of deep play.

Not so were the interests of the new states attended to. Dr. Franklin had passed over into France, for the purpose of forming an alliance with that kingdom, whose secret support and assistance had at all times been rendered. This man, (who formerly had carried on the business of a printer, for many years, at Philadelphia,) may be considered as the first fruits of American genius, and perhaps no man ever owed more to the time and place of his birth: had he been a native of London instead of Boston, and born into the same rank of society, the world would probably never have heard his name either as a philosopher or a politician. Pent within a populous city, his occupation would have been more laborious, and his incentives to cultivate speculative science suppressed by every consideration of interest or ambition. He might have distinguished himself as an ingenious artist, but he would neither have formed an hypothesis to account for the phenomenon of the Aurora Borealis, nor have traced out the principles and operations of the electrical fluid; and, what is much more important, he would never have become a powerful engine, to shake a great empire, and to erect a congeries of republics from its dismembered parts. Nor would he have attained the appropriated distinction of introducing a new æra into the history of mankind, which may prove as important as any which have elapsed. In procuring a legislative power to the western hemisphere, he may be considered as a greater enemy to England than even Philip II. or Lewis XIV.

His love of science marked his early years; and, as if no event of his life was destined to be unimportant, even an intrigue (which caused him to quit Boston and settle in Philadelphia) brought him into a wider sphere of action, and placed him in a more respectable situation. He had passed the meridian of his life before he became conspicuous as a politician. As his influence became extensive, it was exerted among the people to promote temperance, frugality, and industry; and all his labours were exerted to advance the essential interests of humanity. He possessed the plainness of manners and precision of thought which characterized John de Wit; but he ever escaped falling into popular odium, either by being master of superior address, or acting under a more favourable series of contingencies, than that devoted patriot.

Trammelled in no system, he might be said to be a philosopher without the rules, a politician without adopting the Roman pandect, and a statesman without having sacrificed to the graces; possessing a versatility of genius without a diversity of temper.

Such was the man, thoughtful, deliberate, collected, and circumspect, who, when more than seventy years of age, appeared at the court of France, first as an agent, and afterwards as a plenipotentiary, from the new American states. All ranks vied with each other in paying court to this hoary-headed sage. Among the subjects of an absolute monarch, it became fashionable to admire the spirit of freedom, and the new member of the corps diplomatique was complimented in a hyperbole of panegyrics. Public admiration is, however, no proof of merit; the frivolous frequently obtain it when it is denied to the wise. His negotiations with the court of France required uncommon abilities; and that he succeeded in the arduous work, proves that during his long life he had practically studied the philosophy of man.

Whilst the war was raging in the Jerseys, congress set on foot a loan of five millions of dollars at 4 per cent. on the faith of the United States; the Americans at the same time opened their ports to all foreign merchant-ships, and found their wants in some degree relieved by the supplies brought to this new market. It now became evident, how destructive a step it had been, to delude the nation by a reduction of the number of seamen. The American cruisers swarmed in the European seas, and our homeward-bound West India ships fell a prey to these vigilant enemies; by which the planters in the islands, and the merchants at home, were alike involved in ruin. The losses in merchandize and shipping taken by the Americans, in the course of the year 1776, was computed to exceed a million sterling. In the ports of Spain and France, the American privateers found safety and assistance, and their prizes were there openly sold, until our ambassadors at those courts remonstrated against such a conduct; after which these captures were disposed of in a more secret and guarded manner. In the French West India islands, the Americans were publicly countenanced, and even French ships received American commissions; and with few, and sometimes with no American seamen on board, made prey of the British commerce, insomuch that 1776. insurance on our homeward bound ships was advanced to 23 per cent.

In the midst of the commercial distresses, the manufactures of England felt no dangerous stagnation; for those nations which now supplied the American markets, not being able of themselves to furnish the goods required, were obliged to seek a supply from hence; and, in some degree to compensate for the loss of our merchant ships, the king's frigates captured a great number of American vessels, both privateers and traders, which they carried into the ports of our West India islands, and thus relieved the pressing wants of the inhabitants.

Our commerce being thus rendered insecure, the Thames presented the unusual and melancholy sight of great numbers of foreign ships, particularly French, taking in cargoes of English commodities for various parts of Europe, the property of our own merchants, who were thus reduced to seek that protection under the colours of other nations, which the British flag used to afford to every nation of the world.

The arsenals of France were filled with naval stores, and in every part of the kingdom as vigorous exertions were made to fit out a formidable navy, as if a war was actually waging, whilst the finances of that kingdom were entrusted to M. Necker, a native of Switzerland, and professing the protestant religion.

The attention of the nation had been chiefly directed, during the last two years, to the Western World; but some proceedings on the coast of Coromandel, diverted the public regard towards the East. The presidency of Madras had entered into a strict alliance with Mahomed Ali Cawn, nabob of Arcot, a Tartarian prince, who possessed an inland territory equally distant from the two European settlements of Madras and Pondicherry. From a close attention to his army, this Asiatic chief had become formidable, and his connection with the civil and military powers at the English settlement procured him the assistance of British officers, to discipline and command his troops. Whatever were his views in keeping on foot so large an army, he was obliged to exhaust his treasury to preserve the friendship of his allies; for European rapacity, when exercised on Asiatic princes, is insatiable. It became, therefore, necessary that new sources of wealth should be discovered, to supply his continual profusion; and he proposed to the presidency to undertake an expedition against the rajah, or king, of Tanjore, a Mahratta prince, who resided several leagues to the southward of Pondicherry, and the situation of whose country, towards the southward of the peninsula, had hitherto proved its best security against the Mahometan conquerors of Hindostan. The country had been long in alliance with the English, and the father of the rajah, Pertoupa Sing, had been attacked by the French general Lally during the preceding war, but the incursion was bravely repelled. Pertoupa was the first Indian prince with whom the English concluded a treaty, which Tuligee, the reigning king, ratified on his accession.

The pretext on which the nabob of Arcot waged war against this prince, was founded on an unsatisfied claim of a large sum of money, which the rajah pleaded his inability to pay. The government of Madras, however, supported the nabob in his quarrel, and placed the forces of the company under the command of the nabob's son, to make war on Tanjore. Such a force was irresistible; the rajah was completely despoiled, and his subjects plundered. Every thing which the East holds sacred was violated. The apartments of the women were forced, and their persons stripped of their most valuable ornaments. Effects to the amount of 10,000,000 of pagodas were carried off, and the revenues of the country, during the two years and a half that they were forcibly collected by the nabob, amounted to fifty lacks of pagodas more. The booty collected in this marauding expedition, served to palliate the enormity of the outrage, and to render the perpetrators insensible to the disgrace and dishonour which they had brought on the English name and character.

When the news of this transaction reached the court of directors, the strongest resentment was expressed, and measures were concerted for making all possible restitution to the injured rajah. For this purpose, lord Pigot was sent out as governor of Madras, a nobleman highly respected in the settlement, for his able and effectual defence of it, seventeen years before. He arrived at his government the latter end of the year 1775; but the opposition which he experienced from the majority of the council, and the commander-in-chief of the forces, was such as entirely frustrated all the purposes which he was appointed to effect. Not discouraged by these difficulties, but prompted by an impetuous and violent temper, he had recourse to an undue exertion of his authority, and put the commander-in-chief and two of the council under arrest. The nabob fomented the dissension, and by his intrigues the governor himself was soon after seized by the officer next in command, and kept in close confinement. Representations of these events were immediately transmitted to Europe, and the nabob, who had been the principal cause of the commotions, sent a gentleman to England as his agent, through whose interposition both the company and the ministry might be enabled to decide between the contending parties.

When the business was first discussed, a large majority of the proprietors voted for reinstating lord Pigot, and punishing those who had been so daring as to dispossess him. The court of directors were more divided in opinion. At length the weight of government was thrown in, and the governor and council of Madras were ordered home, in order that their conduct might undergo a legal scrutiny. From this determination of the East India company, governor Johnstone made an appeal to the house of commons, by moving five resolutions, which tended to justify the conduct of lord Pigot, to condemn that of his opponents, and to annul the resolution for his recal. Each of these resolutions was negatived. Lord Pigot did not long survive the loss of his liberty; and those of the company's servants who had been the principal actors in the quarrel, were afterwards sued in the name of the king, and sentenced to pay a fine of £1000 each.

On the 30th of May, 1777, the earl of Chatham moved, in the house of lords, to address his majesty, that the most speedy and effectual measures might be taken for putting a stop to hostilities in America, and for the removal of accumulated grievances. He insisted, as he had done on all former occasions, that it was impossible to conquer America, and declared, in that strong and emphatic language by which he was peculiarly distinguished, that we were waging war with America, exposed at the same time to a masked battery of France, which would, ere long, open upon us, and sweep us away. The motion was rejected by a majority of 99 to 88.

The conduct of the Dutch, particularly in the West Indies, had caused a memorial to be presented by sir Joseph Yorke, the British minister at the Hague, to the states-general of the United Provinces, complaining of the conduct of Van Graaf, the governor of the island of St. Eustatia, in having permitted an American pirate to make prize of an English vessel within cannon-shot of that island, of having returned the salute of a rebel frigate, and having promoted an illicit commerce, and connived at the hostile equipments of the Americans. Attestations of these charges being annexed, the memoir peremptorily insisted on the dismission and immediate recal of the governor. The states replied by their envoy at London. They complained of the menacing tone of the memorial, as more vehement than became the respect due to an independent power, united to England, for so many years, by the ties of mutual friendship. They disavowed, however, the conduct of the governor, and acquainted his majesty, that they had recalled admiral Van Graaf, that he might render an account of his conduct. It does not appear, however, that he was suspended.

In America, the army under general sir William Howe was unable to take the field early in the summer, for want of the necessary camp equipage, which did not arrive until the latter end of May. In the mean time, a detachment of 500 men, under the command of lieutenant-colonel Bird, was sent up the North river, to destroy a very large magazine, which the Americans had collected at Peek's Kill, 50 miles from York Island. Considerable stores of rum, molasses, flour, provisions, and military stores, were destroyed. A month after, major-general Tryon, governor of New York, at the head of 1800 men, penetrated into the province of Connecticut, and destroyed two large magazines deposited at Danbury and Ridefield. In destroying the magazines, the towns were also reduced to ashes. The American general Wooster was killed in a skirmish on the return of the party. These successes, previous to the opening of the campaign, tended to support the hopes of the nation, but do not appear to have had any visible effect on the operations of the main American army. The confederates were not backward, however, in retaliating these losses. A body of troops, under colonel Meigs, who had served with considerable reputation in the expedition against Quebec, embarked in whale-boats at Connecticut, and proceeded to the east side of Long Island, to a place called Sagg Harbour, where a quantity of forage, grain, and necessaries, was collected for the use of the army. A company of foot, and an armed schooner, defended the post, but were soon compelled to submit. A number of small vessels, which lay in the harbour, were burnt, and every thing on shore was destroyed. Another detachment from Providence, under colonel Briton, made an incursion into Rhode Island, and carried off by surprise general Prescot, the governor. That officer had been, on a former occasion, a prisoner to the Americans, on the taking of St. John's on lake Champlain. The American general Lee had been captured, in the preceding year, by colonel Harcourt, at the head of a few dragoons; and he was now exchanged for governor Prescot.

In consequence of the British having regained possession of the lakes, a design was formed of making an irruption from Canada into the northern colonies, and, by stretching forward to Albany, to secure the entire navigation of that river, which separates the northern from the middle and southern states. A very considerable army, composed of British and German troops, with the most ample appointments, and a fine train of artillery, was destined to execute this important plan; and lieutenant-general Burgoyne, who had been distinguished for his bravery, spirit, and success, during the preceding war, in repelling the attacks of the Spaniards on the kingdom of Portugal, was appointed to the command. With a view to hasten the return of the Americans to obedience, a body of savages had been engaged, by a profusion of presents, to act as allies of the king of Great Britain, against his colonies. Sir Guy Carleton now quitted the government of Canada, being succeeded in his command by general Haldimand, a native of Sweden.

The principal object of the southern army, under sir William Howe, was the reduction of Philadelphia. The American force opposed to this design was commanded by general Washington, who had likewise been promoted to the rank of dictator. His army was estimated by the British at 14,000 men; but, in all probability, did not amount to half that number. Though congress had, in compliance with the suggestions of Washington, voted a standing army, they did not find the requisite facility in raising troops. The luxuries enjoyed in the British lines, joined to the temptation of a large bounty offered by the general, occasioned many desertions, and inspired fears of more. Washington, however, occupied a very strong and advantageous camp in the Jerseys, and was materially assisted by the skill and bravery of many French officers, among whom was the marquis Fayette, nephew to M. de Noailles, the French ambassador at the court of London, who had resided with his uncle for some time, and who lived in the most unreserved intimacy with many of the confidential servants of the crown. Having obtained very important information concerning the plan of operations for the campaign, particularly respecting the northern army, he suddenly withdrew to France, and, without communicating his intentions to any of his relatives, or obtaining leave of absence from his court, (which, as an officer in the French service, was requisite,) he embarked in a vessel bound to America, to serve in the army commanded by Washington.

The British general endeavoured by stratagem to induce the American commander to quit his station, aware that, with so formidable an enemy hanging on his rear, it would be impossible for him to penetrate through the Jerseys, and pass his army across the Delaware, where the enemy had placed a corps ready to dispute the passage. But the caution of Washington was not to be eluded; and Howe, after having made a feint of retiring from the American lines, which drew after it no decisive consequence, was obliged to relinquish his attempt, and, with great delay and danger, to adopt a new and distant plan of operation, by embarking his army in transports, and proceeding to the place of destination by sea. On the 23rd of July, the main army, consisting of 18,000 men, embarked, leaving behind them 8500 at New York, and 3000 for the defence of Rhode Island. The fleet arrived at the mouth of the Delaware on the 30th, and could a landing have been effected on the southern coast, near Wilmington, the service would have received a most essential benefit. But a number of floating batteries, fire-ships, and fire-rafts, had been collected by the enemy, which would have endangered the destruction of the fleet during the night. There were only eight or nine pilots on board, and no boats capable of withstanding the row-boats and gallies. These circumstances rendered an attempt to land extremely hazardous. The country also was marshy, and the roads formed upon narrow causeways, intersected by creeks. These difficulties and dangers determined the land and naval commanders to proceed two degrees southward, to the bay of Chesapeak; but, in their course, they were greatly impeded by contrary winds. On the 16th of August the whole fleet entered the bay, and proceeded through a difficult and dangerous navigation to the mouth of the river Elk, in which progress the skill and activity of the admiral appeared to great advantage. The whole army landed in safety on the 25th. Washington, as soon as the destination of the fleet was known, (for the alarm had been spread from Boston even to South Carolina,) passed the Delaware with his army, consisting of 15,000 men, and marched to cover Philadelphia. The two armies approached each other at a small stream called Brandywine creek, which falls into the Delaware, about twenty miles below the city. After several movements on each side, sir William Howe, by a masterly display of generalship, found a favourable opportunity for attacking the American army. The Hessians, who came first into action, behaved with such intrepidity as nothing could resist. The enemy, every where broken and dismayed, fled. A few hours more day-light might have annihilated their army; but under cover of the night, assisted by a knowledge of the country, they retreated. No time appears to have been lost in pursuing the fugitives, consistent with the safety of the troops, in a country rendered every where strong by nature, hilly, and covered with wood, intersected by ravines, creeks, and marshy grounds, where little or no knowledge can be obtained by reconnoitering. Washington did every thing becoming a skilful commander to impede the progress of the victors; but, unable to protect the city, he abandoned it to its fate, and retreated ten miles to the north of Germantown, whilst the combined army soon after encamped at that village. The earl of Cornwallis took possession of Philadelphia on the 26th of September.

In the mean time, lord Howe proceeded with the fleet round to the Delaware; but an unfortunate oversight had been committed, in neglecting to take possession of a station on the eastern side of the river, called Red Bank, which the enemy afterwards fortified, and in an unsuccessful attempt to dispossess them, colonel Donop, of the Hessians, and many brave men, lost their lives. It was not until the 15th of November that the navigation of the river was opened as high as the city, by the reduction of Mud Island, and the removal of the chevaux-de-frize, in which service the Augusta, a sixty gun ship, and a sloop, went aground, and were destroyed.

A few days after the arrival of the king's troops at Philadelphia, general Washington formed a design of surprising the army at Germantown, and early in the morning of the 4th of October, attacked the outposts with great fury. The intrepid behaviour of lieutenant-colonel Musgrave stopped the advances of the assailants, and gave time for major-general Grey, who had been apprised of the attack by sir William Howe, to march a body of troops to their relief, and the army being quickly assembled, the Americans were driven back with great slaughter.

The army was now plentifully supplied with provisions from the adjacent country, the farmers preferring that market to any other, because the only one where they could receive payment for their commodities in gold and silver. They had the farther advantage of providing themselves and families with a variety of necessary articles, which could only be had in those places which were possessed by the British army and navy. It is supposed that Washington, through policy, connived at this kind of commerce, knowing that an influx of gold and silver was strengthening his country in a most important point.

The noble, populous, and wealthy city of Philadelphia, was now subdued; but the rebel army remained unbroken. It was even augmented in numbers, improved in discipline, habituated to service, and though degraded by a defeat and a repulse, yet secure in the persuasion, that the nature of their country would ever protect them from a decisive overthrow. Such successes, on the part of Great Britain, could yield little rational hopes of final triumph in the war against America, even if conquests should continue to spread in the like gradual manner as they had done during two campaigns. But such an expectancy, so short of the sanguine views entertained in England, was entirely vain. From whence could the force be drawn, that should carry on an active war during the next campaign, supposing the northern army had accomplished its purpose, and penetrated to Albany? Had that event taken place, terror alone must have effected what force could not have done; no indications were shewn by the colonists, when their affairs wore the most disastrous appearance, of a disposition to yield unconditional submission to this empire, and how was so extensive a country to be governed by the sword? Every conquest weakened the operating force equally with a defeat; but such a regular course of events was not destined to take place, and it is now necessary to speak of the expedition from Canada, and to follow the northern army in its progress.

The war upon the side of Canada and the lakes was committed to the charge of lieutenant-general Burgoyne; an officer, whose ability was unquestioned, and whose spirit of enterprise, and thirst for military glory, however rivalled, could not possibly be exceeded.

This appointment, however palliated or justified by the propriety or supposed necessity of the governor's constant residence in his province, could not fail of being sensibly felt, and could scarcely be supposed not to give umbrage to general Carleton, to whose abilities and resolution this nation in general acknowledged, and the world attributed, the preservation of Canada. It was said, that his powers had been diminished in proportion to the greatness of his services. His military command extended before to every part of America, whither he might find it fitting to conduct the army under his direction. It was now suddenly restrained to the narrow limits of his own province. He had, said his friends, in the preceding campaign, not only driven the enemy out of Canada, but a great naval armament had been formed, the enemy's force on lake Champlain destroyed, and Crown Point recovered, under his authority. The lateness of the season only prevented him from attacking Ticonderago, and immediately prosecuting the war to the southward. He had, during the winter, exerted his usual industry, and applied his military skill and judgment in the forwarding of every preparation, which might conduce to the success of the ensuing campaign. At the opening of the communication with England, instead of the reinforcement which he had required and expected, for the completion of his purpose, he received an arrangement totally new, which, as it had been framed without any reference to his judgment, or attention to his approbation, left nothing to his discretion or opinion in the execution. Two expeditions were to be formed, in each of which, the number and nature of the troops to be employed, the particular service of each corps, with its subdivisions, and the smallest detachment to be made from it, had been minutely and precisely specified by the minister. He was not even consulted as to the number or nature of the troops, which were to remain in his hands, for the defence or security of Canada. In a word, the army which he had lately commanded, was taken out of his, and placed in other hands; and officers who lately acted under his direction, were, by a detraction from his authority, virtually placed in independent commands; for their instructions to put themselves under the orders of sir William Howe, seemed little more than mockery, as that general had informed sir Guy Carleton, that the concerted operations of the campaign, on his side, would lead him to such a distance, as to render any communication of that nature impracticable.

That the governor felt and understood this arrangement and these disappointments, in the manner I have related, is evident, from the immediate resignation of his government, which then took place; but as the notification, the appointment of another, and the passage of his successor from Europe, were all works of time, he was still, however ungrateful the task, obliged to continue in the exercise of his office, during a longer period than that of which I am treating.

Under these circumstances, and in this trying and difficult situation, he endeavoured to shew, that resentment could not warp him from his duty, and he applied himself, with the same diligence and energy, to forward by every possible means, and to support in all its parts, the expedition, as if the arrangement was entirely his own. This conduct, however praise-worthy, was not less necessary, from the peculiar nature of the service which was to be performed; a service, exceedingly complicated in the arrangement, uncommonly numerous in the parts, and very unusual in practice. It will not be difficult to conceive, how effectually negligence, dislike, obstinacy, or even a colourable and rational difference of opinion in some disputable points, might frustrate all the hopes founded upon such a system.

Nothing of this sort intervened, to damp the spirit or to defeat the success of the expedition. The preparations were carried on with vigour.

I have before taken notice, that the ministers, and more particularly the noble lord at the head of the American department, were not only particularly interested in the event, but had founded the most sanguine hopes upon the success of this expedition. Nothing was accordingly left undone on their side, which, in proportion to the number of regular troops that could be spared for that particular service, might conduce to give efficacy to their operations. Besides, Canada (it was hoped) would supply a warlike, though undisciplined militia, well calculated for, and acquainted with, the peculiar nature of the service and country.

To strengthen and increase this irregular, but necessary aid, arms and accoutrements were amply provided, to supply those numerous loyalists, who were expected to join the royal army, as soon as it approached or penetrated the frontiers of the adjacent provinces. As a powerful artillery is considered to be the great and effective arm in an American war, where a numerous and undisciplined enemy is to be continually attacked in difficult posts, and driven out of woods and fastnesses, so that this part of the service was particularly attended to, and the brass train that was sent out upon this expedition was perhaps the finest, and probably the most excellently supplied as to officers and private men, that had ever been allotted to second the operations of any army, which did not far exceed the present in number.

Besides these forces, several nations of savages had been induced to come into the field. This measure was defended upon the supposed necessity of the case; as if, from their character, it was presumed, they could not remain inactive, and, if not engaged in the king's service, would have joined the Americans. Whatever advantages were hoped from them, general Carleton did not, in the preceding year, make use of them; and civilly dismissed them at the close of the campaign, on a promise of their appearing in the next, if required. There was a good deal of discussion, how far he approved of their employment at all. The friends of ministry said, that he had recommended and forwarded the measure; others said, that partly from humanity, partly from his forming a just estimate of their services, and knowing by experience the extent of their powers and ability in war, he was unwilling to use them, aware that they were capricious, inconstant, and untractable. That, as their ideas of war and of courage were totally different from those of civilized nations, so, notwithstanding their ferocity of character, and the incredible specimens of passive valour which they sometimes exhibited, in cases adapted to their own opinions, they not only abhorred, but dreaded, whatever is considered as fair and generous service among Europeans, when the contending parties bravely seek, and are included in, one common danger, trusting only for success to their superior skill and courage. That their object and design, in all wars, was not to fight, but to murder; not to conquer, but to destroy. In a word, that their service was uncertain, their rapacity insatiate, their faith doubtful, and their actions cruel and barbarous.

WHATEVER his reasons were for not employing them in a more early and effectual manner, if it were in his power to do it as early and effectually as was imagined, this conduct was far from being generally approved of at home. Those who were particularly warm in their zeal against the colonies, began somewhat to forget their natural humanity in their anger. They insisted, that every appearance of lenience, in such circumstances, was actual cruelty in the effect; by acting as an incentive to disobedience, and increasing the objects of punishment. That, on the contrary, partial severity was general mercy; as timely exertions of justice, and strict inflictions of punishment, were at all times the sure means of preventing crimes. That the only method of speedily crushing the rebellion, was to render the situation of the actors in it so intolerable, that a cessation from danger, and the blessings of repose, should become the only objects of their contemplation and hope. That the means were but little to be attended to, when they led to the accomplishment of so great and happy a purpose as the destruction of rebellion, and the restoration of order and legal government. And that in all convulsions of states, the innocent were too frequently involved in the calamities which were intended or wished to be confined entirely to the guilty; but such was the lot and condition of mankind, and this evil, however deplored, could not in numberless instances be avoided or prevented. This doctrine was supported by the avowed friends of government, whether out of office, or in the subordinate departments of the state; it was also generally supposed to be consonant to the opinions of the ministers, and that general Carleton's scruples upon this point were by no means acceptable.

HOWEVER this was, in the present arrangement, the aid of the savages was considered as a principal member of that force which was destined to the prosecution of the northern war, and the governor of Canada was accordingly enjoined to use his utmost weight and influence, in bringing the Indian nations forward in support of the expedition. His zeal was as active in fulfilling this duty, as it was in every other which appertained to the present service. Nor was his success disproportioned to his zeal. Whether it proceeded from the governor's influence with the Indians, their avidity to seize the presents which were now liberally distributed amongst them, from their own innate thirst for war and plunder, or, more probably, from the joint operation of all these causes, their remote, as well as near nations, poured forth their warriors in such abundance, that he became at length apprehensive, that their numbers might render them an incumbrance, rather than an aid, to the army.

THE regular force allotted to the expedition conducted by general Burgoyne, consisting of British and German troops, amounted to 7173 men, exclusive of the artillery corps. Of these the German corps (consisting mostly of Brunswickers) amounted to 3217. The force required by that general, in the proposals which he laid before the minister, consisted of 8000 regulars, rank and file, besides the artillery, a corps of watermen, 2000 Canadians, including hatchetmen, and other workmen, with 1000 or more savages. We have no certain information what numbers of these auxiliaries were in actual service upon the expedition.

CANADA was largely rated, and its inhabitants must have sensibly felt the proportion which they were allotted to contribute towards this service. In the proposals laid before the minister, besides the militia, and various species of workmen supposed necessary to be immediately attached to the army, and to accompany it on the expedition, chains of their militia, patroles, and posts, were expected to occupy the woods on the frontiers, in the rear of the army, partly to intercept the communication between the enemy and the ill-affected in Canada, partly to prevent desertion, and to procure intelligence, and for various other duties necessary towards keeping the country in quiet. Another great call upon them was for workmen, to complete the fortifications at Sorrel, St. John's, Chamblee, and Isle au Noix, which it was supposed would amount to 2000 men. A still greater call upon the Canadians, and the more grievous, as it was at their seed-sowing season, was for the transport of all the provisions, artillery-stores, and baggage of the army, from the different repositories to the water, and afterwards at the carrying places, besides the corvées for making the roads. It was estimated that this service would, for some time before, and at the opening of the campaign, require no less than 2000 men, besides a very large portion of horses and carts.

General Burgoyne was seconded by able and excellent officers. Of these major-general Phillips of the artillery, who had gained such distinguished renown by his conduct in that service, during the late war in Germany, deserves to be particularly mentioned. He was likewise assisted by the brigadier-generals Frazer, Powel, and Hamilton, all distinguished officers, with the Brunswick major-general baron Reidesel, and brigadier-general Specht. The army was, in every respect, in the best condition that could possibly be expected or wished, the troops being in the highest spirits, admirably disciplined, and uncommonly healthy.

The detachment on the expedition to the Mohawk river, under colonel St. Leger, did not probably exceed 700 or 800 men, consisting of 200 drawn from the 8th and 34th regiments, a regiment of New Yorkers, lately raised by, and under the command of, sir John Johnson, being mostly emigrants from his own country, adjoining to the intended scene of action, with some Hanau chasseurs, a company of Canadians, and another of newly-raised rangers; these were joined by a strong body of savages, in part conducted by a number of British and Americans. The regular force left in Canada, including the Highland emigrants under that denomination, amounted to about 3700 men.

The army being at length arrived, and encamped at the river Boquet, on the west side of lake Champlain, and at no very great distance to the northward of Crown Point, general Burgoyne there met the Indians in congress, and afterwards, in compliance with the customs of those people, gave them a war feast. The speech, which he made to the savages on this occasion, has been published. It was calculated, in those powerful strains of elocution by which the general was distinguished, to excite their ardour in the common cause, and at the same time to repress their barbarity. For this purpose, he took pains in explaining to them the distinction between a war carried on against a common enemy, in which the whole country and people were hostile, and the present, in which good and faithful subjects were largely, and of necessity, intermixed with rebels and traitors. Upon this principle he laid down several injunctions for the government of their conduct, particularly, that they should only kill those who were opposed to them in arms; that old men, women, children, and prisoners, should be held sacred from the knife or hatchet, even in the heat of actual conflict; that they should only scalp those whom they had slain in fair opposition; that under no pretence, subtlety, or colour of prevarication, they should scalp the wounded, or even dying, much less kill persons in that condition, by way of evading the injunction. And they were promised a compensation of prisoners; but informed, that they should be called to account for scalps. These endeavours did in some measure mitigate, but were not of force, wholly to restrain their ferocity, of which some unhappy instances afterwards appeared.

The general soon after dispersed a manifesto, calculated to spread terror among the contumacious, and particularly to revive in their minds every latent impression of fear derived from knowledge or information of the cruel operations of the savages, whose numbers were accordingly magnified, and their eagerness to be let loose to their prey, described with uncommon energy. The force of that great power, which was now spread by sea and land, to embrace or to crush every part of America, was displayed in full, lofty, and expressive language. The rebellion, with its effects, and the conduct of the present governors and governments, were charged with the highest colouring, and exhibited a most hideous picture of unparalleled injustice, cruelty, persecution, and tyranny. Encouragement and employment were assured to those, who, with a disposition and ability suited to the purpose, should actually assist in redeeming their country from slavery, and in the re-establishment of legal government. Protection and security, clogged with conditions, restricted by circumstances, and rather imperfectly or inexplicitly expressed, were held out to the peaceable and industrious, who continued in their habitation. And all the calamities and outrages of war, arrayed in their most terrific forms, were denounced against those who persevered in their hostility.

The army, having made a short stay at Crown Point, for the establishment of magazines, an hospital, and other necessary services, proceeded, in concert with the naval armament, to invest Ticonderoga, which was the first object of their destination. Although the rash and ill-conducted attempt made upon that place, in the year 1758, with the consequent repulse and heavy loss sustained by the British army, rendered it at that time an object of general attention, it may not, at this distance of time, be wholly unnecessary to take some notice of its situation, as well as of its state of defence.

Ticonderoga lies on the western shore, and only a few miles to the northward from the commencement, of that narrow inlet, by which the water from lake George is conveyed to lake Champlain. Crown Point lies about a dozen miles farther north, at the extremity of that inlet. The first of these places is situated on an angle of land, which is surrounded on three sides by water, and that covered by rocks. A great part of the fourth side was covered by a deep morass; and, where that fails, the old French lines still continued, as a defence on the north-west quarter. The Americans strengthened these lines with additional works, and a block-house. They had other posts, with works and block-houses, on the left, towards lake George. To the right of the French lines they had also two new block-houses, with other works.

On the eastern shore of the inlet, and opposite to Ticonderoga, the Americans had taken still more pains in fortifying a high circular hill, to which they gave the name of Mount Independence. On the summit of this, which is table-land, they had erected a star-fort, inclosing a large square of barracks, well fortified and supplied with artillery. The foot of a mountain, which on the west side projected into the water, was strongly entrenched to its edge, and the entrenchment well lined with heavy artillery. A battery about half way up the mount, sustained and covered their lower works.

The Americans, with their usual industry, had joined these two posts by a bridge of communication, thrown over the inlet. This was, like many other of their performances, a great and most laborious work. The bridge was supported on 22 sunken piers, of very large dimensions, placed at nearly equal distances; the spaces between these were filled with separate floats, each about fifty feet long and twelve wide, strongly fastened together with chains and rivets, and as effectually attached to sunken pillars. On the lake Champlain side of the bridge, it was defended by a boom, composed of very large pieces of timber, fastened together by rivetted bolts and double chains, made of iron an inch and half square. Thus, not only a communication was maintained between these two posts, but all access by water, from the northern side, was totally cut off.

It is to be observed, that as the inlet, immediately after passing Ticonderoga, assumes a new form, suddenly widening to a considerable breadth, and becoming navigable to vessels of burden; so from thence it also holds the name of Champlain, although it is not yet properly a part of the lake. On the other hand, the southern girt from lake George, besides being narrow, is also rendered unnavigable by shallows and falls; but, on its arrival at Ticonderoga, it is joined by a great body of water on the eastern side, called, in this part, South river, but higher up, towards its source, before the junction of the elder branch with the younger, which runs from South bay, it is known under the appellation of Wood Creek. The confluence of these waters at Ticonderoga, forms a small bay to the southward of the bridge of communication; and the point of land formed by their junction is composed of a mountain called Sugar Hill.

Notwithstanding the apparent strength of Ticonderoga, from what we have hitherto seen, it is entirely overlooked, and its works effectually commanded by Sugar Hill. This circumstance occasioned a consultation among the Americans, as to the fortifying of that mount; but their works were already far too extensive for their powers of defence, and would require ten or twelve thousand men, to be effectually manned. It was likewise hoped, that the difficulty of access to the Sugar Mount, and the savage inequality of its surface, would prevent the enemy from attempting to profit by its situation. It would be exceedingly difficult to form an authentic estimate of the number of Americans that were in the actual defence of these two posts. It appears by the commander-in-chief, general St. Clair's exculpatory letter to the congress, as well as by the resolutions of the council of war, which accompanies it, that his whole force, including 900 militia, who were to quit him in a few days, was only about 3000 men; that these were ill equipped, and worse armed, particularly in the article of bayonets, a weapon so essential in the defence of lines, that they had not one to ten of their number. This account would seem not only satisfactory, but conclusive, if it had not been contradicted by others. In a detail of the transactions of the campaign, transmitted by the war-office of Massachusett's bay to the American deputies in France, and for the conveyance of which a light ship was sent out on purpose, they state St. Clair's force at near 5000 men, well equipped and armed. It is, however, to be observed, that they talk with great bitterness of that general's conduct, as he had done, in his first letter to congress, with respect to the behaviour of two of their regiments. It may also be supposed, that, in a statement of their affairs, intended to operate upon the sentiments and conduct of a court, from which they already received essential benefits, and looked forward to much greater, they would rather increase the weight of blame upon an unfortunate officer, than detract from the public opinion of their own conduct and power, by attributing weakness to their councils, or inefficacy to their arms.

As the royal army approached to the object of its destination, it advanced, with equal caution and order, on both sides of the lake, the naval force keeping its station in the centre, until the one had begun to enclose the enemy on the land side, and the frigates and gunboats, cast anchor just out of cannon-shot from their works. Upon the near approach of the right wing on the Ticonderoga side, upon the 2nd of July, the Americans immediately abandoned and set fire to their works, block-houses, and saw-mills, towards lake George; and, without any interruption, or the smallest motion of diversion, permitted major-general Phillips to take possession of the very advantageous post of Mount Hope, which, besides commanding their lines in a great and dangerous degree, totally cut off their communication with that lake. The same supineness and total want of vigour appeared in every thing on their side, except in the keeping up of an ineffectual roar of cannon, which was so much contemned on the other, as not to be once returned.

In the meanwhile, the royal army proceeded with such expedition in the 1777. construction of its works, the bringing up of artillery, stores, and provisions, and the establishment of its posts and communications, that by the 5th, matters were so far advanced, as to require little more time for completely investing the posts on both sides of the lake. Sugar Hill was also examined, and the advantages it presented were so important, though attended with infinite labour and difficulty, from the necessity of making a road to its top through very rough ground, and constructing a level there for a battery, that this arduous task was undertaken, and already far advanced towards its completion, through the spirit, judgment, and active industry of general Phillips.

In these circumstances, a hasty council was on that day held by the American generals, to which their principal went, as he informs us, already pre-determined as to his conduct. It was represented, that their whole effective numbers were not sufficient to man one half of the works; that as the whole must consequently be upon constant duty, it would be impossible for them to sustain the fatigue for any length of time; and that, as the enemy's batteries were ready to open, and the place would be completely invested on all sides within 24 hours, nothing could save the troops, but an immediate evacuation of both posts. This determination was unanimously agreed to by the council, and the place was accordingly evacuated on that night.

However justly this representation of their condition and circumstances was founded, and however necessary the determination of the council was in the present state of their affairs, one apparently capital error, on the side of the commanders, must strike every common observer. If their force was not sufficient for the defence of the works, why did they not form this resolution in time? Why did they not withdraw the troops, artillery, and stores, and demolish the works before the arrival of the enemy? Why did they wait to be nearly surrounded, until their retreat was more ruinous than a surrender, under any conditions that could be proposed, and little less destructive in the event, than if the works had been carried by storm?

THE baggage of the army, with such artillery, stores, and provisions, as the necessity of the time would permit, were embarked with a strong detachment on board above 200 batteaux, and dispatched under convoy of five armed gallies, up the South river, in their way to Skenesborough. The main army took its route by the way of Castletown, to reach the same place by land.

THE first light of the morning had no sooner discovered the flight of the enemy, than their main body was eagerly pursued by brigadier-general Frazer, at the head of his brigade, consisting of the light troops, grenadiers, and some other corps. Major-general Reidesel was also ordered to join in the pursuit by land, with the greater part of the Brunswick troops, either to support the brigadier, or to act separately, as occasion might require, or circumstances direct. The enemy left a prodigious artillery behind them, which, with those taken or destroyed in the armed vessels at Skenesborough, amounted to no less than 128 pieces, of all sorts, serviceable and unserviceable. They also left some military stores of different sorts, and no inconsiderable stock of provisions, in the forts.

GENERAL Burgoyne conducted the pursuit by water in person. That bridge and those works, which the Americans had laboured hard for ten months to render impenetrable, were cut through in less time by the British seamen and artificers, than it would have cost them to have described their structure. In a word, they did their business with such speed and effect, that not only the gun-boats, but the Royal George and Inflexible frigates, had passed through the bridge by nine o'clock in the morning. Several regiments embarked on board the vessels, and the pursuit up the river was supported with such vigour, that by three o'clock in the afternoon, the foremost brigade of the gun-boats was closely engaged with the enemy's gallies near Skenesborough Falls. In the mean time, three regiments, which had been landed at South Bay, ascended and passed a mountain with great expedition, in order to attack the enemy's works at the falls, and thereby cut off their retreat. But their speedy flight prevented the execution of that design. Upon the approach of the frigates, the gallies, which were already overborne by the gun-boats, lost all spirit; two of them were accordingly taken, and three blown up. The rebels, now giving way to their despair, set fire to their works, stockaded fort, mills, and batteaux, after which they escaped as well as they could up the Wood Creek. This stroke seemed to complete the ruin of their ill-fated army, for the batteaux were deeply loaded, besides their baggage, with ammunition, stores, and provisions; so that they were now left naked in the woods, destitute of provision, and without any other means of defence than what they derived from the arms in their hands. Confusion and dismay equally attended their main body on the left. The soldiers had lost all confidence in their commanders, and it was useless to expect resolution, where neither order nor obedience could be maintained.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL Frazer, being detached in pursuit of the fugitives by land from Mount Independence, overtook their rear, consisting of 1500 chosen troops, under the command of colonel Francis, and commenced an engagement near Huberton, though greatly inferior in number. The arrival of some Germans, under general Reidesel, who, by a feint, made his force seem greater than it really was, decided the day. The Americans precipitately fled. Their commander, with several other officers, and 200 men, were killed, a similar number captured, and 600 are supposed to have died of their wounds undiscovered in the woods. Another division of the garrison was pursued by colonel Hill, who routed them with great slaughter, compelling them to retreat to the heights of fort Edward, after setting fire to fort Anne. The destruction of gallies and batteaux of the Americans, and the defeat of their rear, obliged general St.

Clair, in order to avoid being placed between two fires, to change the route of his main body, and to turn off from Castletown to the left. After a fatiguing and distressing march of seven days, he joined general Schuyler at fort Edward. Their combined forces, inclusive of the militia, not exceeding in the whole 4400 men, were, not long after, on the approach of general Burgoyne, compelled to retire further into the country bordering on Albany. The royal army, after these successes, continued for some days in Skenesborough, waiting for their tents, baggage, and provision. The troops were for some time employed in opening a road, and clearing a creek, to favour their advance, and to open a passage for the conveyance of their stores. A party of the royal army, which had been left behind at Ticonderago, (or Ticonderoga) was equally industrious in carrying gun-boats, provisions, vessels, and batteaux, over land, into lake George. The most severe and unremitting labour was required from the troops; but, stimulated as they were by future hopes and past successes, they disregarded toil and danger. The intricate combination of land and water carriage, together with the insufficient means of transportation, and excessive rains, caused such delay, that, at the end of 15 days, there were not more than 14 days' provisions brought forward, nor above 10 batteaux in the river. At length, after incredible labour and fatigue, general Burgoyne and the army under his command reached, on the 30th of July, fort 1777. Edward, on Hudson's river, to the inexpressible relief and exultation of his troops.

The discomfited and retreating army of the Americans was reduced to 2700 men; but, placed between the inhabitants and the British general, they formed a point of rendezvous, and abated the panic of the people. Their exertions verified the observation of St. Clair, on abandoning Ticonderoga, that he had lost a post, but saved a state. Burgoyne having issued a proclamation, requiring deputations of ten persons from each township, to attend him at Skenesborough, Schuyler published a counter-proclamation, reciting with exaggeration the violences committed by the British army in New Jersey, exhorting the people not to attend to the promises of the general, on pain of being considered in the light of traitors, and commanding the militia to join him without delay. Numerous parties were also employed in bringing off the public stores, and in felling trees, to obstruct the progress of the royal army. At first an universal panic intimidated the inhabitants, but they soon recovered; the laws of self-preservation operated in their full force, and diffused a general activity through the adjacent states. The formalities of covening, draughting, and officering the militia, were in many instances dispensed with. Hundreds seized their firelocks, and marched at the general call, without waiting for the orders of their immediate commanders. The terror excited by the Indians, instead of disposing the inhabitants to court the protection of the English, had a contrary effect. The friends of the royal cause, as well as its enemies, suffered from their indiscriminate barbarities. Among other instances, the murder of Miss M. Crea excited an universal horror. This young lady, in the innocence of youth, and the bloom of beauty, the daughter of a steady loyalist, and affianced to a British officer, was, on the very day of her intended nuptials, massacred by the savage auxiliaries attached to the British army. The feeble aid which the royal army received from its Indian reinforcements, was infinitely overbalanced by the odium it brought on the British cause, and the determined spirit of opposition excited by the dread of their atrocities. An American army was speedily poured forth from their woods and mountains. When those who had begun the retreat were nearly wasted away, the enthusiasm of the country immediately supplied their place with a much greater and more formidable force; and it was early conjectured, that the English army, by pushing indiscreetly forward, would be so entangled, as to fight or retreat under the most inauspicious circumstances. From the combined influence of these causes, the American army soon amounted to upwards of 13,000 men.

Besides the army of general Burgoyne, a body of troops, consisting of 700 men, with a party of Indians, commanded by lieutenant-colonel St. Leger, proceeded by the Mohawk river, and invested fort Stanwix, which was commanded by colonel Ganzevoort, a name which deserves to be transmitted to posterity, for the unshaken firmness with which he defended the place. A body of Americans advancing to its relief, were defeated by a party of Indians, but several of their most respected warriors fell in the action; a circumstance which, together with the restraints that had been laid on their savage thirst of blood, impressed them with a hearty abhorrence of the service. St. Leger in vain attempted, by the offer of advantageous terms, and by threats of utter extirpation, in case of obstinate perseverance, to gain possession of the place, and the approach of Arnold, with a considerable army, obliged him at length to retire from the fort. The defection of the Indians, and the approach of the enemy, obliged St. Leger to retire to Canada, and abandon general Burgoyne, who, after crossing the Hudson river, advanced along its side, and in four days encamped on the heights, about two miles from general Gates's camp, which was three miles above Still-water. The Americans came out to meet the advancing British, and engaged them with firmness and resolution. The conflict continued for five hours, without intermission. Several of the Americans placed themselves in high trees, and as often as they could distinguish an officer's uniform, took him off by deliberately aiming at his person. The English remained masters of the field, and the Americans retired in good order.

The perilous situation of the northern army being known, by this time, at New York, sir Henry Clinton, with a considerable body of troops, embarked in armed gallies and small vessels, and, accompanied by some frigates under the command of commodore Hotham, proceeded up Hudson's river, with a view of gaining Albany. After making many feints, he landed at Stony Point, marched across the mountains to fort Montgomery, and attacked the different redoubts. The garrison, commanded by governor Clinton, a brave and intelligent officer, made a gallant resistance; but the works on the land side were untenable, and at the close of day, the British entered the fort with fixed bayonets. The loss on neither side was great; governor Clinton, general James Clinton, and most of the officers and men effected their escape under cover of a thick smoke, and a darkness that suddenly prevailed.

The reduction of this post furnished the British with an opportunity for opening a passage up the North river; but, instead of pushing forward to Burgoyne's encampment, or even to Albany, they spent several days in laying waste the adjacent country. The Americans destroyed fort Constitution, and also set fire to two new frigates and some other vessels. General Tryon, at the same time, destroyed a settlement called Continental Village, which contained barracks for 1500 men, besides many stores. Sir James Wallace, with a flying squadron of light frigates, and general Vaughan, with a detachment of land forces, continued on and near the river for several days, desolating the country near its margin. General Vaughan so completely burned Esopus, a fine and flourishing village, that a single house was not left standing, though on his approach the Americans had left the town without making any resistance.

In the meantime, Gates posted 1400 men on the heights opposite the fords of Saratoga, and 2000 more in the rear, to prevent a retreat to fort Edward, and 1500 at a ford higher up. Burgoyne received intelligence of these movements, and concluded from them, especially the last, that Gates meant to turn his right. This, if effected, would have entirely enclosed him; to avoid being hemmed in, he resolved on an immediate retreat to Saratoga. His hospital, with the sick and wounded, was necessarily left behind; but they were recommended to the humanity of general Gates, and received from him every indulgence their situation required. When general Burgoyne arrived at Saratoga, he found that the Americans had opposed a considerable force, on the opposite heights, to prevent his passage at that ford. In order to prepare the way for a retreat to lake George, general Burgoyne ordered a detachment of artificers, with a strong escort of British and provincials, to repair the bridges and road leading thither. Part of the escort was withdrawn on other duty, and the remainder, on a slight attack of an inconsiderable party of Americans, ran away. The workmen, thus left without support, were unable to effect the business upon which they had been sent. The only practicable route of retreat, which now remained, was by a night-march to fort Edward. Before this attempt could be made, scouts returned with intelligence, that the Americans were entrenched opposite to those fords, on the Hudson's river, over which it was proposed to pass, and that they were also in force on the high ground between fort Edward and fort George; they had, at the same time, parties down the whole shore and posts, so near as to observe every motion of the royal army. Their position nearly extended round the British, and was, by the nature of the ground, defended in a great measure from the attacks. The royal army could not stand its ground where it was, from want of means necessary for its subsistence; nor could it advance towards Albany, without attacking a force greatly its superior in number; nor could it retreat, without making good its way over a river in face of a strong party, advantageously posted on the opposite side. In case of either attempt, the Americans were so near as to discover every movement, and by means of their bridge could bring their whole force to operate.

Truly distressing was the condition of the royal army. Abandoned in the most critical moment by their Indian allies—unsupported by their brethren in New York—weakened by the timidity and desertion of the Canadians—worn down by a series of incessant efforts—and greatly reduced in their numbers by repeated battles, they were invested by an army nearly three times their number, without a possibility of retreat, or of replenishing their exhausted stock of provisions. A continual cannonade pervaded their camp, and rifle and grape-shot fell in many parts of their lines; they nevertheless retained a great share of fortitude.

In the mean time, the American army was hourly increasing; and, as no prospect of assistance appeared, and the provisions of the English forces were nearly expended, general Burgoyne thought proper, on the evening of the 13th of October, to take an account of the remaining supplies. It was found on enquiry, that the means of subsistence would not last more than three days. In this state of distress a council of war was called, of the generals, field-officers, and captains, who concurred unanimously in the opinion, that their present situation justified a capitulation on honourable terms. A messenger was therefore dispatched to general Gates, who demanded, in the first instance, that the royal army should surrender prisoners of war, and proposed that the British should ground their arms; but general Burgoyne replied, This condition is inadmissible in every extremity; sooner than this army will consent to ground their arms in their encampment, they will rush on the enemy, determined to take no quarter. After various messages a convention was arranged, by which the British troops were allowed to march out with all the honours of war, and their camp artillery, to a fixed place, where they were to deposit their arms, and were allowed a free navigation to Europe, from Boston, upon condition of their not serving in America during the war. According to the account of the provincials, the whole number of killed, wounded, found in the hospitals, and taken prisoners, from the 6th of July to the unfortunate 17th of October, was upwards of 9213 men. Upon this memorable occasion, the generosity of the American commander would not suffer an individual to leave his camp, to witness the degrading spectacle of piling the British arms.

The whole plan of this campaign was severely censured. A co-operation of the two principal armies, under Howe and Burgoyne, had been universally expected; and so firmly persuaded was general Washington that a junction between them was in contemplation, that, when the British army at New York had actually embarked on the expedition to the Chesapeak, he persisted in his opinion, that the fleet was destined to the northward. The truth is, that no traces are discernible of any regular system of operations. Vague and general hopes were entertained, that the army under general Burgoyne, with such aid as he might eventually derive from the central force at New York, would suffice for the subjugation of the northern provinces, and that general Howe would, in the mean time, accomplish the conquest of the southern. Such were the flattering delusions which, at the distance of 3000 miles, were entertained by the court of London; and, in the annals of England, Minden and Saratoga will remain incontrovertible proofs, that the wisdom of lord George Germaine, in the cabinet, was fully commensurate with his prowess in the field!

Before intelligence had arrived in England of the disastrous catastrophe of an expedition, on which the government had chiefly founded its hopes of a successful termination of hostilities, enough was known, respecting the progress of the war, to convince the nation, that very erroneous estimates had been made of the service to be performed, the force which it required, and the manner in which it was to be executed. On the meeting of parliament, however, (November 20th) his majesty's speech expressed his confidence in the spirit and intrepidity of his forces, and intimated the necessity of preparing for further operations. Warm debates ensued, on the merits of the speech, and lord Chatham descanted with unusual eloquence on the folly of the war, and on the opportunities it afforded to the gratification of Gallic enmity and ambition. He proposed an amendment to the address, advising the cessation of hostilities. A few days after this amendment was rejected, the secretary for America was obliged to acquaint the parliament with the fatal issue of the northern expedition; and the minister, anxious to obtain a respite from the expressions of censure and indignation so profusely and so justly bestowed, prevailed upon his majesty to prorogue the parliament so early as the 20th of January, 1778.

Among the domestic incidents of the year 1777, the trial and execution of Dr. Dodd excited the most powerful interest in the public mind. He had forged a bond for £4200 in the name of the earl of Chesterfield; and, though he pleaded in his defence, that his forgery was only an expedient to gain time, and that he had made restitution to the amount of the greater part of the money obtained, he was found guilty, after a deliberation of 20 minutes. As he had long and justly been distinguished for his talents as a preacher, and had cultivated the popular favour with unusual assiduity, though his private habits were of the most profligate description, his pardon was implored in numerous addresses to the throne, signed by more than 50,000 persons. The sheriffs of London, attended by the city remembrancer, the governors of the Magdalen Charity; and the citizens of Westminster, headed by lord Percy, addressed their majesties in the most fervent and importunate terms of supplication. Their efforts were ineffectual, and he suffered the dreadful sentence of the law.

The case of the chevalier D'Eon, who had for some time exercised the functions of ambassador from the court of France, became the topic of general conversation. An action was brought, by Mr. Hayes, a surgeon in Leicester fields, against Mr. Jacques, a broker and under-writer, for the recovery of £700; the said Mr. Jacques having, about six years before, received premiums of fifteen guineas per cent., for every one of which he engaged to return one hundred guineas, whenever it should be proved, that the chevalier D'Eon was actually a woman. The jury believing the evidence to that effect, a verdict was given to the plaintiff, for the full amount of his demand.

The celebrated Mr. Horne, (afterwards John Horne Tooke) was visited with an ex-officio information, for a libel on the army. He had issued an advertisement, dated King's Arms Tavern, Cornhill, purporting to be an account of the proceedings of the Constitutional Society. One of their resolutions contained the following paragraph: "The sum of £100 shall be raised, to be applied to the relief of the widows, orphans, and aged parents of our beloved American fellow-subjects, who, faithful to the character of Englishmen, preferring death to slavery, were, for that reason only, inhumanly murdered by the king's troops at or near Lexington and Concord, in the province of Massachusetts." The advertisement was signed by Mr. Horne, and, after a long and brilliant defence, he was found guilty, and sentenced to pay a fine of £200 to the king, to be imprisoned for the space of twelve months, and afterwards to find sureties, himself in £400, and two sureties in £200 each, for his good behaviour for three years.

A fire, which had occurred in the rope-house at Portsmouth, had passed for an accident; and, as no suspicion had fallen on any individual, no enquiry was made, till, on the 15th of January, one of the under-clerks at the dock-yard, having occasion to move some hemp in the hemp-house, discovered an inflammable machine. James Aitkin, alias John the Painter, was tried for having set fire to the dock-yard, and was convicted on the clearest evidence. He appears to have been a most abandoned miscreant, capable of the most enormous crimes, and of suffering, without remorse, the most rigorous punishment.

CHAPTER XXVI.

GEORGE III.

Failure of Negotiations with America—Admiral Keppel takes the Command of the Grand Fleet—Naval Operations—Trial and Acquittal of Keppel—Trial of Sir Hugh Pelliser—Manœuvres, on the Coast of America, of the Hostile Fleets under Howe and D'Estaing—Cruelty and Treachery of Colonel Butler towards the Americans—Discontents in Scotland and Ireland—Exploits of Admiral Byron—Return of D'Estaing to France.

IN the momentous struggle between Great Britain and her colonies, it was not to be expected that France would remain an inactive spectator. To participate in the commerce of America was the ardent wish of her mercantile population, and to separate the American colonies from their mother country was the favourite object of the court. On the 19th of March, a message from the king was presented to the reassembled houses of parliament, relative to a declaration delivered to lord Weymouth, by M. de Noailles, the French ambassador, signifying, in form, the treaty of friendship and commerce, which had been entered into with the states of America. It described these states as being in full possession of independence, and declared, that the contracting parties had paid great attention, not to stipulate any exclusive advantage in favour of the French nation. It expressed a desire, that the harmony subsisting between Great Britain and the court of France might not be altered by such a measure; and signified, that, at all events, his most Christian majesty was determined to protect effectually the lawful commerce of his subjects, and to maintain the dignity of his flag. Notwithstanding the obloquy entailed on the British ministers, by their acknowledged ignorance of the machinations of the French court, they proceeded to repair the loss of troops sustained in America, and to provide such an additional number, as might be adequate to a vigorous prosecution of the war. They were supported in their efforts by the patriotic spirit of the British people. The sentiments of the nation had been divided, respecting the merits of the existing contest; but the principles, on which it had been commenced, began to recede from their view, when they perceived the distress in which the kingdom was likely to be involved, by the disasters in America, and the threatened warfare with the house of Bourbon. The towns of Liverpool and Manchester first testified their loyalty, by offering to raise a regiment of 1000 men each; notwithstanding the failure of an attempt to obtain the sanction of the city of London, an association of the minority was immediately formed, for the support of the king and government; the cities of Edinburgh and Glasgow formed each a regiment, and a considerable number of Scottish troops were embodied by means of subscriptions in England and Wales.

DURING a very animated debate in the house of lords, on the state of the nation, the earl of Chatham, whose vigorous mind, on so momentous an occasion, endeavoured to shake off the pressure of bodily infirmities, having spoken with a vehemence proportioned to his enthusiasm, was suddenly seized with a fainting fit, which he survived but a short time. On the 11th of May this truly great man resigned his breath, in the 60th year of his age.

England has not less reason to exult in having produced a Pitt, than in giving birth to a Milton, or a Newton; his genius, like theirs, being great and original. Nature had endowed him with every bodily and mental qualification of the perfect orator; a graceful figure, a piercing eye, a voice strong and clear, which, in every variety of cadence, was harmonious and insinuating. Born to act, as well as to harangue, every department of government felt his renovating influence. When he withdrew from power, the instance which he gave of incorruptible integrity consummated his character; he delivered into the treasury a very large sum of money, of which he was exempted from rendering any account, having officially received it for the secret service of the state, a purpose to which it had not been found necessary to apply it. Such was the effect of his spirit and his sagacity, that the houses of Austria and Bourbon trembled at his name. In testimony of the reverence borne to his memory, and their sense of his exemplary services, the house of commons voted, that the expence of his burial should be defrayed by the public, and that a monument should be erected to his memory in the collegiate church of St. Peter, Westminster. An annuity of £4000 a year was annexed to the earldom of Chatham, and the sum of £20,000 was voted for the discharge of his debts.

About the same time that the subject of the duke of Richmond's motion was discussed in the house of peers, and eventually rejected, lord Nugent moved for the appointment of a committee of the whole house, to consider the trade of Ireland. This he introduced by a representation of the distress of that kingdom, in consequence of the war. His proposition was assented to. But although no one doubted of the fact upon which it was grounded, yet the advantages proposed to be given to the Irish trade and manufactures were strenuously opposed by the English manufacturers, who would have been prejudiced by them. And the result was, that only some small advantage was given to the linen trade. Yet the motion may be considered of considerable national benefit, as a prelude to the acts which were afterwards passed in favour of Ireland.

This was followed by a motion, made by sir George Saville, in which every liberal mind was interested, for the repeal of certain penalties and disabilities laid on Roman catholics, by an act of king William to prevent the growth of popery. When a provision is made for the public peace and safety, at the expence of the comfort of individuals, or distinct bodies of men in a state, it is cruel to continue them any longer than the occasion that gave rise to them exists. This sentiment so universally prevailed, that the motion was received by general approbation; and a bill for the repeal of the act was unanimously passed; by which a considerable body of peaceable citizens were restored to social comfort and security, on their submitting to a test, by which they engaged to support the civil government by law established.

Among the proceedings of this session, was an act to enable his majesty to make a suitable provision for his younger children, out of the hereditary revenues of the crown.

When these acts had received the royal sanction, his majesty, having thanked the two houses for the zeal which they had manifested in support of the dignity of the crown, and the true interests of the nation, prorogued the parliament.

At no period was the zeal of the British nation more necessary, to defend the kingdom, and preserve the monarchy from ruin, than the present. For, with all the dangers and difficulties which had attended former contests with the house of Bourbon, the state had now to maintain a war with those provinces, from which it had before derived great part of its strength and resources. To avert these complicated evils, the premier's conciliatory bills had been passed; and the commissioners, appointed by virtue of them, had sailed for America in the month of April. Unfortunately the olive branch was presented too late. The proposals which they offered to the congress, on their arrival in the Delaware, in the month of June, it was thought, would have been joyfully embraced by a great majority of the provinces, had they been brought forward at an earlier period; the terms were indeed more advantageous to the provinces than those which they had themselves petitioned. Among these was an engagement, "That no military force should be kept up in America, without consent of the congress, and of the several assemblies; to admit of representatives from the several states, who should have a seat and voice in the parliament of Great Britain; to establish a freedom of legislation and internal government, comprehending every privilege short of total separation of interests, or consistent with that union of force, on which the safety of the common religion and liberty depends." But these not being received till a month after the arrival of Silas Deane, with the treaties of alliance and commerce which the states had signed with France, on the footing of independency, the congress absolutely refused to treat as dependent states; they resented the 1777. disrespectful manner in which their ally was spoken of; and they, in fine, declared as a proof of their inclination to peace, that they were ready to enter upon a consideration of a treaty of peace and commerce, not inconsistent with treaties already subsisting, when the king of Great Britain would demonstrate a sincere disposition for that purpose; but that the only solid proof of such a disposition would be an explicit acknowledgment of their independence, or the withdrawing of his fleets and armies. This answer, delivered by Mr. Laurens, president of the congress, precluding the possibility of a treaty, upon terms compatible with the interests of Great Britain, no proceedings between that body and the commissioners were commenced. An attempt was made to open a correspondence with some members of it, as individuals, which failed of success. On which the commissioners issued an address to the people at large, which only served to irritate the congress, and draw from it a defiance, expressive of indignation; after which they took their departure for England. Such was the issue of this embassy, and the termination of the connexion between Great Britain and her American provinces; distressful and mortifying in itself, and rendered more so to the British government, by a reflection, that, far from having been beyond the reach of human foresight, it had been repeatedly foretold; and that they had themselves been the instruments of accomplishing the favourite object of their enemies, by disengaging the colonies from their dependency on Great Britain.

The decision of the contest was now finally referred to the sword, and the narrative of military occurrences will be uninterrupted by the record of conciliatory transactions. From the time when the two armies went into winter-quarters, no signal event had taken place, till the resignation of general Howe, in the month of May. He had, some time 1778. before, expressed an intention to retire, assigning as his reason, that he did not enjoy the necessary support and confidence of his superiors. By his own desire he now laid down the command in chief, and was succeeded by sir Henry Clinton.

If the service of sir William Howe was painful, that of his successor was much more so. He came to the command at a time when the officers and men were disheartened by the symptoms of weakness which the government had discovered, in an offer to concede nearly all for which they had contended; when the spirits of the loyal Americans were sunk in despair, and those of the strenuous republicans were elated with success; and when it was found necessary to enter on his command with an abandonment of all the designs planned in the late campaign. It was expedient to yield to existing circumstances. Philadelphia, which had been chosen for its central situation, whither the royalists might most conveniently repair to the royal standard, and whence detachments might easily be made to annoy the revolters, became dangerous, when a powerful maritime state had declared for their enemy, who might send a strong fleet to block up the Delaware. It was determined, therefore, to march back to New York, that they might be better supported by the British fleet; and, under its protection, might be properly supplied with provisions and military stores.

While these arrangements were projected in the military department, it became necessary to select some naval commander, of tried valour and long experience, to whom the government might entrust the fleet, which was to be opposed to that of France in the European seas. These qualities, which had gained him the warm esteem of all ranks in the navy, pointed out admiral Keppel for that important service. He was one of the oldest officers in the navy, and had seen a greater variety of service than any other man in it. When not more than fourteen years of age, he accompanied commodore Anson, in his voyage round the world; and, in the last war, had rendered himself conspicuous for his gallantry and success in Europe, Africa, and America. A noble descent, an ample fortune, and personal merit were united in this commander; but, as a senator, he had declared his dislike of the American war, and had arraigned the conduct of the admiralty-board, in not rendering the naval force of the kingdom more powerful and effectual, to awe its enemies. The exigence of the times required, however, that ministers should seek the assistance of those whom they could not call their friends, and the king himself therefore proffered him the command. The admiral declared his readiness to serve his king and country, but disclaimed all acquaintance with official men; and, as he received his command immediately from his majesty, he threw himself upon his majesty's gracious support and protection.

When Keppel arrived at Portsmouth, to take upon him the command of the grand fleet, he found that there were only six sail of the line which were in any degree of condition for immediate service, and a great deficiency in sailors, as well as in all kinds of naval stores. His applications to the admiralty-board caused uncommon exertions to be made; and by the beginning of June he put to sea, with a fleet, consisting of twenty sail of the line and three frigates. He soon after fell in with two French frigates, which he captured, although the situation of the two nations, with respect to each other, was that neither of war nor peace. By the papers found on board these prizes, he first learned, that thirty-two sail of the line and ten frigates were then lying at anchor n Brest water, preparing to put to sea. This superiority of force determined him to return into port for a reinforcement. He might certainly have kept the sea, without being compelled to fight upon such unequal terms; and to save the appearance of a retreat is ever to be wished. On the 9th of July, the admiral commanded thirty sail of the line, with which he went in search of the French fleet, which had only quitted their harbour the day before, under the command of count D'Orvilliers. In the afternoon of the 23rd, the two fleets came in sight of each other. The French had the wind; so that they might choose whether to fight or avoid it. The line of battle was formed by the British fleet; but no action took place. The next day, two ships of the French fleet, the one of 80, the other of 64 guns, were so separated, that their admiral was compelled to bear down and attack the British, if he meant to rejoin them; but so reluctant was he to risk the fate of a battle, that he rather chose to suffer that diminution of his force, than regain it upon such conditions. Keppel inferred from this apparent backwardness, that the enemy expected a reinforcement; he therefore redoubled his efforts to bring on an engagement; and, as sailing in a regular line of battle would have retarded the progress of his fleet, he threw out signals for chasing. The two fleets were employed, the one in retreating, the other in pursuing, until the 27th, when a sudden squall intercepted them from the sight of each other. The weather, however, very soon cleared up, and discovered the enemy formed in line of battle; and, as the French, by a sudden shift of the wind, had the advantage of the weathergage, they bore down on the headmost ships of the British fleet, and discharged their broadsides. The two fleets, sailing upon different tacks, maintained a running fight, within pistol-shot of each other, for nearly two hours, and the action was closed between one and two o'clock in the afternoon.

Nineteen years were now almost completed, since the force of the two rival nations had contended on the ocean; and it appeared in the course of this day's action, that the French had greatly improved, during that time, both in the manner of working their ships, and discharging the guns; in consequence of which, the British fleet sustained considerable damage in this passing conflict. The English behaved with their wonted bravery, and did great execution on the enemy; but still the contest remained to be decided by a close and general action, and Keppel afterwards declared, that at the time he wore his ship, and laid her head towards the enemy, he thought it would have been a proud day for England. Three hours were employed in repairing the damage which the fleet had sustained, and some ships in the rear division fell so much out of their course, as to be in danger of being cut off. D'Orvilliers saw the opportunity, and threw out a signal to the duke de Chartres, who commanded the French rear, to bear down; but the order not being immediately understood, the British admiral had time to interpose for their relief.

Sir Hugh Palliser, vice-admiral of the blue, who commanded the rear division, had formed the line of battle by three o'clock, and in the position which the British fleet then kept, his ships composed the van; sir Robert Harland's division, which properly formed the van, being now in the rear. The commander-in-chief, solicitous to renew the fight, threw out signals for his rear and van to take their proper stations. This was immediately performed by sir Robert Harland's division; but the rear-admiral of the blue paid no attention to the signal which was flying, and although captain Windsor, in the Fox frigate, was sent with express orders for the vice-admiral to bear down into his admiral's wake, yet no effort was made for that purpose; in consequence of which, the night came on before the British fleet was formed.

The French had a peculiar method of repeating signals at night, by means of rockets and explosions of gunpowder; these were discernible until day-break, but when light returned, the French fleet was only visible from the mast head. Keppel did not think proper to pursue them; but, as soon as every ship had entirely disappeared, he directed his course homeward, in order to repair his crippled ships, and to be, as soon as possible, in a condition to meet the enemy again. However justifiable the motives for this conduct might be, it furnished the enemy with a colourable pretext to boast of a victory, and gave the other states of Europe an unfavourable idea of British prowess, of which they had entertained so exalted a sentiment, that a drawn battle, between two fleets of equal force, was considered as highly disgraceful. The reasons assigned by the commander-in-chief for this conduct were, that a strong wind blew directly into the harbour of Brest, under favour of which the French fleet was able to enter that harbour before he could possibly have come up with them; and the shattered condition of many of the ships under his command would have exposed them to imminent hazard from a lee shore. This indecisive action was fought in lat. 48° 38′ ushant distant, 27 leagues east half south.

When the transactions of this day came to be canvassed, the commander-in-chief was distinguished by the particular notice of those ministerial agents, whose business it is to hunt down characters in the public prints. They placed him as a mark, at which their envenomed shafts were aimed. The moderation he had shewn, in screening the misconduct of the officer who commanded his rear, and the favourable manner in which he had spoken of that officer's behaviour, in his letter to the secretary of the admiralty, were certainly not to be justified on the principle of strict discipline, which is essential to the public service. This sacrifice of his duty he had been tempted to make, to the remembrance of a long subsisting friendship, which, however, had been in its wane. Had Keppel, immediately upon his orders being disobeyed, put the delinquent under an arrest, and brought the whole transaction before a court martial, with a rigid but warrantable austerity, the alarm which such a spirited conduct would have spread in the navy, and throughout the nation, would not have been so violent, nor its consequences so fatal, as those which were actually experienced.

Admiral Keppel sailed again on the 23rd of August, with sir Robert Harland and sir Hugh Palliser, second and third in command, and being joined some time after by three line of battle ships, his force then consisted of thirty-one sail of the line. The French fleet left their harbour five days before, but shaping their course to the south-westward, effectually avoided a second action; but, however, the trade of France, by this manœuvre, was left defenceless, and several West India-men, bound to Nantes and Bourdeaux, were captured, and three East Indiamen were made prizes to two ships of war and a king's frigate, whilst our own trade arrived from every quarter of the world, safe and unannoyed.

When the approach of winter caused the grand fleet to return home from its second cruise, the admiral was received by his sovereign, with every mark of satisfaction and regard, whilst the first lord of the treasury was in no respect backward in his professions of good-will and esteem. At length, however, the never-ceasing buzz of paragraph writers excited the nation to discontent. The people always expect some decisive consequences, when two fleets or two armies engage; and although that expectation is continually disappointed by the event, yet its impatience is in no degree abated. Sir George Pococke, during the last war, thrice fought and worsted the French fleet in the East Indies, without a single ship being sunk or captured on either side.

But to return to our operations in America.

The whole army passed the Delaware on the 18th of June, 1778. The only road by which the baggage and stores could proceed to New York was narrow, so that the waggons, artillery, and camp-equipage extended twelve miles; notwithstanding which, the general found means to defend the whole from all attempts made by Washington and his army. A large body of Americans, commanded by general Lee, was driven back, and, if the intense heat of the day had not put an end to pursuit, the royal army would have obtained a very decisive advantage; but being thus impeded, the action was memorable only from the circumstance of 59 soldiers having expired through excessive heat and fatigue, without receiving a wound. The American accounts represent the fortune of the day as having been reversed by the misconduct of general Lee, and assert, that if he had acted with spirit, a very capital advantage would have been gained over the royal army. That officer was afterwards tried by a court-martial on several charges, and dismissed the service. The marquis de la Fayette distinguished himself in this action.

THE judicious manner in which sir Henry Clinton conducted this retreat of the confederate army received great applause; it is perhaps his most distinguished achievement. His whole force did not reach Sandy Hook until the 1st of July, so that a fortnight elapsed, from leaving Philadelphia to the arrival of the army at New York. If such were the impediments and dangers in traversing this country, with an enemy hanging on their rear, it is obvious to infer, that sir William Howe was perfectly right in not attempting to penetrate by that route, when Washington was prepared to dispute every inch of ground, and the British general must have driven the enemy before him through the whole progress; a situation much more embarrassing than merely to repel his attacks.

THE abandonment of Philadelphia was rendered necessary by the approach of the count d'Estaing's fleet to the American coasts. Interest and ambition will frequently lead men to assume the semblance of generosity; but that government, which was then actually exercising the most unfeeling severity on the brave Corsicans, because their stubborn nature could not be brought to yield obedience to a foreign yoke, should have little credit given to it on the score of motive, in the relief which it now sent to America. Tempests, which had dispersed and shattered admiral Byron's fleet, had only retarded that of d'Estaing, so that he arrived in full force at the mouth of the Delaware the latter end of June, only three days after lord Howe had sailed from thence for New York. The British naval force was so inferior to that of the enemy, that the consequences of his arrival, a few days sooner, might have been very fatal. The Americans masters of Philadelphia; sir Henry Clinton's army on its march; and only sixty four gun ships, three fifties, and two forties, to make head against eleven ships of the line, of which one carried 90 guns, another 80, six 74, and three 64, besides which there were a 50 gun ship and three large frigates; neither superior bravery nor skill, although exercised in their fullest extent, seemed capable of extricating such a fleet from such a situation. The French admiral, thus disappointed, in not meeting his enemy in the spot most favourable to his designs, sought him in his more defensible post. Lord Howe, who possessed every qualification of a naval commander, in a very eminent degree, made great use of a very short space of time, in protecting his ships in the harbour. The ardour, activity, and undaunted firmness, discovered by all ranks on this trying occasion, presaged a favourable termination of the conflict.

D'ESTAING, on the 11th of July, appeared in sight of the British fleet at Sandy Hook. His force consisted of twelve sail of the line, and three frigates. The English fleet was somewhat inferior. D'Estaing, designing to attack the British fleet in the harbour, cast anchor on the Jersey side, about four miles from the Hook. The British sailors had the mortification to see their fleet blocked up in their own harbour for eleven days, and the French flag flying without. On the 22nd of July, however, the French admiral set sail, and concerted measures with general Sullivan for the reduction of Rhode Island. The latter was to invade the island on its north end, from the continent, while the former entered the isle of Newport, and thus enclosed the British troops on every side. Lord Howe, as soon as he received intelligence of the danger of Rhode Island, set sail to relieve it; but, from unavoidable delays, did not arrive until the day after the French had entered the harbour.

The two fleets stood out to sea; but were prevented from fighting by a violent tempest, which separated the ships of both squadrons, and threatened their destruction. D'Estaing took refuge in Boston, and Howe at New York. The British fleet being strengthened by the arrival of seven ships, lord Howe put to sea again; but no memorable action occurred in this quarter, during the remainder of the campaign, at the close of which his lordship left the command to admiral Gambier.

It being too late to enter upon any new plan of operations, the commander-in-chief contented himself with distressing his enemy. About the same time, the army of general Knyphausen was so posted, relatively to that of lord Cornwallis, that, being only separated by the North river, they could unite their forces within 24 hours, while they prevented the separated strength of general Washington from uniting in less than eight or ten days.

Even the cruelties of the preceding year were far exceeded by the outrages, against all the feelings of humanity, committed by colonel Butler, a ferocious Indian agent and commander, who was now destined to bring disgrace on the British arms. The object of his warfare, in which he was associated with Brandt, a half Indian by blood, was the fertile and flourishing settlement of Wyoming, on the Susquehana, which has been immortalized by the strains of the poet Campbell, in his Gertrude, and whose remoteness from the seat of war might have been expected to secure the inhabitants from its calamities. Against this peaceful and happy district, consisting of eight townships, each five miles square, these savage hell-hounds were dispatched, at the head of 1600 men, a part of whom were Indians At their approach, the governor of Kingston, a fort which was the chief defence of the settlement, desired a parley with Butler. This was acceded to; but, that treachery might not be wanting to complete the crimes of these commanders, when he repaired to the place appointed, and expected to have entered into a conference, he, and the body of men who attended him as his guard, were suddenly surrounded by their enemy, the greater part of them were cut off, and the governor narrowly escaped with his life. The commandant of the fort, in the absence of the governor, then desired to know what terms of surrender would be granted him; to which Butler laconically answered, The hatchet. The garrison were soon made acquainted with their fate. Some of them were carried away alive; but the barbarous conquerors, to save the trouble of murder in detail, shut up the greater part promiscuously in the houses and barracks, and, setting them on fire, they enjoyed the savage pleasure of beholding the whole consumed in one general blaze. A dreadful scene of havoc and barbarity then ensued throughout all the townships. The inhabitants were massacred, the standing corn was destroyed, the houses were set on fire, and, in a short time, one of the most prosperous settlements in America presented nothing to view but a desolate waste, the wreck of those beauties which the cultivated face of nature had formerly exhibited.

It is a relief to revert our attention from these and similar enormities, to the regular operations of honourable warfare. The intervention of France had rendered the defence of the West Indies an object of the highest importance. The commander-in-chief, when informed that Dominique had been reduced, and that Bouillé, after effecting that conquest, was preparing, with the aid of d'Estaing's fleet, for further victories, dispatched generals Grant and Meadows, with 5000 troops, under a convoy of commodore Hotham's squadron, to guard the British West India islands, and annoy those of the enemy. They proceeded to make a descent on the island of St. Lucie, and in a short time obtained possession of the strong posts intended to secure the Careenage, and the Cul de Sac, two of the three bays by which the island is indented. The ensuing day, d'Estaing arrived off the island, with a fleet of twelve ships of the line, and 9000 troops on board, elated with the hope of success against a fleet so far inferior as that of Barrington, which consisted of no more than three ships of the line, and three of 50 guns. On the enemy's approach, he warped his transport vessels, laden with stores, into the Cul de Sac, and stationed his ships in a line, to guard its entrance. Thus circumstanced, he was twice attacked by the superior force of his enemy, and as often gave them a repulse. D'Estaing then determined to try his fortune by land. Having disembarked his troops, he proceeded with 5000 men, commanded, under himself, by de Bouillé and and count Louendahl, to an attack on general

Meadows, who was posted, with 1500 men, to defend the peninsula of La Vierge. Their onset was made with characteristic impetuosity; but they were received with such bravery, and invincible firmness, that they were repulsed with great loss, after three furious assaults. A few days after, d'Estaing re-embarked his troops, and the governor capitulated.

Early in the year an expedition was undertaken, by a squadron under the marquis de Vaudreuil, and a body of troops under the duke de Lausun, against the British settlements on the African coast; and these commanders made an easy conquest of the factories at Senegal and in the river Gambia. This event was followed by an enterprise of greater importance. The reduction of Jersey was undertaken by 3000 men, under the command of the prince of Nassau-Siegen. But they were so warmly received by a single regiment stationed there, that they deemed it expedient to retire after a faint attempt. A descent, at the same time, was threatened on the coasts of England and Ireland, and the combined fleets of France and Spain appeared in the Channel. But on the appearance of sir Charles Hardy, with an inferior force, their demonstrations ended in a fruitless gasconnade.

It has already been remarked, with what successful assiduity admiral Keppel had been traduced in the public prints; at length those newspapers, which served as vehicles for anti-ministerial doctrines, could no longer forbear acting in their vocation, and accordingly took up the other side of the question, so that the conduct of sir Hugh Palliser was brought under discussion, with no more delicacy than had been shewn to his superior officer. During this reciprocation of slander, an anonymous letter was inserted, which was neither scurrilous nor misleading; it stated the transactions of that day fairly, and drew just and obvious conclusions, which indeed conveyed an implied censure on the vice-admiral of the blue. Sir Hugh Palliser applied to admiral Keppel, requiring him to contradict the facts advanced in that paper. The admiral declared his total ignorance of it or its author, but that he could not consider himself under any obligations to confute an anonymous writer; especially as he had not thought it worth while to take notice of any, among the numerous attacks which had been made upon himself. In a few days after, sir Hugh Palliser published in the newspapers his state of facts, which bore hard on the conduct of his superior officer; and to this piece he signed his name.

This procedure caused the matter to be agitated in the house of commons, and a member moved to address his majesty, to bring sir Hugh Palliser to trial; which was then over-ruled, but not rejected. Before this proposition was resumed, sir Hugh Palliser preferred to the board of admiralty five articles of accusation, or specific charges against admiral Keppel, for his conduct on the 27th of July, and demanded a court-martial to be held upon that officer. The admiralty-board were far from hesitating to comply with a requisition, which affected the life of the most respectable commander then in the service, and who, during forty years, had acquired the respect, esteem, and love of the navy; without adverting to the suspicious appearance which this conduct bore, of being dictated by personal resentment, from the length of time which had elapsed, between the transaction on which it was stated, and the charges produced; without being withheld by the consideration of the vast injury which such a step must inevitably produce to the public service, not only by encouraging a captious humour towards superior officers, but by introducing divisions and animosities into the navy, at a time when the salvation of the nation depended upon the united exertions of that body of men; and, finally, without regarding the act of indelicacy, in giving countenance to a member of their own board, in his attack upon one in every respect whatever his superior, whilst the accuser might be supposed to have taken this step for the purpose of screening himself. Uninfluenced by any or all of those motives, they suffered an ill-founded plea of official duty to varnish over their prompt alacrity, and immediately sent a copy of the charges to the accused admiral, accompanied with a notice for him to prepare for his speedy trial. Such a conduct spread disgust through the navy, and no less than twelve admirals, at the head of whom appeared the respectable name of lord Hawke, signed a memorial, which was presented to his majesty, in which they founded their complaints against the conduct of the board of admiralty upon the grounds above stated.

A COURT-MARTIAL was accordingly appointed to be held on board the Britannia, in Portsmouth harbour; but, in consequence of the admiral's ill state of health, an act of parliament was passed, empowering the lords of the admiralty to order it to be held on shore; from the ship it was therefore adjourned to the governor's house at Portsmouth, and began on the 8th of January. On the 11th of February, the thirty-second day of the trial, the court, having heard the evidence and the prisoner's defence, were of opinion, that "the charge was malicious and ill-founded, it having appeared that the admiral, so far from having, by misconduct and neglect of duty, lost an opportunity of rendering essential service to the state, or tarnished the lustre of the British navy, behaved as a judicious, brave, and experienced officer. The court, therefore, unanimously and honourably acquitted the said admiral Augustus Keppel, of the several articles contained in the charge against him." Sir Thomas Pye, the president, on delivering to admiral Keppel his sword, addressed him in the following words:—Admiral Keppel, it is no small pleasure for me to receive the commands of the court, that, in delivering your sword, I am to congratulate you on its being restored to you with so much honour, hoping, ere long, you will be called forth by your sovereign, to draw it once more in defence of your country,

IMMEDIATELY upon the acquittal of admiral Keppel, the houses of parliament voted him their thanks, for his gallant conduct on the 27th of July. Soon after, sir Hugh Palliser resigned his seat at the board of admiralty, gave up his posts of lieutenant-general of marines, and governor of Scarborough castle, and vacated his seat in parliament, retaining only his rank of vice-admiral of the blue, which he continued to hold as a qualification for his trial by a court-martial. Besides the honours and authority annexed to these distinctions, he gave up an income of £4000 per annum. Many circumstances were stated in evidence, which tended to criminate the accuser; the lords of the admiralty, therefore, issued orders for a court-martial to be held on sir Hugh Palliser, which began to sit, on board the Sandwich, in Portsmouth harbour, on the 12th of April. The trial continued till the 5th day of May, when, all the witnesses having been examined, and sir Hugh Palliser having made his defence, the court proceeded to deliver their opinion, which was, "that the behaviour of the vice-admiral, on the 27th and 28th days of July, was in many instances most meritorious and exemplary, but that he was blameable for not making known to the admiral the distressing situation of his ship; yet, as he was censurable for no other part of his conduct, the court are of opinion that he ought, notwithstanding that, to be acquitted, and he is acquitted accordingly." Vice-admiral Darby, the president, then delivered sir Hugh Palliser his sword, with this short address: Sir, I am directed by the court to return you your sword.

ON the 17th of June, the minister laid a message before the house, intimating that the ambassador of the king of Spain, having delivered a paper to lord Weymouth, signifying, that he had received orders from his court immediately to withdraw from this country; his majesty had thought proper to recal his ambassador from Madrid. Though much blame was, in consequence of this message, thrown upon the ministry for want of information, an animated address was unanimously voted, assuring his majesty of the strenuous support of the legislature, in the war in which he was engaged.

AMIDST the evils of foreign war, violent tumults were occasioned in Scotland, by the repeal of the laws against Roman catholics; and that country was once more convulsed by the harangues and writings of a set of fiery zealots, who filled the people with apprehensions of danger to the established church, from the possible extension of the acts to that kingdom. The cities of Edinburgh and Glasgow presented scenes of the most horrid outrage, which continued till an armed force was called to the aid of the civil magistrate, and the minds of the people were pacified by an assurance from the lord provost, that no repeal of the penal statutes against the catholics should take place.

VIOLENT as these proceedings in Scotland were, the state of Ireland was still more alarming. The disorders in the former country arose from temporary circumstances, which could be easily removed; whereas the symptoms of disaffection which discovered themselves in the latter arose from more permanent causes, which were rooted in the minds of the people, and could not be removed without sacrificing other interests, and incurring other difficulties and dangers. This country had felt the ill-consequences arising from the war, in several different ways. Its manufactures were decreased; the expence of ordinary subsistence was enhanced; and, what greatly aggravated these evils to a considerable part of the nation, an embargo was laid on the export of beef and butter, in order to distress our enemy, without having the desired effect. Some small commercial privileges had been granted them; but these were so inadequate to their grievances, that they were considered rather as mockeries of their distress, than as an effectual remedy. The most considerate persons in England, as well as Ireland, when they perceived the misery and discontent that prevailed, recommended, that every reasonable requisition of the Irish nation should be complied with; that they should be admitted to an union of interests and a participation of benefits with Great Britain, as the only means of concentrating our strength in this crisis of danger, and preventing these malcontents from following the example of the American colonists. It was not a time, they thought, to hazard the loss of this kingdom, when we had already lost our provinces, and Ireland was at this instant threatened with an invasion by the combined fleets of France and Spain. And they insisted, that to conciliate the attachment of this nation, by liberal treatment, was the wisest policy that the government could pursue, and would tend eventually to the benefit of Great Britain, by increasing the affluence of Ireland, and its demands from the sister-kingdom. On the other hand, it was said that the grievances of the Irish were exaggerated; that they only shared in the distresses of England and Scotland; and that, should we relieve the Irish manufacturers, at the expence of the British, we should incur the danger of rebellion in one country, whilst we averted it in the other.

When the advocates of the distressed people found that their reasonings were of no avail, different means were adopted for procuring redress. Agreements were entered into by an association formed in the city of Dublin, not to import or wear any English manufactures, which could be manufactured in Ireland, till an enlightened policy, founded upon principles of justice, shall appear to actuate the inhabitants of certain manufacturing towns of Great Britain, who have taken so active a part in opposing the regulations proposed in favour of the trade of Ireland; that they appear to entertain sentiments of respect and affection for their fellow-subjects of this kingdom. This example was followed by the city of Waterford. And when the nation at large were informed, that their interests had been discussed by the English parliament, and that nothing effectual was done for removing their grievances, finding that redress must come from themselves, they entered into similar associations throughout the kingdom.

These were not the only alarming proceedings of the Irish nation. When the combined fleet was cruising in the Channel, military associations were formed, "for the purpose of defending their country against foreign enemies, and their rights against what they thought domestic usurpation;" they declared themselves to be loyal to their king, and affectionate to Great Britain; "but it was with such loyalty and affection, as consisted with their own liberty and prosperity." Twenty thousand volunteers were instantly enrolled; and their standard seemed to be upheld, not by any particular party, but by men of all ranks, descriptions, and political principles. Their appearance was rendered more formidable by that deliberate temper and firmness, which were displayed in all their proceedings.

The government now perceived, that it was absolutely necessary to adopt effectual measures for redressing the grievances of this nation. As a precaution, to prevent the ill-consequences apprehended from the associations, they wisely endeavoured to conciliate the attachment of the associates, by giving them the approbation of the state, that they might appear to act under its authority. On the meeting of the Irish parliament, in the autumn, the patriots declared, that nothing less than a free and unlimited trade could save their country from ruin. Nor were their requisitions any longer fruitless. In so important a light were the affairs of this kingdom seen, that they became the primary object of the English parliament, which met soon after. The earl of Shelburne, deeply interested in its welfare, moved for a vote of censure against the minister, for not having taken effectual measures for its relief, in consequence of an address presented to his majesty in the preceding session. Lord Ossory made a similar motion in the house of commons. And the minister at last found it expedient to bring forward his proposition for the relief of Ireland.

1. A REPEAL of the laws which prohibited the exportation of Irish manufactures, made of or mixed with wool, to any part of Europe.

2. A REPEAL of an act of the late reign, which prohibited the importation of glass into Ireland, except of British manufacture, or the export of glass from Ireland.

3. THAT Ireland be suffered to carry on a trade of export and import, to and from the British colonies in America and the West Indies, and her settlements on the coast of Africa, subject to such limitations, restrictions, and duties, as the parliament of Ireland shall impose.

BILLS, founded on the two former propositions, were brought in and immediately passed. And another on the third, which liberally admitted the Irish to a participation of the chief branches of our foreign trade, was passed, after some deliberation, early in the ensuing year; Ireland being, at the same time, subjected to such an increase of taxes as was deemed reasonable, in consequence of this enlargement of its privileges.

THE operations in America contributed to prolong, rather than to decide the contest. In the beginning of May, sir Henry Clinton, with sir George Collier, commander of the marine at New York, formed a plan for an expedition to the Chesapeak, and a descent upon Virginia. The naval and land forces were commanded by sir George Collier and major-general Matthews. Sir George, having passed by the capes of Virginia, left part of the fleet in Hampton road, to block up that port, and proceeded himself, with the smaller ships of war and transports, up Elizabeth river. Not only Portsmouth but Norfolk fell into the hands of these troops. The fleet and army carried destruction wherever they went, and took great quantities of stores and provisions, designed for Washington's army. When the commanders of this expedition had done great injury to the shipping of the provincials, and destroyed fort George, with the store-houses and dock-yards, they returned to New York, where they arrived at the beginning of June, and joined a body of troops under the command of major-general Vaughan, in an expedition up the North river. The naval department continued under the direction of sir George Collier. Their enterprise was unproductive of important consequences, and after having destroyed a few insignificant forts and fortified places, they were ordered to return. It now became the wish of general Clinton to bring Washington to an engagement; an attempt of great difficulty, as the latter had fortified himself on the high mountainous posts, surrounding Verplanks and Stoney Point, and on both sides of the North river.

IN the mean time, the American general Wayne attacked, with great skill, and took Stoney Point, with above 500 prisoners in the garrison. This place being gained, the victor directed his artillery against Verplanks, which obliged the shipping to cut their cables, and fall down the river. The news of this unexpected disaster caused general Clinton to advance, with the main army, to Dobb's ferry, while sir George Collier, with the fleet, proceeded up the river. Stoney Point was easily regained, as general Washington declined a general engagement for his relief, and sir George Collier proceeded to the deliverance of a party of the king's troops, who were besieged in a fort on the Penobsot, in the eastern confines of New England. When the reinforcements appeared, the Americans made a precipitate retreat. Sir George chased the provincial ships which lay before the fort, and took nine fine frigates. Twenty-four sail of transports were, at the same time, destroyed, and some store-ships captured.

ADMIRAL Byron assumed the command, after the surrender of St. Lucia to admiral Barrington, and their squadron being now superior to that of d'Estaing, they endeavoured to draw him from Port Royal, by challenging an engagement, but in vain. Admiral Byron, being soon after informed of an intended reinforcement of d'Estaing's fleet, and aware that a large fleet of merchant-ships was waiting for convoy at St. Kitt's, judged it necessary to convoy the merchant-men, for the greater part of the way, with his whole fleet. As soon as he departed, 150 Frenchmen from Martinique landed, and took St. Vincent's; and, though the garrison exceeded the number of invaders, the latter carried their design into execution without firing a single shot. After this exploit, M. d'Estaing, being joined by M. de la Motte, with a supply of troops, stores, and provisions, appeared off the isle of Grenada, on the 2nd of July, with a fleet of 26 sail of the line, besides frigates, and near 10,000 land forces. To this superior force lord Macartney was obliged to yield; but the insulting terms of capitulation offered by d'Estaing disgraced him as a man and a soldier. Rather than submit to them, the garrison surrendered at discretion, and were taught by their future treatment, that they had fallen into the hands of a commander, equally destitute of compassion and magnanimity.

Admiral Byron, on his return, being informed of the success of the enemy, set sail with 21 sail of the line and several transports, and, on the 6th of July, came within sight of the French fleet. About half past seven, the action was commenced by admiral Barrington, in the Prince of Wales, and the captains Sawyer and Gardner, in the Boyne and Sultan; these ships closed with the van of the enemy, and with incredible resolution sustained the fire of that division, but with great damage and loss of men. Similar encounters took place at different times, but Byron failed in bringing the enemy to a decisive engagement; and having learned that the French had possessed themselves of Grenada, he directed his whole thoughts to the defence of his transports and troops. Though the British fleet was materially damaged, d'Estaing observed it with great indifference, and did not so much as interrupt the passage of the transports. This action indeed gave such a superiority to the French, as to strike an universal panic throughout our West India islands, which, however, d'Estaing confirmed no further than by appearing for a whole day, with his fleet, off St. Christopher's.

Having first convoyed the homeward-bound French West India ships till they were out of danger, d'Estaing meditated the destruction of general Prevost's force in Georgia, and, in conjunction with general Washington, an attack, both by sea and land, on the British forces at New York. General Prevost was at this time at Savannah. The principal division of his troops was at Port Royal, in South Carolina, and the difficulty with which this force could effect a junction with the general, rendered his danger very apparent.

The French landed at Beaulieu, about 13 miles from the town of Savannah, and the frigates approached as near the lines as they possibly could. On the 16th of September, d'Estaing sent a summons to the general, to surrender the place; a truce of 24 hours was agreed upon, during which colonel Maitland arrived, confirmed the garrison in their resolutions against a surrender, and inspired the whole with fresh hopes and spirits. D'Estaing, now joined by general Lincoln, prepared for a regular siege. About midnight, October the 3rd, the enemy began a very heavy bombardment, and the following day opened a cannonade with 37 pieces of heavy artillery. During this cannonade, which lasted five days, the distresses of the women and children became excessive, and greatly increased by the throwing in of carcasses. To alleviate this unnecessary, and, it was thought, avoidable calamity, general Prevost wrote a letter to d'Estaing, requesting that the women and children should be sent on board ships in the river, and placed under the protection of a French man of war, until the siege should end; but the request was shamefully refused.

A little before day-light, on the 9th of October, general Lincoln and M. d'Estaing attacked the British lines; as the firing became general, and as darkness obstructed observation, no change took place in the disposition of our troops. D'Estaing, with the principal troops selected from both armies, made his attack on the right, and supported it with considerable courage. A redoubt on the Ebenezer road was so obstinately defended by a colonel Taws, and a captain Wickham, that, after a most bloody conflict, in which Taws fell, the redoubt was totally cleared of the enemy, even although they had advanced so far as to plant two stand of colours in it; at 10 o'clock, a truce was demanded by the enemy, in order to bury the dead, and carry off the wounded, which was granted. The number killed and wounded, both French and Americans, was between 1000 and 1200. In a few days afterwards, upon the clearing up of a fog, it was discovered that the enemy had totally abandoned their camps; and d'Estaing, about the 1st of November, departed from the coast of America. In the whole of this campaign, d'Estaing exposed himself to censure; and, in particular, it was said, that in this last affair he ought to have proceeded with more vigour in the sap, and not to have lost time in regular approaches against field works. On his return to France he was received with coldness, and permitted to pass the remainder of his days in congenial inactivity.

CHAPTER XXVII.

GEORGE III.

[1780.]

Mr. Dunning's celebrated Motion—State of the Public Mind—Alarming and destructive Riots—Naval Exploits—Campaign in America—Trial and Execution of Major André as a Spy—War with Holland—Defeat of Colonel Baillie in India by Hyder Ali.

1780. AT the commencement of the session, the peculiar situation of the nation, and the evident imbecility of the minister, presented peculiar advantages to the friends of liberty, and to the efforts of opposition. Numerous petitions for œconomical reform had been presented from various parts of the kingdom, which were represented by some to convey the sense of the nation, and by others to be nothing more than the clamour of faction. The whole house was converted, (March 3rd) into a committee upon the subject of these petitions; and Mr. Dunning, in pursuance of the general desire of the minority, moved, as an introduction to other propositions connected with his plan of reform, that "the influence of the crown has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished." So general was the conviction of the fact, that, notwithstanding the minister opposed the motion with great ability, it was approved by a majority of eighteen members, of which number was the speaker himself. In this critical state of things, an illness, with which the speaker was seized, gave occasion for an adjournment; and, by affording time to those who had receded from the court party, to reconsider the merits and effects of the motion, produced another change in the balance of parties. Mr. Dunning, on the resumption of parliamentary business, proposed an address to his majesty, requesting that he would not dissolve the parliament, nor prorogue the session, till measures should be taken by that house to diminish the influence of the crown, and to correct the evils complained of in the petitions of the people. This motion was rejected, in a very full house, by a majority of fifty-one members; and the opposition was thus deprived of the fruits of its former victory.

WHILST the reformation of abuses in the state was so earnestly sought by all ranks of people throughout the kingdom, that some described the nation as having run mad about public virtue; as being actuated by an innovating spirit, which formed notions of ideal perfection; as cherishing causeless discontents, which inflamed to turbulence and dissention; an unlooked-for source of civil commotion produced the most alarming effects. The partial relief which had been rendered to the subjects of England who adhered to the Romish faith, had given no sort of offence to the nation; in Ireland, the principle had been adopted with great success, and no disgusts were testified by any class of the people. These appearances induced some leading men in Scotland to promise to use their interest in parliament, for the purpose of extending the relief to that country; but the design was no sooner named, than a few impetuous zealots, who were utterly unacquainted with the nature of the relief which was meant to be obtained, became alarmed at the danger to which they thought the protestant church was exposed, and made use of every method which a blind enthusiasm suggested, to inflame the people to the most violent resentments. Every active principle was employed in this cause, whilst no effectual means were used to counteract these designs, by representing to the people at large how groundless their apprehensions were, and that nothing more was meant to be done than to repeal an unjust law, which, by a strange concurrence of circumstances, had become a law contrary to the intentions even of its first framers, and that a great number of penal statutes against Roman catholics would still remain in force. It is highly becoming the leading and enlightened part of mankind, to make use of every means which argument, intermixed with good-humoured pleasantry, can supply, to remove any false notions which are likely to remain, to the disturbance of the public tranquillity. Of all mistakes, those which arise from a conscientious attachment to religious principles deserve the most assiduous endeavours to correct and confute them. The outrages which were committed in Edinburgh and Glasgow, early in the year 1779, on the houses and property of the Roman catholics; in consequence of the popular resentments having been excited against them by a variety of inflammatory pamphlets, which had been industriously circulated, would never have happened, if any portion of zeal had operated to the producing, and spreading widely, of well-written tracts, to disprove the assertions which had been so roundly and falsely made. But the weapons of reason are less frequently resorted to, for the purpose of suppressing a popular infatuation, than those forcible weapons, with which the state is armed; and the progression of discontent is seldom attended to, until the consequences of its maturity are felt.

From Scotland, this spirit of bitter enmity against the catholics passed into England, and caused a society to be formed under the title of The Protestant Association, which was composed of well-meaning but uninformed people, whose fears were excited, because they considered the principles of popery as increasing to an alarming pitch in this country, and that the design of the legislature was to patronise that religion. The aversion which British protestants discover to Roman catholics is uncommonly inveterate; it seems almost to have survived their religious principles. The Dutch, although they revolted from Spain, because they were cruelly persecuted as protestants, yet were so far from bearing an implacable enmity to the Romanists, that they allowed a general toleration; and the Roman catholics, to this day, are conspicuous in those states, both for the largeness of their numbers and the peaceableness of their demeanor. The Swiss cantons know no dissensions, because some are of the Romish persuasion, and others Calvinistical protestants. But the attempts which have been made in England, since the reformation was introduced into it, to render the religion of the church of Rome the national religion, and to exterminate or depress the reformed church, had established a hereditary antipathy, which is not yet extinct; insomuch, that the peaceable conduct of this body of men, for 120 years, has not been sufficient to expiate the misdeeds of a former race. It therefore became the indispensible duty of every man of influence to oppose to this popular prejudice the force of truth; but while a general supineness prevailed concerning the principles and conduct of this society, it increased in numbers and in zeal, under the influence of a president, whose violent and daring spirit qualified him for creating and leading a faction. This young nobleman was descended from one of the most antient and honourable families in Scotland, so that he might lay claim to popularity as a birthright, whilst a peculiar cast of character, which marked his whole deportment, drew the public attention; his singularities passed for marks of genius, and his dress and appearance, which seemed to have been copied from the age of puritanism, impressed the superficial multitude with a notion of the sanctity of his manners; although, under this disguise, his private life was not conspicuous for a single corresponding austerity. Through the influence of this reformer, a petition to the house of commons was drawn up, in the name of the society, praying the repeal of the act for the relief of Roman catholics, which was signed by vast numbers; to attend the delivery of which, all true protestants were invited by hand-bills, and advertisements in the newspapers, to assemble in St. George's Fields, and to distinguish themselves by wearing blue cockades in their hats, their champion, who was a member of the house, having declared, that he would not deliver their petition, unless he was attended by twenty thousand men; and a number not short of that were actually got together. Although it was not the intention of government to grant the prayer of the petition, yet it either did not apprehend, or did not choose to provide against, any consequences which might arise from the assembling of such a concourse of people. The behaviour of lord George Gordon, the popular leader of this multitude, which now beset the house of commons, and occupied every avenue to its entrance, tended greatly to exasperate and inflame his followers. Many of the lords received personal affronts and injuries in their way to the house of peers, and in the evening, the Romish chapels belonging to the Sardinian and Bavarian ambassadors were demolished and set on fire, although no proper objects of their resentment, because the obnoxious act of parliament no way affected them. The mounds of law and order being thus broken down, the dwelling-houses of the Roman catholics, in different parts of the town, were dismantled, and the furniture piled up in the street and burnt, whilst the dwellings were set on fire. The civil power was unable to prevent such outrages; and the few military which could be drawn out, acting under the command of the magistrates, were not effectually employed to suppress them. A wealthy and luxurious metropolis must harbour a number of desperate wretches, who are only awed by the scourge of the law, which is held over them, and would not fail to avail themselves of the suspension of legal authority, to commit the most atrocious crimes. These, being now collected, levelled their attacks against the places which they had most reason to dread; and the different jails were forced open, the prisoners set at liberty, and every thing consumed which was susceptible of the action of fire. The dwelling-houses of several justices of peace shared the same fate; and, as all authority and control was borne down, no limits could be set to the devastations which might follow. The destruction of the Bank of England was openly threatened, and the fate of the empire seemed to depend on the torches of a ruthless banditti.

Lord Sandwich had a very narrow escape as he was passing in his carriage to the house of lords. The same evening, after having burnt the house of justice Hyde, they proceeded to Newgate, in order to release their companions who had been imprisoned; the consequence was dreadful; in a few hours the flames were so general, that 300 prisoners were enabled to escape. The houses of the catholics in Devonshire Street, Red Lion Square, were destroyed; the house of justice Cox, in Great Queen Street, met the same doom; the doors of Clerkenwell prison were thrown open, and, after burning all the writings and valuable goods of sir John Fielding, the house of lord Mansfield, in Bloomsbury Square, was attacked. His lordship escaped through a back door; but the house, with his valuable collection of manuscripts, his library, &c. were totally consumed; a party of the guards fired once or twice, but without at all repressing the violence of the infatuated mob.

On Wednesday, the King's Bench and Fleet prisons, with the house of Mr. Langdale, an eminent distiller in Holborn, were marked for destruction; and as the evening approached, a scene presented itself, the outlines of which may be described, but the human imagination is incapable of conveying those sensations of horror, which filled the breasts of those who saw it. At the same instant, the King's Bench and Fleet prisons, New Bridewell, the toll-gates on Blackfriar's bridge, the large house at the bottom of Holborn, and various houses at other parts of the town, to the number of thirty-six, were seen in flames. Some wretches were burnt at the houses of distillers; the spirits were brought out in pail-fulls, and not only common, but non-rectified spirits, were drank with avidity. At one time, a piece of ruins fell on the heads of these devoted miscreants; at another they were seen nodding over the fire, and so desperately insensible of their situation, and incapable to move through intoxication, that many of them were seen to drop into eternity in a manner too shocking for description. The same day attempts were made on the Bank and the Pay-office; but these places being strongly guarded, they failed; and many of the rioters embraced an untimely and unprepared death at the hand of the military, rather than abandon their destructive pursuit. This night was the most dreadful of any; the number of the killed cannot be ascertained; but as far as report enables us to estimate them, they stand thus;—109 killed by association troops and guards, 101 by light horse, and 75 died in the hospitals. Those who were present speak of these scenes as exceeding any thing recorded in our annals. Before noon, on Thursday, the regulars and militia from the country had put a stop to all further devastations.

In the mean time, about 200 members of the house of commons had the courage to assemble in that place, under the protection of the military. Some resolutions were passed: one was an assertion of their own privileges; the second was for a committee of enquiry into the late and present outrages, and for the discovery of their promoters and abettors; a third for a prosecution by the attorney-general; and the fourth for an address to his majesty, for the reimbursement of the foreign ministers, to the amount of the damages they had sustained by the rioters. But the news of the conflagration begun in the city arriving, occasioned their hasty adjournment. On Thursday, the 8th of June, lord George Gordon was taken into custody, and conveyed to the Horse Guards, where he underwent an examination before the lord president, lord North, lord Amherst, the secretaries of state, and several lords of the council; and in the evening was committed a close prisoner to the Tower. He was attended thither by a greater force than ever was known on a similar occasion. Lord George Gordon was, in the following year, brought to trial for high treason, and acquitted of all the charges; nor, among all those who were apprehended, brought to trial, and hanged, were there any proved to belong to that company who assembled in St. George's Fields.

It was determined, in a committee of the whole house of commons, that no repeal should take place in the act in favour of the Roman catholics, as the grievances said to arise from it were imaginary; and they came to resolutions, in order to set the conduct of parliament in a fair light, and to undeceive the ill-informed, but well-meaning part of the petitioners. On Saturday, July the 8th, his majesty closed this tedious session with a speech, in which he expressed his satisfaction at the magnanimity and perseverance of his faithful commons.

On the 1st of September a proclamation was issued, for the dissolution of this parliament, and for calling a new one.

While intestine violence and riot shook the capital, our fleets abroad met with success, which served to console the unthinking populace for past misfortunes. The close investment of Gibralter immediately followed the Spanish declaration of war. In the month of January, 1780, a fleet consisting of 21 ships of the line, under the command of sir George Rodney, proceeded to the relief of Gibralter. This fortunate commander had not been many days at sea, before he fell in with 15 sail of Spanish ships, laden with naval stores and provisions, bound to Cadiz, which were escorted by a Spanish man of war of 64 guns, and five frigates, all of which were taken. Eight days after, upon doubling cape St. Vincent, a Spanish fleet, consisting of 11 sail of the line, under the command of Don Juan de Langara, was descried, which he immediately bore down upon, keeping nearer to the shore than the enemy, to prevent their escaping into any port; which, by the direction in which the wind then blew, was, in the marine phrase, keeping the lee-gage. The engagement began about four o'clock in the afternoon; and, after it had continued near forty minutes, one of the Spanish ships, of 70 guns, blew up, and 600 men, who were on board her, perished. Soon after which, the battle was changed to a flight on the part of the Spaniards. During the night, which immediately came on, the British ships pursued the enemy through a great sea, the weather proving tempestuous, and the next morning the fleet had approached towards the shoals of St. Lucar. Four Spanish men of war were carried into Gibralter, among which was the admiral's ship; two other ships were taken, but being afterwards driven on shore, the one was lost and the other rescued. This signal success was obtained with the loss of only 32 men killed, and 102 wounded. The vanquished fleet consisted of fourteen sail; but three ships had been separated from the rest just before the engagement. The scene of this memorable action was the very same with that on which Boscawen effected the destruction of de la Clue's squadron, in the last war, only the pursuit was made in different directions. Boscawen completed his triumph on the coast where Rodney began.

The principal object with the Spaniards was to recover the Floridas; but whilst a force was collecting for this purpose by Don Bernardo de Galvez, the Spanish governor of Louisiana, a small force was sent from Jamaica against Omoa, a Spanish settlement on the Musquito shore, which was soon taken, to the great annoyance of the enemy; but the unhealthiness of the place caused it to become the grave of the brave men who subdued it. Admiral Hyde Parker, on the Leeward Island station, took and destroyed a large number of vessels, on the coast of Martinico, which had sailed from France for the supply of that island. Several French frigates were likewise taken. Admiral Rodney thrice engaged the French fleet in the West Indies, commanded by M. de Guichen, without any decisive consequences; although the palm of victory was justly claimed by the English admiral, notwithstanding his force was considerably inferior, and, in the first action, he was badly seconded by many ships of his fleet. The honourable captain St. John, of the Intrepid, and three of his lieutenants, were killed. The dreadful hurricanes, which spread desolation over many parts of the West India islands, some time after, proved fatal to the ships of both nations in those seas.

The operations of this campaign in America were carried on to the southward by sir Henry Clinton in person; who, in order to provide a sufficient force for an expedition against Charlestown, found it necessary to evacuate Rhode Island, although a possession of great importance, on account of its valuable haven. A voluntary surrender of it, therefore, furnished a melancholy proof of the disparity of the force employed in this war to the objects sought. The French immediately took possession of a place, which they had in vain attempted to subdue. Charlestown surrendered on the 13th of May, 1780; soon after which, sir Henry Clinton returned to New York, and earl Cornwallis became commander-in-chief in South Carolina.

It being necessary that his lordship should remain at Charlestown, to regulate the affairs of that province, lord Rawdon (now earl Moira) was detached, with the troops destined for active service, to Camden, on the Santee, not far from the borders of North Carolina; a place which he selected as an advantageous rendezvous for the loyalists in both provinces, as calculated to protect the security of Carolina, and as a magazine and place of arms during the intended operations for the reduction of North Carolina.

At this period it was first seen, how much the royalists had been deceived respecting the real disposition of these provinces. In the hour of victory, a number of South Carolinians had accepted the invitation given them in the royal proclamation. But when baron de Kalbe, with a detachment of 2000 men from Washington's army was advanced into North Carolina; when colonel Sumpter had levied a body of men in that province; and general Gates, who had signalized himself by his campaigns in the north, was arrived to take the command of the provincials in this quarter; their conduct immediately proved that most of them had temporised, and were still inclined in their hearts to the revolted cause. In the month of August, lord Cornwallis, being informed that Gates was on his march to join Sumpter, and that they were expected to advance, with their united forces, against lord Rawdon, marched with all possible dispatch to Camden. The royal army was so sickly, that the effective men did not amount to more than 2000, including 500 Carolinians, while that of Gates was 5000 strong. Yet so necessary was victory regarded, to the preservation of their conquests, that it was determined, by the royalist generals, to give their enemy battle. That they might have some advantage, to balance the disparity of force, they concerted a plan for taking Gates, who was posted about thirteen miles from them, by surprise. With that view they decamped (August 15th) from Camden by night, but had soon the mortification to be informed, that their enemy had formed a similar design. A battle ensued on their route, in which the royalists were led on with great courage by lord Rawdon and colonel Webster, and the whole was commanded with much judgment by lord Cornwallis. The Americans made a resolute stand for above an hour, but were at last obliged to give way to the intrepid attacks of the royalists. The flight became general, notwithstanding all the efforts of Gates to rally his fugitive troops, and they left their antagonists a complete victory, obtained with a comparatively small loss, capturing 2000 stand of arms, their baggage, and eight pieces of artillery.

On intelligence of the defeat of Gates, Sumpter began a precipitate retreat towards North Carolina, which lord Cornwallis deemed it of importance to intercept, and general Tarleton, with his legion, was dispatched in pursuit of them. By forced marches, he overtook him at Catauba ford, on the Watteree. A dreadful slaughter ensued, in which a great part of Sumpter's corps were cut to pieces or taken prisoners, and the general himself with difficulty escaped. Lord Cornwallis, perceiving his advantage, instantly availed himself of the opportunity of penetrating into North Carolina, and a plan was concerted for that purpose; in the execution of which he was to be supported by two detachments, under Tarleton and Ferguson. Each of these generals was to take a different route through the interior country; and it was expected that, in the present state of affairs, they would, by their joint operations, have borne down all resistance. But a reverse of fortune now awaited the royalists, and it was at length discovered, that their past successes had not been owing to causes which would operate in the further prosecution of hostilities. Civil wars are, of all others, the most liable to sudden changes, because, in these contentions, the feelings and passions of the people more frequently concur with policy in producing them. Lord Cornwallis had advanced to Charlotte Town, near the borders of the two Carolinas, without any check on his prosperous fortune, when a new and formidable enemy was seen to issue from the districts on the west of the Allegany mountains, whose natural fierceness compensated for the want of discipline. Being apprised that colonel Ferguson was approaching towards their country, they assembled about 3000 men, commanded by several chiefs, and so hemmed in his small corps, that an action became inevitable. The irruption of these hardy republicans was put in execution without any direction from the government of America. They had so little of the mechanism of a regular army, that the colonels of some of the states, from which they issued, commanded each day alternately. The hardships these volunteers underwent were very great. Some of them subsisted for weeks together without tasting bread, or salt, or spirituous liquors; and slept in the woods without blankets. Ears of corn, or pompions thrown into the fire, with occasional supplies of beef or venison, roasted in the woods, were their chief provisions. Surrounded by such enemies, bravery and fortitude were general Ferguson's only resources. For a long time he gallantly maintained his ground against their greatly superior force, repelling their attacks with the bayonet. But while in pursuit of one party, he was continually assailed, in ambush, by another. His troops fought with unabated intrepidity, till the leader fell, by whose example they had been animated. With him all hopes of success vanished, and a complete victory remained to the provincials, which was accompanied by the surrender of 800 prisoners of war. From this defeat we may date the turn of fortune. Lord Cornwallis, when informed of the fatal event, and of the circumstances attending it, convinced of the disaffection of the natives, and the danger of prosecuting his enterprise with so small a force, began his retreat to Wynnesborough, near Camden. He was in this position when he received intelligence that Sumpter was again at the head of a considerable force near the Broad river. Tartleton was dispatched against him, and a hard-fought action ensued on the 20th of November, 1780, at Blackstocks, in which the royalists, after a signal display of valour, were obliged to give way to superior numbers.

During these changes in the southern provinces, no memorable occurrence had taken place in the north. Washington retained his position at Morristown, in the Jerseys, and continued to act on the defensive, and Tryon and Knyphausen were only engaged in one or two ineffectual skirmishes.

The succours, which had been promised to the provincials from France, were delayed by several unforeseen accidents, and did not arrive at Rhode Island till the 12th of July. The armament consisted of seven sail of the line, and five frigates, under the command of M. de Ternay, with a fleet of transports, conveying 6000 chosen troops, under the command of the count de Rochambeau. This force the French general represented as only the vanguard of a very considerable army, destined by his most Christian majesty for the aid of the American republic. In the mean time, the Americans were destined to prove, not only the calamities of war, but the more dangerous effects of treachery. The active services of general Arnold had rendered him a favourite with both the soldiers and the people; but his love of pleasure caused him to contract debts which he was unable to pay; and, as the ministry of Great Britain were not unpractised in the arts of corruption, they knew to what quarter they could most successfully apply. A correspondence was established between Arnold and a young officer of the name of André, at that time adjutant-general to Clinton's army, under the feigned names of Gustavus and Anderson. The station in which Arnold was posted at West Point, was extremely favourable to the traitorous design. The object of the negotiation was to induce Arnold to make such a disposition of his forces, that sir Henry Clinton should be enabled to surprise West Point, in which case the garrison would be so completely in his power, that the troops must have been obliged to lay down their arms, or be cut to pieces. To favour the communication, the Vulture sloop of war had been previously stationed in North river, as near to Arnold's posts as was practicable without exciting suspicion. In order effectually to settle the whole plan of operation, a conference took place; and on the night of September 21st, a boat was sent from the shore to the Vulture, for major André. Arnold met him on the beach, without the posts of either army. The negotiation was not settled till it was too near the dawn of day for André to return, and he was conducted within the American posts, where he stayed the whole day, and at night changed his uniform, which he had hitherto worn under his surtout, for a common coat, and being furnished with a passport from Arnold, under the name of John Anderson, proceeded on horseback for New York. In his way he was met by three privates of the New York militia, who were out on a scouting party; one of them sprang from the cover, and seized André's horse by the bridle. The major, instead of producing his pass, asked the man where he belonged to, who answered, To below, meaning New York;—and André, suspecting no deceit, replied, So do I, and declared himself a British officer, and begged that he might not be detained. Upon the soldier beginning to search him, he found his mistake, and offered them a purse of gold and a valuable watch, if they would suffer him to escape; with promises of permanent provision, and future promotion, if they would accompany him to New York. Though these three poor men had no claim to hereditary honours, they evinced more nobility of sentiment in resisting bribes, than is often found in those of superior station; their names were John Paulding, David Williams, and Isaac Van Vert, and the American congress afterwards rewarded them with a pension of about £50 per annum. André was conducted by his captors to colonel Jameson, who had the command of the scouting parties. It is much to be regretted that this officer suffered André to write to Arnold, by which circumstance the traitor escaped the fate that so deservedly awaited him. After a fair trial before a board of fourteen general officers, French and Americans, major André was condemned to be executed as a spy. Great exertions were made by the British officers to save his life; but the Americans resisted every offer, and would agree to no terms but Arnold's being delivered up to them in the room of André, which on the part of the British was also refused. The unfortunate André, therefore, suffered the sentence of the court. To his memory, the public homage of the nation has been voted; and his name has been consecrated in song. Impartial history can only do justice to his character as a man of courage,—there his panegyric must end. He was an idle and dissipated young man, and relinquished the more honourable and useful occupation of a merchant, for that of a soldier. The fugitive general, his partner in intrigue, attempted, in several publications, to justify his own conduct, and to persuade others to follow his example; but his treachery had excited so much contempt in the breasts of the Americans, as to produce an effect contrary to his wishes; since it is a memorable circumstance that desertion ceased in the provincial camp immediately after Arnold became a traitor.

The campaign closed in the northern states with some success to the Americans, at fort George in Long Island. The Spaniards on the American frontier were not inactive during these transactions. Don Bernando de Galvez, the governor of Louisiana, was one of the first to proclaim the independence of America, and, in the spring of 1780, assembled a small force at New Orleans, and surprised and made himself master of Mobille, and all the British settlements on the Mississippi.

The siege of Gibralter still continued, and the blockade was renewed after admiral Rodney's departure; but the Spaniards, under Don Barcelo, were defeated on the 7th of June, in an attempt to burn the English shipping in the harbour there. In the command of the Channel fleet, sir Charles Hardy, (who died on the 19th of May) was succeeded by admiral Geary. He sailed in the beginning of June, and was not out many days before he was so fortunate as to intercept a considerable convoy of French West India ships, homeward-bound from St. Domingo, and captured twelve rich vessels. But this advantage was counterbalanced by the loss of almost all the outward-bound convoy from England to the East and West Indies, which, on the 29th of July, was taken by the combined fleets, to the number of fifty-five.

THE naval pre-eminence of England had for ages excited the jealousy of the other maritime states of Europe. In the late war, they had been deeply chagrined at the triumph of Great Britain over the fleets of the house of Bourbon, and the same feelings were excited by her recent successes. Other combinations, therefore, were deemed necessary to restrain her power. With that view, the empress of Russia came forward as the projector and patroness of a confederacy, of which the chief object was, to dispute the right of the king of Great Britain, by virtue of the general law of nations, to search neutral vessels, and thus prevent supplies from being carried to his enemies. In opposition to this, the empress now proposed a new regulation, "that neutral ships shall enjoy a free navigation, even from port to port, and on the coasts of the belligerent powers; and that all effects, belonging to the subjects of the said belligerent powers, shall be looked upon as free on board such neutral ships; except only such goods as are stipulated to be contraband." This regulation was warmly promoted by the kings of Sweden, Denmark, Spain, France, and Prussia, and was earnestly supported by the Dutch states.

THE terms on which this country stood with the Dutch, had long been latently inimical. The restraints which their carrying trade had been laid under, during the last war, at which they murmured, but which they dared not resent, had not been exercised with equal severity in the present state of hostilities. The partiality which that republic, particularly the province of Amsterdam, shewed to the interests of France, as well as to those of America, was seen with great dissatisfaction by the court of London. Many attempts had been made, by American agents, to negotiate a loan in Holland, which did not prove successful; but the outlines of a commercial treaty had been secretly adjusted in September, 1778, at Aix-la-Chapelle, by the orders and instructions of M. Van Berkel, counsellor and pensionary of the city of Amsterdam, with a commissioner on the part of the congress. The assistance which the Dutch might be brought to render to America, either in an open or private manner, if a respectable personage, properly empowered by congress, should reside at Amsterdam, induced Mr. Laurens, the president of that congress, to undertake transacting the concerns of America with that republic; but on his voyage, the ship in which he sailed was captured by an English frigate, and the American president, being brought to London, was committed to the Tower. All his papers, which he had committed to the sea as soon as his fate was ascertained, happening to be recovered, were exposed to the inspection of the British cabinet. The discoveries which they made, determined the court of London no longer to keep any terms with the United States; and on the 20th of December, 1780, a royal manifesto was published, which amounted to a declaration of war, and letters of marque and reprisal were soon after issued. This conduct certainly implied, that the open enmity of the Dutch was less to be dreaded than their secret disservices. Farther, by this declaration of hostilities, the republic was rendered incapable of acceding to the armed neutrality, by which the northern powers would have become, in a manner, guarantees for his protection and security. For a kingdom, already overwhelmed with foes, to denounce war against another state, appeared to be a measure so singularly bold and big with danger, that it could only be justified by the plea of state necessity, which had been urged on a variety of occasions, and implicitly admitted. To qualify this measure, it must be observed, that such a radical defect had long prevailed in the government and genius of the Dutch, that the maritime force possessed by that republic, seems to have sunk in a like proportion to the advancement of the strength of this country. A well-informed politician had long before pronounced the Dutch commonwealth to be "in a state of dissolution; and not to have, either within or without herself, those means of recovery, by conjunctures and by character, that she has had on several occasions, from the time her government was first formed."

When the new parliament assembled, after the Christmas recess, Mr. Burke attempted again to introduce his plan of œconomy, with worse success than the preceding session. In the course of his speech upon this occasion, he asserted, that the king of France had abolished 606 useless offices, by which reduction he had provided himself with the means for carrying on the war, without laying a single additional tax upon the people.

The French minister of finance had delivered to the king, his master, an ample detail of the reformations he had introduced, and pointed out a variety of means by which the state might be essentially benefitted in future. It was a new thing in France, for a full, clear, and explicit state of the finances to be laid before the people, and it may astonish an Englishman to hear the French minister declare, That the public bank of France has never been in advance on account of government; but the royal treasury has constantly a capital in bank of some millions (of livres.) This bank, therefore, has not been of any direct utility to the royal treasury; and the interest of government, in the success of its establishment, has been no other than the prosperity of commerce, the moderating the interest of money, and giving a greater activity to circulation. Such probably will never be the state of affairs in this country. The exchequer is never likely to become "the great spring of public credit, and the great scene of all transactions relative to public receipts and payments." The monied interest commands even government itself; the public, like an extravagant spendthrift, being obliged to deal with usurers on their own terms; although the landed men are the true owners of the political vessel, the monied men, as such, are no more than passengers in it.

Sir George Saville presented a petition, signed by thirty-two freeholders of the confederated counties, known by the name of delegates, which was rejected, on the ground that a petition, signed by thirty-two persons, on such a national concern, carried no apparent weight or importance; and the idea of these gentlemen being delegated by several counties in England, could not be admitted, because the constitution knows no such bodies of men as county-delegates, except those within the walls of the house of commons. So different is the language used at the commencement, and towards the close of a parliament!

In this struggle between government and the people, it may be remarked, that the principles upon which the party distinctions of Whig and Tory had been founded, seem to have been lost, and those who still chose to be known by such names, had apparently changed sides; for if, as a learned metropolitan observed in the house of lords, the conduct of the Whigs was not Whigism, but Whigism run mad; a like phrensy may be said to have seized the Tories. The principles of Toryism 120 years ago, and from thence down to the present reign, were utterly repugnant to the corrupt influence of the crown in the two houses of parliament. If it be said, that the body of the Whigs were now as clamorous against the power of parliament, as they were formerly against the power of the crown, and that the Tories were as yielding to the increase of influence which the crown has acquired, as they were formerly to the claims of prerogative, it may be answered, that still the political principles to which each was attached, are very different from those which divided their forefathers. The Whigs, when they supported the power of parliament, meant to form a barrier against the encroachments of regal power, and every Tory will surely admit, that the influence of the crown is very different from the power of the crown. The distinguishing characters of each party are, at length, lost in the changes incidental to human affairs, and one grand and important national object now ought to engage the public attention. It is indeed time that all party names should be done away; they serve only to narrow and degrade the sentiments and views of mankind, and the times render it necessary, that new distinctions should take place, not as badges of petulance and ill-will, but such distinctions as must, in their very nature, discriminate between the lover of his country and its betrayer. The nation, at this time, ought to be divided into those who claim from their representatives, and from the legislation in general, a provident expenditure of the public money, and a sincere, strenuous, and judicious intention to introduce an universal system of œconomy; and those self-interested and rapacious harpies, who become important by the spoils of their country.

The sudden and unexpected commencement of hostilities against the Dutch, caused their valuable commerce to become a prey to British ships, and a large number of their seamen to be detained captives in England. In the West Indies, the island of St. Eustatius, which, during the war, had been a most beneficial mart of traffic, both for the French and Americans, was reduced by sir George Rodney and general Vaughan. The island, although highly important to the Dutch in a commercial view, is no more than a barren rock, incapable of providing defence or subsistence for its inhabitants. The city of Amsterdam was chiefly concerned in this trade; but many English merchants were also embarked in it, as well as in the carrying trade. Our whole force in the West Indies was brought against this spot; so that the governor, unable to make any defence, surrendered at discretion. The British commander dealt the full measure of punishment to all upon the island with an implacable severity; private property was seized without mercy, and the vindictive spirit which dictated the orders and their execution, scarcely left the miserable residents, particularly the Jews, the means of subsistence; they were deprived of their very provisions. A Dutch fleet of merchant-ships, consisting of thirty vessels, and a 64 gun ship which convoyed them, and had just sailed, were pursued, and the whole taken; but the greatest part of the merchant-ships were afterwards captured by the French, near the Irish coast, on their voyage to England. The island of St. Martin, and the settlements of Demarary and Essequibo, on the continent of South America, were soon after reduced.

Thus was one great object in breaking with Holland accomplished; another was to prevent their trade to the Baltic, to effect which object vice-admiral Hyde Parker was sent out, with five line of battle-ships, one of 50 guns, and five large frigates to intercept a Dutch fleet, which he met with off the Dogger Bank, consisting of eight two-decked line of battle ships, and several large frigates; these were convoy to a fleet of merchant-men going to the northward. With the true spirit of a British seaman, he engaged the enemy, although so much superior in numbers. The battle was obstinate, and proved that the Dutch had not lost that firmness in time of action, which had been so conspicuous in the contests between the two powers in the last century. The engagement was maintained for almost four hours, when the ships of each squadron becoming unmanageable, they lay to for a considerable time near each other; but at length the Dutch ships of war, with their merchant-men, bore away for the Texel, and one of their 64 gun ships sunk. The English, in this hard contest, lost in killed and wounded 443 men. In consequence of this action, the Dutch Baltic fleet was unable to pursue its voyage. Parker returned home in disgust, at not being sent out with a sufficient force. The additional ships which he asked for had been withheld from him, without any specific service being assigned them; and, though his sovereign paid him peculiar attention, in visiting him on board his ship at Chatham, the veteran struck his flag, and withdrew from the service. The nation had been so long accustomed to see those officers, who were most distinguished for the length and eminence of their services, retiring with gloomy discontent, at the conduct of the marine minister, that this instance was observed as a common occurrence, although no circumstance, in the then critical situation of the empire, could be a more warrantable cause of alarm, or a more necessary subject for investigation.

The operations against the Dutch were not confined to these objects. Commodore Johnstone was invested with the command of a squadron, destined to attack the cape of Good Hope, whence he was to proceed to the Spanish settlement of Buenos Ayres, in the Rio de la Plata of South America, where a dangerous insurrection had given great alarm to the court of Madrid. Our ministry had been apprised of the posture of affairs in those parts by a priest, who had been sent a prisoner from thence to Spain, for his conduct in fomenting this civil commotion; but the ship in which he was embarked happened to be taken by an English cruiser. This man accompanied the commodore on the expedition. The republic of Holland, unable to make head against this attack, was obliged to seek protection from France; and a fleet was sent out from Brest, of superior force, in order to counteract the designs of commodore Johnstone, whose exact strength was well known to the French commander, M. de Suffrein, who came up with the British fleet at the cape de Verd islands, and attacked him whilst lying under the protection of the Portuguese flag, in the small island of St. Jago, several outward-bound East Indiamen being in company. The French were, however, disgracefully beaten off, with great loss and damage; but, as they reached the cape before the British commander, the attempt upon that place was effectually frustrated, and the French became actual masters of the settlement and harbour. Five homeward-bound Dutch East Indiamen were afterwards surprised by Johnstone; four of which he captured, the other was burnt by its crew. It was now found necessary to relinquish the objects of the expedition. The ships destined for the East Indies proceeded on their voyage thither, and the commodore returned home with his prizes.

The immense quantity of merchandize found on the island of St. Eustatius, detained admiral Rodney for a considerable time on that spot; and, although a large fleet was expected to arrive from France, which sir Samuel Hood was cruising with the British fleet to intercept, yet three ships of the line remained with the commander-in-chief. Hood remonstrated in vain against the station which he was appointed to keep, as one in which he could not prevent the junction of the French ships in the harbour of Martinique with the fleet from Europe. The event proved his suggestion to have been judicious, although slighted by his superior officer. The French became stronger by five ships of the line. He fought them, however, with this odds, and kept them long at bay. Rodney, at length, took the command; and, having now collected his whole force, after some time went in search of the enemy, who had already reduced the island of Tobago. The British fleet consisted of twenty-one ships of the line, the French of twenty-four. A glorious opportunity was presented, of deciding this long-protracted contest. The two fleets were drawn up in order of battle, the British seamen exulted in the prospect of action, they were kept all night under arms; but the next day did not gratify their expectations. The French were far from becoming so confident, by the advantage which their superiority of numbers gave them, as to seek their enemy; and the British admiral was induced to repress the ardour of his men, because there was no port at hand, to afford a retreat to the disabled ships, though to this inconvenience the French were equally exposed. After this parade of battle, sir George Rodney returned to Europe, in an 80 gun ship, at a time when the cause of his country demanded his most strenuous and bold exertion, and which, most probably, would have prevented the catastrophe which followed on the American continent.

At the close of the year 1778, the British in India made repeated attempts to interfere in a revolution which had taken place in the Mahratta government. Raganout Rou caused his nephew, the reigning paishwa, with the care of whom, during his minority, he was solemnly entrusted, to be assassinated. In consequence of the protection afforded to Raganout by the British government, a confederacy was formed in the year 1779, between the Nizam, Hyder Ali, and the Mahrattas, for the expulsion of the English from India.

It being determined to pay no regard to the treaty of Wargaum, active preparations were made for the renewal of warlike operations by the presidency of Bombay, and a body of forces was dispatched from Madras to reinforce the Surat army. As soon as these were completed, at the opening of the present year, general Goddard penetrated into the territory of Dubhoy, belonging to the Mahrattas, and gained possession of a fortress of that name, which was its chief defence. Then, advancing into the Guzerat country, where he was joined by a body of Futty Sing's cavalry, he invested Ahmedabad, and reduced that capital by storm in five days. This important place was then consigned to Futty Sing, as a means of fixing him in the company's interests; and that prince, in return, granted the company such districts of the territories appertaining to it, as were most desirable to them, together with the privilege of establishing a factory at Ahmedabad.

Mr. Farmer being generously released from his confinement as a hostage, about this time, some overtures were made through him for an amicable arrangement with the Mahratta chiefs, Scindiah and Holkar. But when it appeared that the surrender of Raganout was made the first stipulation, and that they were desirous to establish a power independent of the company, the conferences were dropped.

After various negotiations, hostilities were commenced with great success by the British forces. General Goddard, taking Scindiah's army by surprise, made vast havoc among the Mahratta horse with his artillery, and at last drove him from the field with great slaughter. Nor was this the only honour acquired by the British arms. In the course of the campaign, several brilliant actions were performed by the detachments under Campbell, Walsh, and Forbes, in all which victory was the reward of British valour, in support of the distinguished military address of our commanders.

The supreme council, in the mean time, were pursuing such measures as they deemed most advisable to attach the ranna of Ghod to their interests. The Mahrattas were in possession of the strong fortress of Gualier, in the heart of the ranna's territories. Knowing how mortifying and distressing this was to him, they made it their first object to relieve him from that annoyance. With that view, major Popham was sent with a body of troops to his support. After gaining so decided an advantage over the Mahrattas which were stationed for the defence of the territory, as enabled him to clear the country of them, he sat down before Gualier. It was till this time deemed impregnable. But Popham, being apprised that it was accessible by a track which led over an adjoining precipice, employed the native troops, with such admirable judgment, in climbing it and assailing the fortress unexpectedly, that it was reduced with a very inconsiderable loss of men.

During these transactions in the north, the presidency of Madras had been adopting every expedient in their power, to secure themselves in the possession of the Guntoor Circar, the value of which was enhanced to them, by its situation near their own and the nabob of Arcot's territories on the Kristna river. Bazalet Jung was perfectly aware that he had incurred the enmity of Hyder Ali, as well as the Nizam, by his treaty of cession. To guard him from the attack which he apprehended would be the consequence of their anger, colonel Harper was sent with a body of troops to his support. But having occasion to cross the Cuddepah, which Hyder had lately conquered, he was intercepted on his march by a detachment of Mysoreans, and was constrained to desist from the prosecution of his expedition.

Mr. Holland, meanwhile, was employed as resident at the nizam's court, with instructions to reconcile that prince to his brother's transaction with the presidency; and, moreover, to prevail on him, if possible, to remit the whole or a part of the peshcush, or annual tribute granted to him, as the mogul's vicegerent, when the five northern Circars were ceded to the company. His reception was such as might reasonably have been expected under such circumstances. The nizam was naturally disposed to peace; but when he reflected on the whole tenour of the company's conduct, and compared it with their present insolent propositions, he thought it politic to sacrifice his own disposition to the safety of his dominions, and the general welfare of Hindostan; he boldly told Mr. Holland, that, if the company was bent on war, he also was prepared for it, and was confident it would be waged with advantage to himself. He stated that "the surrender of the Circars to the company had proceeded from the fraud and ignorance of his managers, that he had submitted to that heavy loss from a sense of his engagements; and, considering himself bound by the treaties, had still adhered to them." Concluding his conference with a threat that he would join Hyder Ali, he only subjoined, that the commencement of hostilities must be the necessary consequence of withholding the peshcush; and, when no satisfactory answer was given, Mr. Holland was forthwith ordered to prepare for his departure.

It ought here to be observed, for the credit of the supreme council, that these affairs, by which the company was involved in a new war, were transacted without its privity. And although the developement of them excited much indignation in that board, and threatened a rupture between the two presidencies, who were jealous of each other's power, yet the subsequent soothing measures, adopted by the governor and council, had the good effect of preventing the nizam from taking the field.

The irresolution of the other powers was strikingly contrasted by the firmness and activity of Hyder Ali. The Mysorean had been indefatigably employed, during the interval of peace, in improving the civil, judicial, and military systems of his empire. While others were shrinking from the combat, Hyder, conscious of his strength, seemed to rejoice that so fair an opportunity was presented of avenging his personal injuries. He was aware that the presidency of Madras, engaged in their private intrigues, had neglected the requisite measures of defence; and that the company's military force, though amounting to 30,000 men, was divided into detached and unconnected bodies. With his usual promptitude, he assembled an army of 80,000 men, which was rendered more effective by the French officers, who had joined him from the nizam's service. He poured like a torrent into the country on the east of the ghants or passes; and, while Tippoo Saib was laying waste the northern Circars, he advanced in person, with the grand army, and sat down before Arcot. To oppose this formidable force, colonel Baillie was placed with a small detachment in the Circars, and sir Hector Monroe took the field, with all the forces which could be assembled at Madras. Hyder, anxious to avoid a pitched battle, raised the siege on the approach of the English general; and, with a view to prevent the intended junction of Baillie's corps with sir Hector Monroe's army, he posted his own forces on that officer's route, and detached his son and his brother, with 30,000 of his best troops, to intercept him on his march. The result of these movements was an action at Perimbancum, where, notwithstanding the great disadvantages to which the English general was subjected, from his want of cavalry, and inferiority of force, he obtained a victory, more glorious than important.

But even victory could not extricate the troops from their embarrassment. Colonel Fletcher having arrived with a detachment from sir Hector Monroe to their support, the two commanders were advancing, with their combined forces, towards the grand army, united near Conjeveram, when they were suddenly attacked (September the 10th) by Tippoo Saib in ambuscade. A furious battle succeeded. Surrounded by 25,000 cavalry, and thirty regiments of sepoys, the compact British detachment, with only 10 pieces of artillery, were enabled to repel every charge, by the invincible firmness with which they maintained their ground. Fortune seemed inclined to reward their bravery and their fortitude, when the accidental explosion of their tumbrils threw them into irrecoverable confusion. The disastrous defeat which ensued, was rendered more severe by the loss of nearly the whole detachment, and by the death of colonel Fletcher, and the capture of Baillie. The immediate consequence of this event was the surrender of Arcot, and the siege of Wandewash and other fortresses. The presidency, alarmed and astonished, restored, as a condition of the termination of hostilities, the Guntoor Circar, and propitiated him by the assurances of an early payment of the stipulated peshcush.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

GEORGE III.

[1781, 1782.]

State of the Public Mind—Campaign in America—Surrender of Lord Cornwallis—Attack upon Minorca—Exploits of Admiral Rodney—Siege of Gibralter—Its gallant Defence—Affairs in the East Indies—Origin, Progress, and Conclusion of the Mahratta War.

THE war with Holland was censured in the new parliament, (for a dissolution had been deemed expedient, after the suppression of the riots had strengthened the authority of the crown,) but the country in general was not inclined to admit, that the ministry had wantonly prolonged the war. Yet, though on this subject the people agreed with the court, they were displeased by the rejection of a judicious bill of retrenchment, introduced by Mr. Burke, and with the disregard shewn to a petition from the delegates of those counties, which had formed associations against the encroaching and increasing influence of the crown.

THESE subjects were debated with spirit; and, on another occasion, the conduct of the court, in directing military execution at the time of the riots, excited animadversion, which was repelled with some plausibility of argumentation and remark. In this debate, Mr. Sheridan distinguished himself. He had already obtained an exalted rank in the dramatic world, and he now began to shine as a parliamentary speaker. At this time, indeed, he did not evince that readiness and fluency which he afterwards displayed; but he gave strong indications of oratorical ability. He exercised with dexterity the weapons of wit, of satire, and of argument. His reasoning was not destitute of force, and his remarks and allusions were pointed and appropriate.

BEFORE we attend to the occurrences of the American campaign, it is proper to advert to a second attempt made by the French for the reduction of Jersey. Eight hundred men were sent against the island in the month of January, under the command of baron de Rullecourt. The descent was conducted by night, with so much secrecy, that the invaders obtained possession of St. Heliers, the capital, by surprise, and took major Corbet, the lieutenant-governor, prisoner. But as soon as the troops in the island could be assembled, major PIERSON, on whom the command devolved, led them to the attack, and so completely overpowered the enemy, in an action fought in the streets, that the whole body were slain or taken prisoners. Unfortunately the brave major Pierson fell in the moment of victory. The baron de Rullecourt also was wounded in the action. 1781.

IN America, the royalists under lord Cornwallis, assisted by lord Rawdon, generals Webster and Leslie, and colonel Tarleton, prepared to execute their concerted invasion. The American army was now commanded by Greene, a general of eminent merit, who had succeeded Gates in his command, and who was assisted by colonel Morgan, an officer distinguished by his services in the northern war. General Greene, who was sensible of the inferior merit of his troops, divided his forces, in order to harass his enemy by desultory movements. In pursuance of this plan, when lord Cornwallis was moving from his camp at Wynnesburg, towards the borders of North Carolina, he dispatched Morgan, with 470 provincial infantry, and 70 light dragoons, against the British post of Ninety-six, in South Carolina. Morgan, on his route, provided himself with about 500 militia. This movement brought on the battle of the Cowpens, near the Broad river, between that general and Tarleton, who was sent to oppose his march. The latter had the advantage of commanding well-disciplined and veteran troops, and had 350 cavalry. But Morgan proved himself superior in generalship. He retired on Tarleton's approach; and, finding himself warmly pressed, drew up his forces in two lines near a wood, placing his militia in the first, and the continentals in the second, colonel Washington with his dragoons making a corps de reserve. Tarleton, confident of victory, made a furious attack upon the first line, and put them to flight, as Morgan had foreseen. He then attacked the continentals, who withstood him with great firmness for some time, but were at last obliged to give way. Had the British infantry been properly supported by the cavalry, at this moment of the battle, the victory must have been theirs. Morgan, observing their situation, seized the opportunity to make his attack on them, harassed as they then were with hard duty. This stroke of generalship turned the fortune of the day. The royalists, who had been accustomed to success, were panic-struck, and instantly put to flight. Tarleton, endeavouring to atone for his want of conduct by his valour, rallied his cavalry, and repulsed those of Washington, but in vain. The victory 1781. was totally lost, and the field was abandoned to the enemy, with the loss of 600 men, while that of the Americans was comparatively trivial.

General Morgan now retired, and made his retreat across the Broad river; and it became the first object of lord Cornwallis, to overtake him before he should arrive at the Catauba. He therefore disencumbered himself of every superfluous article, that he might supply the paucity of light troops, by the active and spontaneous movement of his whole army, and pursued the enemy across the rapid river of Catauba, 500 yards broad, in the face of 300 men placed to guard the passage. All his efforts, however, were ineffectual. Morgan, having, with extreme difficulty, made his retreat across the Catauba and the Yadkin, formed his desired junction with general Greene.

The British, having failed in their attempt to pass the Yadkin, were obliged to cross at the upper fords, after Morgan and Greene had met at Guildford court-house. The plan of general Greene was not to enter on an immediate action; but to keep alive the courage of his party, to depress that of the royalists, and to harass the foragers and detachments of the British, till reinforcements should arrive. While Greene was unequal even to defensive operations, he lay seven days within ten miles of Cornwallis's camp, but took a new position every night, and kept it a profound secret where the next was to be. By such frequent movements lord Cornwallis could not gain intelligence of his situation in time to profit by it. He manœuvred in this manner to avoid an action for three weeks, during which time he was often obliged to ask bread from the common soldiers, having none of his own. By the end of that period, two brigades of militia from North Carolina, and one from Virginia, together with 400 regulars raised for eighteen months, joined his army, and gave him a superiority of numbers; he therefore determined no longer to avoid an engagement. Lord Cornwallis having long sought for this, no further delay took place on either side. On the 15th of March, 1781, the American army consisted of about 4400 men, of which more than one half were militia. The British of about 2400, chiefly veterans. The former was drawn up in three lines. The front composed of North Carolina militia, the second of Virginia militia, the third and last of continental troops, commanded by general Huger and colonel Williams. After a brisk cannonade in front, the British advanced in three columns; the Hessians on the right, the guards in the centre, and lieutenant-colonel Webster's brigade on the left, and attacked the front line. This gave way when their adversaries were at the distance of 140 yards, from the misconduct of a colonel, who, on the advance of the enemy, called out to an officer at some distance, that he would be surrounded. The alarm was sufficient: and without inquiring into the probability of what had been injudiciously suggested, the militia precipitately quitted the field.

The Virginia militia stood their ground, and kept up their fire till they were ordered to retreat. General Stevens, their commander, had posted 40 riflemen at equal distances, twenty paces in the rear of his brigade, with orders to shoot every man who should leave his post. That brave officer, though wounded through the thigh, did not quit the field. The continental troops were last engaged, and maintained the conflict with great spirit for an hour and a half. At length, the discipline of veteran troops gained the day. They broke the second Maryland brigade, turned the American left flank, and got in rear of the Virginia brigade. They appeared to be gaining Greene's right, which would have encircled the whole of the continental troops; a retreat was therefore ordered. This was made in good order, and no farther than over the Reedy fork, a distance of about three miles. Greene halted there, and drew up till he had collected most of the stragglers, and then retired to Speedwell's iron works, ten miles distant from Guildford. The Americans lost four pieces of artillery and two ammunition waggons. The victory cost the British dear, and their killed and wounded amounted to several hundreds. The British had only the name, the Americans all the good consequences of a victory. General Greene retreated, and lord Cornwallis kept the field; but, notwithstanding, the British interest in North Carolina was from that day ruined. Soon after this action, lord Cornwallis issued a proclamation setting forth his complete victory, and calling on all loyal subjects to stand forth, and take an active part in restoring order and good government, and offering a pardon and protection to all rebels, murderers excepted, who should surrender themselves on or before the 20th of April. On the day after this proclamation was issued, his lordship left his hospital and 75 wounded men, with the numerous loyalists in the vicinity, and began a march towards Wilmington, which had the appearance of a retreat.

During these operations, lord Rawdon had been left with 900 men at Camden, to guard the frontier of South Carolina. When Greene had no longer any prospect of success against his former antagonist, he turned suddenly towards South Carolina, with about 1500 men, and advanced rapidly to Camden. Regardless of the great disparity of force, lord Rawdon, on the 25th of April, marched out to a spot called Hobkirk's Hill, about two miles from his camp, and made so impetuous an assault on his advancing adversaries, that they were soon obliged to give way; and, though repeatedly rallied and brought to the charge, were driven from their ground, and yielded the loyalists a complete victory. The victors, however, had the mortification to find, that honour was the only result of their most meritorious achievements. Their advantage was temporary, their loss of men irreparable; whereas that of the vanquished was immediately supplied. After various movements of both armies, the campaign closed with a desperate conflict (September 8th) at Eutaw Springs, between Greene and colonel Stuart, who had taken the command on lord Rawdon's return to England. The event, though indecisive, gave the enemy a firm footing in that province; and the royalists, contenting themselves with the protection of Charleston, no movement deserving of notice was made by either party during the remainder of that campaign.

Before the end of April, lord Cornwallis proceeded on his march from Wilmington to Virginia. To favour the passage of the many rivers with which the country is intersected, two boats were mounted on carriages, and taken along with his army. With little interruption, he reached Petersburgh, where he was joined by general Phillips, and found himself once more at the head of a considerable force.

From the commencement of hostilities in this country, the American army had never been placed in so critical a situation as at the present moment. Several of the states, tired of the war, furnished their contingents of men, money, and provisions, very slowly and reluctantly. The extreme depreciation of the paper currency occasioned universal distress, and brought disrepute on the congress; and 1300 of the American troops, unable any longer to endure the extreme hardships to which the service subjected them, mutinied, and withdrew from Washington's camp at Morristown. The dissatisfaction, however, of the army, arose from the pressure of extreme distress, and not from the influence of disaffection. They rejected an invitation to throw themselves under the protection of the British army, and to receive from its commander-in-chief the arrears due from the congress. On the contrary, they prepared the way to the reconciliation which ensued, by delivering up the agents who were employed to seduce them from their duty.

It was on trying occasions like these, when difficulties were to be removed, dangers to be averted, or the passions of men to be soothed, and when every movement of the enemy was to be watched, and every advantage to be instantly improved, that the talents of the American general were displayed. He perceived that sir Henry Clinton would reluctantly abandon the objects of the expedition in Virginia, and that the English troops in America were not sufficient to answer this purpose, and to keep possession of New York, the most advantageous station for the British grand army. He therefore dispatched the marquis de la Fayette, with a small force, into Virginia, which was afterwards reinforced by general Wayne; and these generals, without any memorable action, acquitted themselves of their commission by obstructing the enemy's progress. The death of general Phillips, which happened soon after his arrival in Virginia, the disappointment of supplies, and (August 30th) the arrival of a reinforcement of troops from France, and of De Grasse, with a fleet of 28 sail of the line, from the West Indies, all tended to turn the balance in favour of the Americans. Admiral Graves indeed entertained hopes of intercepting Du Barras's fleet on its voyage from the Rhode Island station; but he was disappointed in his views, and Du Barras brought with him, on his junction with the fleet of De Grasse in the Chesapeak, a very acceptable supply of artillery and military stores. A partial action took place between De Grasse's van and a part of Graves's centre, in which the French gave way; but no material advantage was gained, and the English commander was constrained to leave De Grasse in the Chesapeak, and repair to New York to refit.

At this crisis was exhibited the masterstroke of Washington's policy. By keeping sir Henry Clinton in continual alarm, he obliged that general to recal a part of the forces from Virginia; and lord Cornwallis, being thus deprived of those troops, which alone could enable him to keep the field against de la Fayette and Wayne, selected York Town, in Virginia, as his station; where he hoped to maintain himself till he could be relieved. This was the snare into which Washington wished the British commander-in-chief to fall. Having concerted his design with the French admiral De Grasse, and with Rochambeau, he kept up the appearance of an intended attack upon New York, to prevent Clinton from sending relief to lord Cornwallis; and then, marching from the Jerseys with all possible dispatch through Philadelphia, appeared suddenly with his army before York Town. The situation of lord Cornwallis and his troops was now desperate. He had little more than 3000 effective men, to defend a place, which was only guarded by works thrown up hastily, against the fleet of De Grasse on one side, and an army of 13,000 men, with a hundred pieces of artillery, on the other. Lord Cornwallis had no resource, but in offering a capitulation, or attempting an escape. He adopted the latter alternative. Boats were prepared to receive the troops in the night, and to transport them to Glocester Point. After one whole embarkation had crossed, a violent storm of wind and rain dispersed the boats of conveyance, and frustrated the enterprise. The royal army, thus weakened by division, was exposed to increased danger.

With the failure of this enterprise the last hope of the British expired, and their commander was constrained by necessity to surrender his garrison prisoners of war, as the only means of saving the remains of an army, which had deserved well of their country. He therefore wrote a letter to general Washington, requesting a cessation of arms for 24 hours, and that commissioners might be appointed to adjust the terms of capitulation. It was remarked, that while lieutenant-colonel Laurens, the officer employed by general Washington on this occasion, was drawing up these articles, his father was closely confined in the Tower of London, of which lord Cornwallis was constable.

The posts of York and Glocester were surrendered by a capitulation. It was stipulated, that the troops were to be prisoners of war to congress, and the naval force to France. The honour of marching out with colours flying, which had been refused to general Lincoln, when he surrendered Charleston, was now refused to lord Cornwallis; and, in the same spirit of retribution, this very general Lincoln was sent (October 19th, 1781) to receive the submission of the royal army at York. The troops of every kind, which surrendered prisoners of war, amounted to 7000, of whom only 3000 were effective men; so great was the number of the sick and wounded. The mortification attending this disaster was considerably enhanced by the arrival of a British fleet, and an army of 7000 men, to the assistance of lord Cornwallis, four days after he surrendered. On receiving the unexpected intelligence of the late event, they retired from the Chesapeak, and returned to Sandy Hook and New York.

The misfortune of lord Cornwallis made a strong impression upon the public mind. It tended to produce a general conviction of the impolicy of continuing the war, and a regret for the useless sacrifice of lives, and consumption of treasure, with which its protracted course had been attended. Yet the obstinacy of the ministers seemed invincible. They were indeed less arrogant; but folly and prejudice were still the chief ingredients in their composition. They hoped to retain the confidence of a submissive senate; but in this respect they were disappointed, for a majority of the house of commons at length refused to support them. It was voted, by a majority of 19, on a motion of general Conway, that the war ought no longer to be prosecuted, for the impracticable purpose of subduing the colonies.

The parliamentary tide having thus been turned against the ministers, they reluctantly resigned their offices. The two posts which lord North had so long filled, were transferred to the marquis of Rockingham and lord John Cavendish. Mr. Fox succeeded lord Stormont, as secretary of state for foreign affairs, while the earl of Shelburne superseded the earl of Hillsborough in the home department. Lord Camden was placed at the head of the council; the duke of Grafton became keeper of the privy-seal; the duke of Richmond master of the ordnance; Conway chief commander of the army; and Keppel first lord of the admiralty. These changes happened between the 27th and the 30th of March. It was generally believed, that the illustrious personage, whose consent was necessary in a political revolution of such magnitude, felt no common degree of agitation, in being compelled by the public voice to make an entire change in his councils. Yet the greater part of the nation were sincerely gratified. So many individuals of eminent abilities, and patriotic principles, had never before met in one administration. The first business which engaged their attention was a general pacification; and, two days after he was appointed for the foreign department, Mr. Fox wrote a letter to M. Simolin, the Russian minister in London, acquainting him that his majesty was willing to negotiate for the purpose of bringing about a peace with the Dutch, agreeable to that agreed on between his majesty and the republic, in the year 1674. The states of Holland, however, appearing indisposed to accept of a separate peace, negotiations for a general peace were opened at Paris. Mr. Grenville was appointed to treat with all the belligerent powers; and he received instructions to propose, in the very first instance, the independence of the United Provinces of America, without making it the condition of a general treaty.

Several judicious statutes were passed, in favour of the Irish complainants, and in support of the liberty of the subject, against the influence of the crown. But the marquis of Rockingham did not long enjoy his station. He died about three months after his appointment, respected as a man of honour and integrity, and beloved for his private virtues. He was succeeded by the earl of Shelburne, who, on the resignation of lord John Cavendish, procured for Mr. William Pitt the post of chancellor of the exchequer.

The earl of Shelburne, (afterwards marquis of Lansdown) and distinguished by the ironical cognomen of Malagrida, a pious jesuit, had not yet obtained the confidence of the Whig leaders. Mr. Fox refused to act with him; and retiring from office, renewed his opposition to the court. The true motive of his resignation was his secret wish for the nomination of an ostensible premier, who would submit to be guided by his dictates.

It will now be proper to turn the attention of my readers to such naval and military transactions as took place in the year 1782, and in a particular manner in the West Indies, which, to a considerable extent, was still the threatre of war. The island of St. Nevis surrendered to the arms of the king of France on the 14th of January. The inhabitants received very liberal terms from the marquis de Bouillé and the count de Grasse. The private property of the planters, merchants, and people in general was held sacred; the council was allowed to continue, and the assembly of the island was chosen as usual. The inhabitants were to have the free exercise of their religion; and all officers of civil and criminal courts were to retain their posts, as well as justice be administered in the way previously established in the island, especially with respect to trials by jury. Eight thousand French troops, with a large train of artillery, were landed on the island of St. Christopher about the same time. Admiral Hood endeavoured to relieve it with 22 sail of the line, when he was three different times attacked by the count de Grasse, who had the command of 29 sail of the line, but he was nevertheless beat off with loss. The British had 80 killed, and 260 wounded. After the French effected a landing at St. Christopher's, the superiority of the enemy made brigadier-general Frazer draw in his out-posts, and take his station on Brimstone Hill. An officer was sent by sir Samuel Hood to general Frazer, offering him assistance; and this officer was accompanied by general Prescot. When they landed on the island, the following message was sent by general Frazer to general Prescot: "That as he had taken the trouble to come with troops to his assistance, he should doubtless be glad of the honour of seeing him; but he was in no want of him or his troops." In spite of this high-toned declaration, however, he was under the necessity of capitulating on the 12th of February, when the garrison was permitted to march out with the honours of war. The French, during the same month, likewise obtained possession of Demarara and Essequibo, with a number of British vessels.

Admiral Rodney, on the 19th of the same month, arrived in the West Indies, and took the command of the fleet on that station, at which was assembled a numerous French fleet, with a considerable body of troops, the enemy having already formed the idea of attacking Jamaica. A partial action took place between the two hostile fleets on the 9th of April; during which the Alfred of 74 guns lost her commanders, the Royal Oak of 74 guns was very much disabled, and a number of other ships suffered considerable damage. Sixteen of the British ships were so becalmed, that they were rendered incapable of taking part in the action. The Barfleur, of 98 guns, had, at one time, no fewer than seven ships of the enemy firing upon her, and commonly three. She had eight men killed, and 22 wounded. A general action took place on the 12th of the same month, when admiral Rodney obtained a very splendid and decisive victory over the French fleet, which was commanded by the count de Grasse. The British fleet consisted of 37 sail of the line, and the French of 34. The conflict began about seven in the morning, and continued with unabating fury till half past six in the evening. The British admiral's flag-ship was the Formidable, of 90 guns; and the count de Grasse was on board the Ville de Paris, of 110 guns, a ship presented to the French monarch by the city of Paris. The Formidable fired nearly eighty broadsides in the course of the action; and for three hours she was so completely enveloped in smoke, as to be almost invisible to the officers and men of the rest of the fleet. Sir Samuel Hood commanded the van division of the British fleet, and rear-admiral Drake the rear division; both which officers, during this memorable action, very much distinguished themselves. But the fate of the day was owing to a bold manœuvre of the Formidable, which threw the French fleet into confusion, by breaking their line. The Cæsar, of 74 guns, was the first French ship that struck, whose captain fought with great gallantry, and fell in the action; and when she struck she had not a single foot of canvas, through which a shot had not passed. She unfortunately blew up, however, soon after she was taken, when about 200 Frenchmen perished on board of her, with a British lieutenant and 10 seamen. The British fleet took le Glorieux and le Hector, of 74 guns each, with l'Ardent of 64 guns, and a French 74 was sunk during the engagement. On both sides it was allowed to be a hard-fought battle, although the French in the issue were totally defeated. It was nearly dark when the Ville de Paris struck, in which the count de Grasse had fought with great gallantry, and was wounded in the action. The fleet of the enemy had 5500 troops on board, and both these and the seamen suffered very severely. The British had 230 killed, and 759 wounded. On the 19th of April, a squadron from the main fleet, which was commanded by sir Samuel Hood, took the Cato and Jason, French ships of 64 guns each, with l'Aimable of 32, and Ceres of 18 guns. About the same time, admiral Barrington, while off Ushant, took from the French le Pegase of 74 guns, l'Actionnaire of 64, and ten sail of vessels under convoy.

From the glory which the state and nation had acquired from these naval actions, and the exploits performed by our commanders in the West Indies, we must carry our attention for a moment to a signal loss, by which our prosperous fortune was alloyed. The fort of St. Philip's in Minorca, we have seen, was opened in the late autumn, under very favourable auspices. It was garrisoned at first with only 2692 men of all descriptions, including 400 invalids; a force not half sufficient to mount its extensive works. The besiegers, on the other hand, were 16,000 strong; and had 106 pieces of cannon, and 36 mortars. Such a disparity, with despair of relief, were alone sufficient to damp the spirit of a less resolute governor; but their formidable appearance had as little influence on the minds of general Murray and his garrison, as the bribes offered him had on his fidelity. He even dared to make a sally on the besiegers. The troops employed in it, attacking the duke de Crillon in his head-quarters at cape Mola, drove him from his post, and returned with 100 prisoners to fort St. Philip's. But an evil more fatal than the enemy's warlike apparatus afflicted the garrison. Such was the effect which excessive heat, the damp air in the subterraneous works, the want of vegetables, and extreme fatigue, had on the health of the troops, that, in the course of five months, they were reduced to 660 effective men. To persist in the defence of a fortress, under these circumstances, would have been making a wanton sacrifice of men, whose services had merited a far better fate. Therefore the governor, reflecting on the strength and resources of the besiegers, and the miserable condition of his garrison, consented to a capitulation, by which he obtained all that he asked, except the article by which he would have freed his forces from the mortification of being considered as prisoners of war; which the duke de Crillon was not empowered to grant. The emaciated troops, then marching through a line formed by the Spanish army, deposited their arms in the place appointed; supported, amidst their adverse fortune, by a consciousness of having bravely discharged their duty.—Nihil quisquam locutus indignum, et, quanquam inter adversa, salva virtutis fama. It deserves to be recorded, for the honour of human nature, that some of the Spaniards were seen to shed tears at the sight of their vanquished and afflicted adversaries, and that our sick men experienced every humane attention from the enemy.

Elated with success, to which his arms had for ages been unaccustomed, the Spanish monarch proceeded, in the animation which it inspired, to prosecute with redoubled force and ardour the operations for the reduction of Gibralter, the favourite object of his wishes. The fortress having bid defiance to the efforts of our enemies, in the usual method of carrying on sieges, and the brave and upright governor having foiled every artifice to corrupt his integrity, their ingenuity was now exerted in devising a new mode of attack, which it was thought would render the force brought against it absolutely irresistible. The author of this invention was the chevalier d'Arcon, who had signalized himself at the siege of St. Philip's.

The rock of Gibralter runs from north to south, projecting into the sea several miles from the continent, to which it is connected by an isthmus of low sand. It is a part of the province of Andalusia in Spain. From the perpendicular front to the north, which is of various heights, to the southernmost point, which is called Europa Point, the distance is 2350 fathoms, or something more than two miles and a half. The base of the rock, on the north front, is 475 toises, or 950 yards, and the extreme breadth, taking it from the New Mole to the Mediterranean side, is 800 toises, or 1600 yards. It is inaccessible for the whole length of its escarpment on the east, or Mediterranean side, which is called the back of the rock. The north front, perpendicular towards the isthmus, is equally inaccesssible, and the edge of this perpendicular escarpment is occupied by twelve batteries, commanding the isthmus. The front to the west, and the bay, is a gradual slope, and almost generally of easy access. There are several roads on that side the rock, which render the communication with the higher parts so easy, that cannon can be dragged up with the greatest facility. All these communications are open, and without retrenchments, except that part of the lines which flanks the entrance to Land Port and the Inundation. It is at the foot of this accessible slope, that the town and garrison are placed. The town is closed, on the side of the bay, by an irregular long wall, the defences of which are so inconsiderable, as to admit of easy approach. The flanks, in short, are not by any means proportioned to the line of defence.

From the town to the New Mole there is but little disputable ground. Between the New Mole and Europa Point there are several accessible places, where an enemy may land, and where some hundreds of men may form, without being immediately dislodged; a circumstance which would consequently create a considerable diversion in the garrison. But these walls and lodgements are washed by the sea, which greatly protects them. This front indeed is so vulnerable, that it belies the commonly-received idea of the impregnability of the rock, which its general appearance to the eye so naturally suggests.

There are two ways of entering the town from the isthmus, one under the escarpments on the cause-way, the other under those of the lines, which lead to the glacis that covers the low front, presenting a curtain with two half bastions, on which are mounted twenty-six pieces of heavy artillery, besides the protection already mentioned, of the flanking lines.

To the south, the town is terminated by a retrenchment, flanked by a bastion on the west side, a flat bastion in the centre, and a demi-bastion which commands both. The post of Wind-mill Hill possesses several local advantages, of which sufficient avail has never yet been taken.

The garrison had, from long habitude, by this time, become inured to every species of danger and fatigue. They had hitherto braved the hardships of the siege with unparalleled firmness and alacrity, animated by the noble consciousness of fighting for the honour of their country. For a series of several months, they had not enjoyed above one night's uncertain repose in three, to refit them for the arduous duties of their several stations. The British and Hanoverian soldiers, however, though unaccustomed to shrink from danger, to repine at hard fare, or complain of excessive labour, could not bear the idea of being perpetually exposed to the enemy's fire, even in the hour of repose, and of necessary relaxation from the fatigues of duty. This reflection began to make a sensible and melancholy impression upon the minds of the soldiery, and became the object of serious attention with the governor, ever alive to the voice of complaint, and ever vigilant in his designs upon the enemy. It became his anxious wish to remove the cause of apprehension in his garrison, before it could be realised, by the opening of the battery d'empotrada upon the camp.

The Spaniards had now been employed nearly thirteen months on their advanced works. The nature of the soil, and the downward fire from the garrison, by whom all their operations were seen, rendered their progress laborious, tedious, and dangerous. It was impossible to sink the trench in the sand, under which they found water at the depth of three feet.

It was therefore necessary to construct all these works with an enormous quantity of chandeliers, and large beams in the form of frames, and with a vast number of fascines and sand-bags. They at length, however, completed this formidable front, the epaulements of which were 22 feet high, defended by several flanks. These communications, together with an infinite number of traverses, and three large powder-magazines, they constucted under an unremitting fire from the garrison, with unexampled coolness and perseverance.

The army of the besiegers was now 14,000 strong, and their ordnance pointed against the garrison formidable in the extreme.

About this time, information from various quarters uniformly concurred in assuring the general, that the enemy, considering the garrison as few in number, debilitated by the scurvy, and wearied out with fatigue, concluded that the British soldiers were not in a condition for active enterprise; and laying aside, therefore, every apprehension of danger to their works from that quarter, gave themselves up to a degree of listlessness and indolence, perfectly inconsistent with the first principles of military discipline.

On the evening of the 20th of November, two deserters from the Walloon guards came in at Land Port, and were immediately conducted to the governor's head-quarters. One of them was a corporal, a shrewd intelligent fellow. He was a man of such observation as to be perfectly versed in the detail and disposition of the enemy's works, guards, and forts.

He brought with him a rough sketch of the advanced works, drawn by himself, with a common pen, upon the spot; but sufficiently correct to convey a satisfactory idea of them, and to elucidate his own deposition, which was that night taken down by the town-major. It was so clear and distinct, that a correct plan of the Spanish camp, night-guards, and out-posts from Algeziras to fort Barbara, might have been made out from it. So well informed was he, and so accurate in every thing he advanced upon that occasion, that he never once contradicted himself in the most trivial circumstance, through a continued series of cross-examination. This deserter attended the governor to Willis's, where he further described to him various parts of the enemy's works and camp.

The perfect coincidence of the various information which the governor had, through different channels, obtained, describing the carelessness with which the night-duty was carried on in the enemy's camp and works, suggested the idea of a sortie, which, under other circumstances, could not have been hazarded, consistently with the safety of the garrison.

There can be little doubt but general Elliot, ever since the apprehensions of the soldiery reached his ear from the effect of the battery d'empotrada, had revolved in his mind the practicability of destroying these works of the enemy, and formed in secret that plan, which he executed with the caution and firmness which so peculiarly characterized him. The present, from a fortunate concurrence of circumstances, seemed to be the opportunity the most favourable for carrying such a great and hazardous enterprise into effect.

The governor, therefore, having digested his plan in his own capacious and enlightened mind, and having weighed every step that ought to be taken to insure success, committed to paper the necessary instructions for the different officers who were to be leading agents in its execution.

Early in the afternoon of the 26th of November, all the houses where wine and spirits were retailed out to soldiers, were shut up, to prevent every degree of intoxication in the garrison; and, a little after sun-set, orders were issued for a detachment to parade at midnight on the red-sands. Meanwhile, all the general officers in the garrison were summoned to attend the governor at the field-officer's room to the southward, where every other officer who was to be entrusted with any particular command in this important enterprise was present. The governor then opened his design, read his plan, and gave his instructions to the executive officers, who were required to propose whatever alterations they thought should be made in that part of the disposition which regarded their own command; to many of which alterations the governor agreed, by this means rendering those gentlemen more particularly interested in the success of the enterprise.

Tools of all kinds, for demolishing the enemy's works, were delivered to the workmen, and the following directions for their destination communicated to the principal officers:

"The right column to lead, and to march through Forbes's Barrier, for the extremity of the parallel, keeping the eastern fences of the gardens close on the left hand. The centre immediately to follow, marching through Bay-side Barrier, and directing their course through the middle of the gardens, to the object of their destination. The left column to follow the centre through Bay-side Barrier, then to march to their destination, keeping the western fences of the gardens on their right hand.

"When the rear of the right column has got clear of Forbes's, and the rear of the left clear of Bay-side, the heads of the three columns are, as much as circumstances will admit, to be found in a line, and to march on so as to arrive at their different points of attack at the same time.

"No person to advance before the front on any pretence whatever, unless commanded so to do by the officer leading the column. The most profound silence to be observed, as the success of the enterprise may depend thereon.

"The troops of the right column, preceding the workmen and artillery, are destined to attack and force the eastern parallel of the enemy's approaches.

"The troops of the centre column, preceding the workmen and artillery, are destined to attack and force the two mortar-batteries.

"The troops of the left column, preceding the workmen and artillery, are to attack and force the two six-gun batteries.

"The troops appointed to each particular attack are to form in a line as soon as they arrive at a proper distance from the several objects, and as the ground will permit.

"The workmen and artillery are to form in divisions. The 12th, and Hardenberg's regiments, composing the sustaining corps, are to form in one line to the front, and to be ready to detach to the right or left, as occasion may require.

"The reserve, after having assisted in the storm, and the works are carried, to form in the farthest gardens, at some distance in the rear of the sustaining corps. The grenadiers of the 56th and 58th, in the centre; the light company of the 56th, fronting to the east; and the light company of the 58th, fronting to the west.

"As soon as the different works are carried, the troops that have performed these services are to form, and take up their ground in the following manner, in order to cover their several working parties and artillery:

"Of the right column, the grenadiers of Reden's and La Motte's are to form behind the parallel.

"Of the centre column, the light companies and grenadiers of the 39th and 73rd regiments are to form along the front and communication of the fourth branch of approach.

"Of the left column, the grenadiers and the light company of the 72nd regiment are to post themselves behind the westernmost six-gun battery, covering their right flank with the fourth long breach of approach, and with their left to the gun battery close to the beach."

The point of attack assigned to each column, was the precise spot where the enemy's guards were posted, that the suddenness of the danger might put it out of their power to reflect, and to take any defensive measures that might essentially retard the progress of the assailants.

By the time the above destination of the columns was made known to the different officers, and other necessary arrangements had taken place, the morning of the 27th was pretty far advanced. At about a quarter before three o'clock, the moon had nearly set, and that darkness was coming on, indispensably necessary to the successful execution of the enterprise. At this time it was that the detachment began its march, by files from the right of the rear line, for the attack. Although nothing could exceed the order and silence of the troops, when the right hand column had got near the gardens, they were three times challenged by one of the enemy's advanced sentries, but no answer being returned, he immediately fired at the column, and retired some paces, when he fired a second shot. The column kept moving forwards.—A second sentry discharged his piece, and retired. Lieutenant-colonel Hugo, finding the enemy alarmed, immediately formed the attacking corps, and pushed on for the eastern parallel. When they came near, a third centinel fired at them; upon which the grenadiers returned the fire, and leapt into the works. The enemy fled in that quarter, without attempting further opposition. The workmen immediately began to dismantle that part of the works, and the artillery soon after set them on fire.

Part of Hardenberg's regiment, attached to this column, owing to the darkness of the morning, found themselves with the storming party of the centre column, in front of the St. Carlos battery. In this situation, immediately before the centre of the left flank of the battery, no alternative remained but pushing forward, which they did in the most gallant manner, receiving at the same time a discharge of three rounds of musquetry from the enemy defending that flank. Upon their mounting the parapet, the enemy precipitately gave way, when the Hanoverians, with considerable difficulty, descended the stupendous work, forming with their left to the tower. They were thus situated when lieutenant-colonel Dachenhausen, at the head of the 39th flank companies, got over the St. Carlos battery, and naturally mistaking them for Spaniards, fired upon them, and wounded several. Further mischief was, however, prevented by the counter-sign. The grenadiers of La Motte's and Reden's, after having stormed the eastern parallel, and dislodged the enemy from the centre guard-house, formed in the rear of the parallel, fronting towards the enemy's lines.

The centre column was fired at as soon as it entered the gardens, and the enemy's outsentries continued firing and retreating as it advanced. When the column had got near the St. Carlos battery, a smart fire was for a short time kept up by the enemy from their flanks; but the storming party at the head of the column, consisting of the 39th and 73rd flank companies, with the 56th and 58th grenadiers, commanded by lieutenant-colonel Dachenhausen and major Maxwell, rushing forward, soon drove them from their works. How to descend into the battery now became a matter of some difficulty; for from the scaffold on the inside to the platform of the batteries, the height was eighteen feet, and the enemy had removed the steps or ladders by which they mounted to the scaffold. Some of the most active of the British having leaped down upon the sand, their comrades followed the example, and they were immediately masters of the work.

The left hand column proceeded according to instructions, and possessed themselves of the two-gun batteries without much resistance, in which they took prisoners several Spanish grenadiers. Such were the spirit and activity with which lieutenant-colonel Trigge, at the head of the 58th light infantry, and the flank companies of the 72nd regiment, pushed on to the two-gun batteries on the side of the bay, that the enemy were incapable of making any resistance, but fled with the greatest precipitation; and several Spanish grenadiers were afterwards taken prisoners in their splinter-proofs, where they had been asleep when the British troops entered the batteries. All their batteries were constructed with splinter-proofs, capable of containing a very great number of men.

The sailors belonging to the left column, to be employed as workmen, mistook their way, and made for the mortar-batteries, so that the gun-batteries were not destroyed as soon as the others: but this mistake being rectified, the seamen proceeded to demolish them with an increased impetuosity, and the batteries were speedily on fire.

The ardour of the assailants was irresistible. The enemy on all sides fled, abandoning with the utmost precipitation those works, which it had cost them so much labour, and so much blood and treasure to erect.

When the British troops had taken possession, the attacking corps formed, agreeably to their orders, to repel any attempt which the enemy might make to prevent the total destruction of their works, whilst the 12th regiment took post in front of the St. Carlos battery, to sustain the western attack; and the reserve, under major Maxwell, drew up in the gardens nearest the Spanish works.

The 12th regiment and Hardenberg's were drawn up with considerable intervals between the companies, that the artificers and pioneers might retire between the intervals, in case of being forced back, and that their retreat might be thus effected without loss or confusion.

Captain Curtis, commander of the squadron, went out in the sortie as a volunteer, and, with lieutenants Muckle and Campbell under his command, led on the volunteer seamen. Such indeed was the general ardour to partake in this bold enterprise, that every man considered himself as unfortunate; who was obliged to remain behind within the walls of the garrison.

The exertions of the seamen, artillery, and artificers, upon the enemy's works, were astonishing. The batteries were soon in a state for the fire-faggots to operate, and the flames spread with astonishing rapidity into every part. The column of fire and smoke which rolled from the works, grandly illuminated the troops and neighbouring objects, forming altogether a coup-d'œil, which it is impossible by language to describe, and of which the pencil of the painter alone can convey an adequate idea.

Ten brass thirteen-inch sea-mortars, and eighteen brass twenty-six pounders were spiked by the artillery-men in the enemy's works. Amongst the latter were the six guns mounted d'empotrada. About the time that the fire was spreading along the batteries, in spiking one of the mortars in the St. Carlos battery, an explosion took place, by which some of the workmen were hurt.

In an hour, the object of the sortie was fully effected, and trains being laid to the magazines, brigadier Ross ordered the advanced corps to withdraw, and the sustaining regiments to cover their retreat. They retired with the most perfect deliberation, and in the best order; but, by some oversight, the barrier at Forbes's was locked after the flank companies had returned, which might have proved of serious consequences to Hardenberg's regiment, had the enemy attempted to annoy the retreat, as the Hanoverians were obliged, from that circumstance, to follow the 12th regiment through Bay-side. The whole detachment had got back into the town in less than two hours from the time of its sally.

Several small quantities of powder took fire whilst the detachment was on its retreat; and just as the rear had got within the garrison, the principal magazine blew up with a tremendous explosion, throwing up vast pieces of timber, which, falling into the flames, increased the general conflagration.

The British carried with them into the garrison nineteen prisoners, and themselves sustained no other loss than that of four men killed, and one officer and twenty-five others wounded.

Lieutenant Tweedie received a grape-shot in the thigh, immediately as the 12th regiment had formed in front of the St. Carlos battery. This gallant officer, after having received the shot which broke his thigh, supported himself in his post, on the other knee and his spontoon, and in this position he was first discovered by general Eliott, as he was passing along the front of the regiment.—The general asked him, Why he was in that situation? To which Mr. Tweedie coolly replied, That he was wounded. The general immediately ordered him to be assisted, and conveyed to the garrison, not without betowing due praise upon his gallantry and resolution.

The only man of the detachment who did not return into the garrison, was a private of the 73rd grenadiers. This man was one of the first to mount the battery, where he encountered with the Spanish captain of artillery, whom he wounded, and by whom he was wounded in turn. The soldier fell upon the top of the battery, and when the troops were ordered to retire, the flames spread with such rapidity to the spot where he lay, that it was impossible to save him. It is to be regretted that the name of this gallant soldier cannot now be ascertained. It is worthy of being transmitted with honour to posterity, as an incitement to others in a similar situation, to act with a heroism that would well adorn a higher rank.

Although the enemy must have been early alarmed, not the smallest effort was made to save or to avenge the destruction of their works. The fugitives seemed to have communicated a panic to the whole; for their army, though drawn out under arms in the front of their camp, remained silent and inactive spectators of the conflagration. Instead of materially annoying the British detachment from the flanking forts, which might have been done with very great effect, they directed the fire from their lines chiefly towards the town and upper batteries, from whence a warm and well-served discharge of round shot was returned upon their forts and barrier. To the latter, indeed, the fire from the garrison was chiefly directed, to prevent the camp from detaching any troops to the support of the party in the advanced works, which would have been thus rendered a service of very peculiar danger.

With respect to the number of the enemy in their advanced batteries at the time of the sortie, different statements have been made. It was a generally received opinion in the garrison at the time, that the Spanish guard consisted only of one captain, three subalterns, and 74 privates, including the artillery. Though even this small force, in such strong works, might have kept any numbers at bay, till a reinforcement had been sent from the lines; yet, for the glory of the enterprise, it becomes satisfactory to state, from the best authority, that the enemy's force was much more considerable. The following return was communicated, some time afterwards, by a relation to the commander-in-chief of the Spanish camp, and may be relied on as authentic.

Spanish Guard in the Advanced Works.

One company of militia grenadiers -	100
One ditto of Walloon guards - -	100
Three companies of artillery, of 70 men each - -	210
Total	410

That the Spaniards never entertained the smallest apprehension of a sortie from the garrison, was evident from the circumstances in which they were found; for even four hundred men were but a weak guard for works of such importance and extent. The chief commandant of the Spanish camp, too, was sleeping that night at St. Roque, two miles distant from his post; and in one of the splinter-proofs of the batteries was found the report of the commanding officer, which, when the guard was relieved, was to have been sent to the Spanish general. The report expressed, "that nothing extraordinary had happened," which clearly evinces the unmilitary state of security in which the Spaniards conceived themselves to be.

It is a known fact, by the acknowledgment of several persons of distinction in the Spanish army, that the construction and materials of these works, destroyed by the fire, cost the enormous sum of thirteen millions of large piastres, (equal to three millions sterling) besides the considerable loss of 5000 men, killed by the fire from the garrison, and who died of distempers occasioned by excessive fatigue and unwholesome air, which prevailed in the sands almost the whole year.

General Eliott's anxiety on the occasion would not permit him to await the issue in the garrison, but as he had given the command of the enterprise to brigadier-general Ross, he went out merely as a volunteer. He probably considered it as his duty to be on the spot, lest any fatal accident should befal the brigadier. Acquainting the lieutenant-governor, therefore, with his intention, he accompanied the sortie. By the time the advanced corps had got possession of the works, the general was in the front of the St. Carlos battery, where he remained till the retreat of the detachment.

Brigadier Ross did not know of general Eliott's intention to go out, and as the latter followed the detachment, the former was not acquainted with the circumstance till the service was nearly performed. General Ross, with the utmost activity, had gone in person through the whole of the enemy's works, and after they had been carried, and the troops had formed, upon his returning to take post in front of the 12th regiment, general Eliott was pointed out to him, standing at the foot of the battery. The general soon after accosted the brigadier, who had expressed marks of surprise at seeing him, by asking him in an easy pleasant way, What he thought of the business, and if it was not something extraordinary that they should have gained the enemy's works so easily? The brigadier briskly replied to the general, That the most extraordinary thing was to see him there.

There was something noble in general Eliott's resolution to be present in the sortie, and something equally so in his manner of doing it. As the command had been publicly given to general Ross, he would not hurt the feelings of that officer, by going out at the head of the detachment; he therefore contented himself with following it; and with a magnanimity worthy of him, he at all times imputed that merit to the brigadier and his detachment, which they so fully deserved, but a great share of which certainly attached to the projector of the enterprise.

In the spot where general Eliott stood, it was that the principal defence had been made, and after the works had been carried, and while the workmen were employed in firing them, his humanity led him to see that all possible attention was paid to the wounded, whether of his own troops or those of the enemy. Amongst them, and almost expiring, he found an elegant young man, who was known by his uniform to be a captain of the Spanish artillery. The general spoke to him with the tenderness which such a scene naturally inspires in a brave mind, and assuring him of all possible assistance, ordered him to be removed, as the fire was spreading rapidly to the spot where he lay. The Spaniard endeavoured to raise himself from the ground, and with the most expressive action, feebly articulated, No sir, no—leave me—let me perish amidst the ruins of my post. An officer remained near him a few minutes, until he expired. It was afterwards found, that he had commanded the guard of the St. Carlos battery, and gallantly maintained his ground, until his men, finding themselves overpowered, threw down their arms, and deserted him. He reproached their baseness, and exclaiming, At least one Spaniard shall die honourably,—rushed down from the top of his work amongst the attacking column, and fell where he was found, at the foot, and in front of the battery which he guarded. It was much lamented by general Eliott, and the officers of the detachment, that any doubt should have existed of the name of this gallant man; they believed it to have been Don Joseph Barboza; but there is still an uncertainty, which his countrymen will perhaps one day feel it their duty to remove.

Two Spanish officers were carried prisoners into the garrison. The one was baron Von Helmstadt, an ensign in the Walloon guards, with the rank of captain; the other, Don Vincente Friza, a lieutenant of artillery.

Baron Helmstadt having been severely wounded by a musquet shot in one of his knees, was found lying upon the platform of the St. Carlos battery, by two British artillery soldiers, who, moved with generous compassion at his situation, resolved to rescue him from his impending fate. They took him up in their arms, and carried him out of the battery, where he must soon have perished in the flames. Unwilling to leave him upon the sands in his helpless state, they determined upon carrying him into the garrison. They were executing their noble purpose, when they met with lieutenant Cuppage of their own corps, who, while he bestowed the warmest encomiums upon his men for their humanity, himself assisted in the generous office which it suggested. With every possible tenderness they conveyed the wounded prisoner to the barriers, where they did not arrive till two hours after the whole detachment had retired. During this time they had been exposed to the fire of the enemy's lines, and had been reported in the garrison as lost. Having presented themselves at the barrier, and being admitted, they passed through the different guards amidst the mingled admiration and applause of the whole; till they reached the garrison hospital, where they deposited the baron. On such an instance of humanity, the mind dwells with an applauding rapture. While strongly characteristic of the generous disposition of a British soldier towards a vanquished enemy, it dignifies human nature, and illumines the rugged front of war with the radiant emanations of philanthropy. To the feelings of a British officer, any eulogium upon an exercise of his humanity would wear the appearance of an insult. Generosity to a conquered enemy is a distinguishing feature in the military character of this country; and it seems indeed to be an axiom established by the stamp of Omnipotence itself, that the most generous are invariably the most brave. To the two soldiers the same considerations of delicacy do not so strongly apply as to their officer, and it becomes the peculiar duty of the historian to snatch from oblivion the names of two men, whose feelings were equally an honour to their profession and their species. They were named Campbell and Paton, two privates in the second battalion of the royal regiment of artillery.

The wound in the baron's knee was deemed incurable, and it was not without great reluctance that he submitted to an amputation. When the surgeons first informed him that an operation was absolutely indispensable, he resolutely opposed it. Amputation, he said, seldom succeeded in Spain; besides, he was then betrothed in marriage to a lady, and would rather risk his life than present himself before her with only one leg. The governor, being told of this determination, immediately visited the baron, and used every argument to persuade him to comply. His mistress, the general kindly urged, must undoubtedly esteem him the more for the honourable wound which he had received in the service of his sovereign; and as to the operation being fatal, he might almost assure himself of a certain recovery, since, in the many similar cases which had occurred in the garrison during the siege, the surgeons had been generally successful;—and to convince him by ocular proof, several mutilated convalescents were ordered into the room. This generous attention of the governor had a powerful effect upon the baron, and he at length consented to the operation. The day after it was performed, he was visited by the governor, whom, upon entering his apartment, he addressed in these words,—Ha! mon general! me voici un vieillard!

It must be satisfactory to pursue the account of this unfortunate young officer without interruption. For many days after the amputation, there was every prospect of his doing well; but, on the 28th of December, about a month after the operation had been performed, he died of an inflammatory fever. During his illness, flags of truce were daily passing and repassing, to inform his friends of his situation, who were not inattentive to him. They sent him fowls, and refreshments of different kinds, with a supply of money.

On the 29th, about noon, his body was conveyed from the hospital to the New Mole, with every mark of military honour. The grenadier company of the 12th regiment accompanied it, and the governor, major-general de la Motte, captain Curtis, and their suites, with Don Vincente Friza, joined in the procession. As the corpse was deposited in the boat, the 12th grenadiers fired three vollies over it, and the town-major and secretary accompanied it. Sir Charles Knowles and the adjutant-general preceded, in a barge carrying a flag of truce, and delivered the corpse to the enemy, who in the same manner met them upon the occasion half way over the bay. Every thing sent by his friends, and left unused by the baron in his sickness, was also returned, even to the minutest article.

In the beginning of April it was that a new spirit seemed to have been infused into the Spanish camp. His catholic majesty, mortified at the disgrace that had been brought upon his arms, and the great loss he had sustained by the sortie in the month of November, publicly declared his determination to have Gibralter at all events, cost what it would. It was now that they were to prepare for that grand attack by sea and land, which had so long been projected, and the ultimate success of which, the Spanish nation would not, for a moment, allow themselves to doubt.

The duke de Crillon, to whom the garrison of Minorca had surrendered on the 15th of February preceding, was destined to take upon him the command of this mighty enterprise, and he was now preparing for the execution of it, flushed by recent victory, and confident of success. In the conquest of Minorca, however, there was but little to boast of, as a soldier could not reasonably plume himself upon vanquishing an hospital; though the brave men which it contained had, under the command of general Murray, made a very spirited defence. To the garrison of fort St. Philip, consisting of considerably less than 1000 sickly and decrepid soldiers and seamen, pent up in confined and untenable works, was opposed a vigorous and well-appointed army of 14,000 men. Such was the distressing appearance of the British garrison, when they marched out with the honours of war, that many of the Spanish and French troops were said to have shed tears of compassion as they passed them. Such at least was the generous testimony of the duc de Crillon, and baron de Falkenhayn, the French commandant.

On such a conquest, therefore, the duke could not much pride himself, nor from thence anticipate the event of his vast projects against Gibralter. This conquest, however, unimportant as it was, seemed to re-animate the Spanish camp, perhaps chiefly from the proof which it gave, that a British garrison might at length be subdued by sickness and fatigue.

It was said that his catholic majesty, in proof of his approbation of the conduct of the duc de Crillon, added to his other titles that of duc de Mahon; but that great general aimed at another, still more flattering to his military pride: he hoped that the conquest of Gibralter would give him a claim to add the name of that rock to his titles; a conquest which, as he had no doubt of achieving, he thought would rank him as the first general of his age. This ambition, though, as the event proved, extravagant, yet in a soldier was laudable; and the duc de Crillon had proved himself to be not unworthy of general estimation. During the siege at Minorca he had acted with spirit and judgment; and, after the surrender of the garrison, he behaved with humanity and moderation.

On the 9th of April, a line of battle-ships, with seven large vessels and tartans, arrived in the bay from the west, and anchored at Algeziras. A rumour of the intended attack by sea had reached the garrison of Gibralter, which induced the governor and chief engineer to direct their attention principally to the sea line, and some little improvements in that quarter were consequently made.

On the 14th, several of the large ships at Algeziras struck their yards and top-masts, and a great number of men appeared to be employed on board of them; circumstances which left the garrison no room to doubt that they were intended to be fitted as floating batteries for the grand attack. Parties of workmen were constantly employed upon them, in opening port-holes, and covering their larbourd sides with junk, which from its elasticity they no doubt imagined capable of of resisting shot. The enemy seemed likewise busily employed in landing cannon and military stores beyond Point Mala. The buz of mighty preparation, in short, seemed to go through their whole camp.

The garrison were no longer doubtful of the intentions of the Spaniards. They saw that a vigorous attack by sea was meditated, and they calmly prepared for the event. At this time there were upwards of a hundred pieces of cannon in the artillery-park of the enemy.

On the 25th it was that the engineers began to mine a gallery from a place above Farringdon's battery (Willis's) to communicate through the rock to a notch or projection of the rock, below Green's Lodge, in which the governor purposed to construct a battery.

In the end of May, several Corsicans arrived at Gibralter to offer their services to general Eliott, by whom they were very graciously received, and afterwards formed into an independent corps, the command of which was given to signor Leonetti, nephew to general Paoli.

On the 26th of May, a large fleet appeared from the East, upwards of 100 sail of which in the evening entered the bay, and anchored between the river Palamones and Algeziras.

Amongst these were three large men of war, one of which had a flag at her mizen; the rest were vessels with troops and military stores. On the three succeeding days they landed twelve battalions, making in all near 9000 men. As the troops disembarked, they encamped in the rear of the second line, extending towards Buena Vista, which had been fitted up for the commander-in-chief's quarters.

On the 28th of this month, a flag of truce came from the enemy, with a letter from Mr. Anderson, a merchant, who had left the garrison a few days before, and was taken on his passage to Faro. Before the purport of the flag was known, the governor, speaking to the officers near him, said, He supposed the duke had arrived, and now sent to summon the garrison—his answer should be short—no, no; and addressing himself to the officers present, he hoped the gentlemen would all support him.

The exertions of the enemy in their camp, and amongst their shipping, were prodigious, and vessels of all kinds were daily arriving in the bay, laden with materials for the siege.

On his majesty's birth-day, the last of the garrison gun-boats was launched. They were twelve in number, three carrying a 24-pounder each, and the rest 18-pounders. They were manned from the Brilliant and Porcupine frigates, and Speedwell cutter, with twenty-one men each.

For some time past the enemy had almost discontinued their labours in their advanced works, and their fire upon the garrison was considerably slackened. This interval of tranquillity the governor employed with indefatigable zeal in repairing and improving the works of the garrison.

On the 11th of June, a shell from the enemy fell through the splinter-proof, at the door of the magazine on Princess Anne's Battery, (Willis's) and bursting, communicated with the powder, which instantly blew up. The explosion was so violent as to shake the whole rock, and throw the materials on both sides to an almost incredible distance into the sea. The battery was very materially injured, and 14 men were unfortunately killed, and 15 wounded, by the accident. Immediately after the report of the explosion, and upon the appearance of the column of smoke, the enemy gave a loud huzza; their drums beat to arms in their camp, and they kept up a brisk cannonade upon the spot where the accident happened for the remainder of the day.

On the 14th a French frigate, with eighteen or nineteen polacres, &c. arrived in the bay, from which was landed a body of French troops; and on the 16th a new camp was observed between the grand magazine and the Orange Grove. On the succeeding day another French convoy, of upwards of sixty sail, arrived from the eastward, filled with French troops, computed to amount to 5000 men. On the 20th and 21st they disembarked, and encamped to the eastward of the stone quarry, immediately under the queen of Spain's chair.

Several general officers, both Spanish and French, about this time frequently visited the lines, and some of them occasionally came out to view the advanced works. The enemy's fire at this time was extremely inconsiderable, and on the evening of the 22nd it totally ceased. At this period it was that the duc de Crillon arrived in the camp, to take upon him the command of the combined army.

From this period the blockade was converted into a spirited siege, and all those vast projects for the reduction of this fortress, which had been so long agitated, were to be carried into vigorous effect.

The duc de Crillon was attended by Monsieur d'Arcon, a French engineer of reputation, who came to execute the floating batteries according to the plan which he had given to the Spanish court, and according to which they were to be constructed upon principles that were to render them insubmersible and incombustible.

This operation of the attack by sea had long been unanimously agreed upon, and no other question remained but respecting the means projected by M. d'Arcon for executing it. His plan was judged to be very simple, and was approved by all the Spanish ministers; but he stated in the memoir which he gave in with it, that it would never succeed, unless a number of national volunteers would adopt it, and execute it, at their own risk, with all the confidence inspired by a thorough conviction.

The treasures of Spain, however, were to be lavished in these preparations, the impression of which, it was believed, that Gibralter could not resist for four and twenty hours. The most powerful means possible were to be put in practice, pour conbuter, (according to the Spanish phrase) to overpower this fortress, there certainly never was an instance of such a formidable force, and great preparations, as those of the besiegers before Gibraltar. Almost all the cannon and howitzers upon the isthmus battered the place d'enfilade, and these, in the old and new batteries of St. Philip and St. Barbara, with that of St. Barbe, and their several communications, amounted to the vast number of 246 pieces. Never was seen collected upon the same front, so vast a quantity of ordnance, while in the attack by sea 213 other pieces of artillery were to be employed, which were to take the works of the garrison in reverse, and by a ricochetting fire, increase the means of destruction. All their batteries were to combine in the demolition of the walls and flanks, whilst the other part of their force was to be employed in ravaging the interior defences, in order to expose and sweep away the soldiers of the garrison.

General Eliott, with a firm and equal mind, beheld the operations of the enemy. He felt all their strength; he anticipated every thing; and without giving the least ground of suspicion to the besiegers, he made such preparations, and adopted such cautious measures, that the most dreadful display of force must have failed before them. He relied upon himself, he relied upon his garrison, now inured to danger, to repel the most formidable assault which human force and ingenuity could direct against him.

Rear-admiral Buenaventura Moreno was appointed to co-operate with the duke and M. d'Arcon, in the projected attack by sea. The latter, however, now found himself, from the conduct of the Spanish ministry, in such a situation, that although they allowed him certain discretionary powers, yet in case of success, all the glory of the enterprise was to be transferred to others, whilst the disgrace of a miscarriage was to fall solely upon him, as the projector of a scheme which had not been crowned with success.

They proceeded, notwithstanding, with such expedition upon the floating batteries, that, in the beginning of July, the tenth was under equipment. Since the arrival of the duke, their batteries had been wholly silent, notwithstanding which the garrison kept up a brisk discharge, as well upon their lines as their advanced works.

To detail all the preparatory operations of the enemy, would far exceed the bounds of the present work. It has already been observed, that the preparations made for the attack by sea were formidable and immense, and the consequent expence incurred by Spain has scarcely a parallel in history. The activity of the enemy was proportioned to the magnitude of the design, and the attack by land, as an auxiliary operation, was to occupy all the space that the nature of the ground would permit.

The morning of the arrival of Monsieur le comte d'Artois, which happened on the 15th of August, was distinguished by the complete developement of a flying sap of a new kind, the erection of which had been concealed from the garrison by a silence and rapidity of execution as yet unequalled. This was a parallel of 230 toises in length, with a communication or boyau of 630 toises from the place where it was joined to the principal barrier of the lines, the construction of which had required one million six hundred thousand bags of sand, besides an immense quantity of casks employed in the parallel, which was afterwards converted into a battery of 64 cannons, besides howitzers, at the extremity to the south-east, and four batteries of mortars to the north-west.

In one night was this extraordinary work of the epaulement raised to the incredible height of 12 feet, with a proportional thickness of 18 feet. With its communications, traverses, and branches, it formed a prospect equally formidable and surprising. It was calculated, that during the seven hours in which this work was erected, 10,000 men must have been employed upon it. Notwithstanding this immense number at work at one time, no extraordinary noise was heard. In the course of the night a carcase was thrown on the west side of the bay, but nothing of their operations was to be seen in that quarter. The Spaniards must have conceived themselves particularly fortunate, as a brisk fire from the garrison, from the number of men employed in their works, must have proved more than commonly destructive.

General Eliott, and general Green, the chief engineer of the garrison, instantly discovered the design of the enemy by this extension of their works, which was to take in reverse the defences to the sea, in order to co-operate with the floating batteries and bomb-ketches, and thus to place the artillery of the garrison between two fires, when the grand attack should be made.

On the 16th the duc de Bourbon arrived in the enemy's camp; and on the 19th general Eliott received by a flag of truce, the following letter from the duc de Crillon.

"Camp of Buena-Vista, 19th August, 1782.

"Sir,

"His royal highness count d'Artois, who has received permission from the king his brother to assist at the siege, as a volunteer in the combined army, of which their most Christian and Catholic majesties have honoured me with the command, arrived in this camp the 15th instant. This young prince has been pleased, in passing through Madrid, to take charge of some letters which had been sent to that capital from this place, and which are addressed to persons belonging to your garrison. His royal highness has desired that I would transmit them to you, and that to this mark of his goodness and attention, I should add the strongest expressions of esteem for your person and character. I feel the greatest pleasure in giving this mark of condescension in this august prince, as it furnishes me with a pretext, which I have been anxiously looking for these two months that I have been in camp, to assure you of the highest esteem I have conceived for your excellency, of the sincerest desire I feel of deserving yours, and of the pleasure to which I look forward of becoming your friend, after I shall have learned to render myself worthy of the honour, by facing you as an enemy. His highness the duc de Bourbon, who arrived here 24 hours after the count d'Artois, desires also that I should assure you of his particular esteem.

"Permit me, sir, to offer a few trifles for your table, of which I am sure you must stand in need, as I know you live entirely upon vegetables: I should be glad to know what kind you like best. I shall add a few game for the gentlemen of your houshold, and some ice, which I presume will not be disagreeable in the excessive heat of this climate, at this season of the year. I hope you will be obliging enough to accept the small portion which I send with this letter.

"I have the honour to be, &c.

"B. B. Duc de Crillon.

"His excellency general Elliot, &c."

On the 20th, the general returned by a flag the following answer.

"Gibralter, August 20th, 1782.

"Sir,

"I find myself highly honoured by your obliging letter of yesterday, in which your excellency was so kind as to inform me of the arrival in your camp of his royal highness the count d'Artois, and the duke de Bourbon, to serve as volunteers at the siege. These princes have shewn their judgment in making choice of a master in the art of war, whose abilities cannot fail to form great warriors. I am overpowered with the condescension of his royal highness, in suffering some letters for persons in this town to be conveyed from Madrid in his carriages. I flatter myself that your excellency will give my most profound respect to his royal highness, and to the duke de Bourbon, for the expressions of esteem with which they have been pleased to honour so insignificant a person as I am.

"I return a thousand thanks to your excellency, for your handsome present of fruits, vegetables, and game. You will excuse me, however, I trust, when I assure you, that in accepting your present I have broken through a resolution, to which I had faithfully adhered since the beginning of the war; and that was, never to receive or procure, by any means whatever, any provisions or other commodity for my own private use; so that, without any preference, every thing is sold publicly here; and the private soldier, if he has money, can become a purchaser, as well as the governor. I confess, I make it a point of honour to partake both of plenty and scarcity in common with the lowest of my brave fellow-soldiers. This furnishes me with an excuse for the liberty I now take, of intreating your excellency not to heap any more favours upon me of this kind, as in future I cannot convert your presents to my own private use. Indeed, to be plain with your excellency, though vegetables at this season are scarce with us, every man has got a quantity proportioned to the labour which he has bestowed in raising them.

The English are naturally fond of gardening and cultivation; and here we find our amusement in it, during the intervals of rest from public duty. The promise which the duke de Crillon makes, of honouring me in proper time and place with his friendship, lays me under infinite obligations. The interest of our sovereigns being once solidly settled, I shall with eagerness embrace the first opportunity to avail myself of so precious a treasure.

"I HAVE the honour to be, &c.

"G. A. ELIOTT.

"His excellency the duc de Crillon, &c."

ON the morning of the 24th, their new work was completed, and unmasked a battery of 64 guns, with eight howitzers on its left extremity. The plan of operations pursued by the enemy now became apparent to the general, who continued to make every arrangement to defeat it, and who now digested the plan of disposition, in case they should effect a practicable breach. At this period additional forges for heating shot were ordered to be constructed, and grates for that purpose were distributed all along the batteries.

IN the Spanish camp, the successful execution of the sap on the night of the 15th, was looked upon as a fortunate and auspicious event, though the plan of this operation, which had been suggested by M. d'Arcon, had not met with very general approbation, from the great apprehension that was entertained of a considerable loss of men in carrying it into effect.

THE land and sea forces of the besiegers flattered themselves with the hope, that in these preparations the term of their long and glorious labours was drawing to a close; and the solidity and equipment of their new warlike machines inspired them with a degree of confidence, which soon increased to enthusiasm. This spirit produced a competition amongst the officers, who emulously aspired to the honour of conducting these formidable engines in the presence of their enemy. The combined army, in short, flattered themselves that nothing was wanting to their success. They had only, they imagined, to present themselves—Gibralter was to be taken in 24 hours—and thus their confidence approached to infatuation.

FROM the time of the duc de Crillon's arrival before Gibralter, however, a disposition had been made, and was given in the standing orders of the field, in order to prevent a sortie from the fortress, which, notwithstanding its small garrison, the enemy still dreaded, after the disaster which had befallen them on the night of the 27th of November, 1781. This disposition of the besiegers consisted of a reserve of infantry and dragoons, who held themselves always in readiness to act during the night. This body of reserve was posted upon the isthmus behind the lines, or upon the right of the escarpments of the mountain, next the Mediterranean, and behind the parallel, or boyau, according to the discretion of the brigadier who had the command for the night. It was ordered, that in case the garrison should attempt a sortie, he should make a brisk march with his right flank towards the north escarpments, and boldly take post before the pallisade at the head of the moat. As, in that situation, the fire of the garrison would be necessarily suspended upon that spot, for fear of hurting their own men, the Spaniards would risk but little by the manœuvre.

IN the beginning of September, the enemy's works on the land side were every hour advancing to perfection; but the duc de Crillon's attention towards completing them seemed so entirely to engage him, as in a great measure to prevent his taking the necessary precautions for their defence against the batteries of the rock. He seemed to conclude, that the garrison, awed by his mighty preparations, would not be in a condition for any offensive attempt; and relying upon this belief, or never taking it into the account at all, the advanced batteries in the parallel, as well as those in the lines, undergoing alterations and repair, were wholly stript of their ordnance. The forts, and a few mortar-batteries, were of course the only defences left to protect these immense works from insult and attack.

THE practicability of an attempt upon them in this state, strongly suggested itself to lieutenant-general Boyd, the lieutenant-governor, and the honour of the consequent success was peculiarly his own. On the morning of the 6th of September, he recommended, by letter to the governor, the immediate use of red-hot shot against the land batteries of the besiegers. General Eliott readily assented, and major

Lewis, the commandant of artillery, was ordered to wait on general Boyd for his instructions. By the morning of the 8th every thing was ready. At seven in the morning of that day, the firing commenced from all the northern batteries which bore upon the parallel, and was supported through the day with admirable vivacity. The effect of the red-hot shot exceeded expectation. In two hours the Mahon battery of six guns, with the battery of two howitzers on its flank, and great part of the adjoining parallel, were on fire; and the flames, notwithstanding the enemy's exertions to extinguish them, burnt with such rapidity, that the whole of those works were consumed before night. The St. Martin's battery was frequently on fire, but which was as frequently extinguished; and though that of St. Carlos escaped the flames, yet they were both so much deranged, by the breaches made to obstruct the effects of the carcases, &c. that the greater part of them were obliged to be taken down.

The enemy did not return the fire till eight o'clock, and that but faintly, from the seven-gun battery in the lines only. About half past nine St. Philip and St. Barbara, and soon after, eight new mortar batteries in the parallel, were opened upon the garrison. Their tardiness in returning the fire, it was conjectured, was owing to the confused state of their batteries, from the repairs they were undergoing, or to their wanting particular orders how to act, as a general officer was seen to enter their lines at the time the cannonade became general. Their batteries at the time too were unprovided with ammunition, and the discharge of red-hot shot rendered it particularly dangerous to carry it down from the lines.

The loss of the enemy, in sight of the garrison, was very great, as their endeavours to stop the progress of the flames very much exposed them to the fire from the rock. The success of this day was attended with the happiest effects, as it provoked the enemy to open their new mortar batteries before they were perfectly completed, and to recommence a fire from their forts and lines, for which they were by no means prepared.

About four o'clock in the afternoon the firing abated on both sides, and by night-fall it had totally ceased. This judicious plan of attack, suggested by the lieutenant-governor, produced very signal advantages. It in a great measure, by precipitating them, deranged the operations of the duc de Crillon; and it convinced the enemy that the garrison, unawed by their formidable preparations, were still in a state for offensive measures.

The duke, however, seemed resolved to retaliate; for on the succeeding morning, at half past five o'clock, upon two rockets being thrown up from forts St. Philip and Barbara, the enemy began with a flight of shells from all the advanced batteries, to bombard and cannonade the garrison. About a hundred and seventy pieces of ordnance were open; but the effect was not proportionate, for though, at times, from ten to twenty shells were in the air at the same moment, they happily did not produce that material damage which there was reason to expect.

On the same day the enemy's squadron, consisting of seven sail of the line Spanish, and two French, with a large frigate and xebec, taking the advantage of a Levant wind, got under sail from the Orange Grove, and one of them passing slowly within random shot, fired several broadsides upon the south bastion and ragged staff, continuing the cannonade until she had got beyond Europa. The squadron then stood to the eastward of the rock, and forming in a line, the admiral leading, came before the batteries of Europa, and under a very slow sail commenced a fire from all their guns, until the last ship had passed. They repeated this manœuvre at two o'clock on the following morning, and again in the forenoon of the same day. By this sea-attack, however, the works of the garrison were not at all affected. Some of the leading ships came pretty near the point of the first attack; but having been frequently struck from the English batteries, they afterwards kept at a greater distance. Two of the Spanish ships went early that morning to Algeziras to repair. All the batteries at Europa were manned by the marine brigade encamped there, with a small proportion of artillerists. The guns were extremely well laid and pointed; the whole under the immediate command of brigadier Curtis.

About five in the afternoon of the same day, sixteen of the enemy's gun-boats went over from Algeziras, formed in a line, and fired upon the garrison; but in less than an hour were obliged to retire, with very considerable damage.

On the 10th, at morning-gun fire, the discharge from the batteries on the isthmus recommenced. At seven o'clock on that morning, including the expenditure of the 8th, they had discharged 5427 shot, and 2502 shells, exclusive of the fire from the men of war and mortar-boats.

At guard-mounting on the succeeding morning, they re-commenced their cannonade, and in the afternoon of that day detachments of soldiers were seen embarking from the enemy's camp on board their battering-ships. From this it was concluded in the garrison that every thing was ready, and the grand attack about to commence. Land-port and Water-port guards were therefore immediately reinforced; the furnaces and grates for heating shot were lighted, and the batteries ordered to be manned.

While the attention of the garrison was chiefly directed to the sea line, the enemy, immediately after night-fall, attempted to set fire to the pallisades at Bay-side and Forbes's, and in some measure succeeded, as the whole were quickly in flames. The northern guards and piquets were immediately under arms, and a smart discharge of musquetry was directed upon several parties, which by the light of the fire were discovered in the meadows. These parties returned a brisk discharge by platoons upon the Queen's lines, while a greater number of shells than usual were thrown from the enemy's works. Their fire, in the last 24 hours, amounted to 2828 shot, and 1450 shells. On the morning of the 12th, at a quarter past one, when the garrison had scarcely recovered from the alarm on the land side, the enemy's gun and mortar boats appeared off the King's bastion, and Old Mole Head, and began a very warm cannonade on the northern front. As they kept at a considerable distance, the garrison returned their fire very sparingly, and they at length retired.

At seven, A. M. a fleet appeared from the westward, and stood in for the bay. It proved to be the combined fleets of France and Spain, consisting of 38 large ships of the line, besides a great number of smaller vessels. No less than ten admiral's flags and a broad pendant were displayed on board of them. By the afternoon they were all at anchor between the Orange Grove and Algeziras.

The whole force of the allied crowns seemed to have been concentrated in this spot, and such a naval and military spectacle is scarcely to be equalled in the annals of war. Their naval force consisted of 44 large ships of the line, besides three inferior two-deckers, ten battering ships, five bomb-ketches, several frigates and xebecs, a great number of gun and mortar boats, a large floating battery, many armed vessels, and near 300 boats, purposely constructed for carrying troops.

On the 13th of September, at eight in the morning, all the battering ships were put in motion, and advanced to the several stations it had been previously determined they should occupy. They were ten in number.

The Pastora and the Talha Piedra were the first that received the fire from the fortress. The others did not cast anchor till some time afterwards. The admiral placed himself upon the capital of the King's bastion; the other ships extending, three to the southward of the flag, as far as the Church battery; five to the northward, about the height of the Old Mole; and one a little to the westward of the admiral. Twenty-four bomb-ketches also acted in the wings, in the rear of the attack. M. d'Arcon served as a volunteer in the battery Tallia Piedra. By a quarter before ten they had taken their respective stations, at the distance of 1000 or 1200 yards, when a heavy cannonade commenced from all the ships, supported by the cannon and mortars in the enemy's lines and approaches, the object of which clearly was, not to leave the garrison a single point of safety in the space behind the front attacked by the floating batteries. The garrison batteries were opened with hot and cold shot from the guns, and shells from the howitzers and mortars. This firing continued on both sides, without intermission, till noon, when that of the enemy from their ships seemed in a small degree to slacken. About two o'clock the admiral's ship was observed to smoke, as if on fire; and a few men seemed busy upon the roof searching for the cause. The fire from the garrison batteries continued powerful and well-directed, while that from the enemy's ships gradually decreased. About seven in the evening they fired from a few guns, and that only at intervals. At midnight the admiral's ship was plainly discovered to be on fire, and an hour after, the flames burst forth with unconquerable violence. Eight more of the ships took fire in succession. On the preceding evening, when their fire began to slacken, various signals had been made from the southernmost ships, and as the evening advanced, many rockets were thrown up, to inform their friends of their extreme danger and distress. These signals were immediately answered, and the launches, feluccas, and boats of the whole fleet, began to take out the men from on board the burning ships. Many shot were still fired from those in which the flames had yet made no considerable progress; and the fire from the enemy's batteries on shore did not in the least abate. Brigadier Curtis, who, with his squadron of gun-boats, lay ready to take advantage of any favourable circumstance, left the New Mole at two o'clock in the morning, and about three formed a line upon the enemy's flank, advancing and firing with great order and expedition; which so astonished and disconcerted the enemy, that they fled precipitately with all their boats, abandoning the ships, in which some officers and numbers of their men, including many wounded, were left to perish. This must inevitably have been their wretched fate, had they not been dragged from amidst the flames by the personal intrepidity of brigadier Curtis, at the utmost hazard of his own life, —a life pronounced by general Eliott, to be invaluable to his majesty's service. Whilst the brigadier, with his men, was thus generously employed, the flames reached the magazine of one of the battering ships to the northward, which blew up about five o'clock, with a dreadful explosion. In a quarter of an hour after, another, in the centre of the line, met with a similar fate, the wreck from which spread to a vast extent, and involved the gun-boats in the most imminent danger. One of them was sunk by it, and the boat of brigadier Curtis had a hole made in its bottom, by a large splinter; the cockswain at the same instant was killed, and some others of the men wounded, and they were for a considerable time involved in a thick cloud of smoke. The brigadier's barge was only saved from sinking by stopping the hole with the seamen's jackets, until boats arrived to their relief. After this very fortunate escape, it was deemed prudent to withdraw towards the garrison, to avoid the peril threatened by the blowing up of the remaining ships. The brigadier, however, visited two other ships on his return, and landed nine officers, two priests, and 334 private soldiers and seamen, all Spaniards, which, with one Spanish officer and eleven Frenchmen, who had floated on shore upon a piece of wreck on the preceding evening, made the total number saved amount to 357. Many of the prisoners were severely, and some of them dreadfully wounded. They were conveyed to the hospital, where every attention was paid them which humanity could dictate.

In the course of the day, the remaining eight ships severally blew up with violent explosions; one only escaped the effect of the red-hot shot, which it was thought proper to burn, there being no possibility of saving her. The admiral's flag remained flying on board his ship till she was totally consumed.

The loss sustained by the enemy could never be properly ascertained; but from the information of the prisoners, and the numbers seen dead on board the ships, it was estimated at 2000 men, including the prisoners.

The loss of the garrison, on the other hand, when the duration and quantity of the enemy's fire are considered, was almost incredibly trifling. It consisted in one officer, and fifteen men killed; five officers, and sixty-three men wounded.

On the succeeding day a flag of truce went with a letter from general Eliott to the duc de Crillon, and some letters from the Spanish officers, prisoners, were sent by the same conveyance. The gratitude expressed by all the prisoners, for their deliverance from the complicated horrors with which they were surrounded, was gratifying to humanity. They had been led to expect no quarter from the British garrison, an opinion artfully instilled by their officers, to aid their courage by the suggestions of despair.

After the signal failure of their great attempt, the Spaniards probably gave up the hope of reducing Gibralter by force, but they evidently relinquished that hope with great reluctance, for the combined fleets still remained in the bay, with a view to oppose the relief of the garrison, which was about this time to be attempted by lord Howe.

The combined fleets had been reinforced, by the occasional arrival of ships, both of the line and inferior rates. On the evening of the 10th, a very fresh westerly wind set in, which, as the night advanced, increased to a hurricane. In the course of the night many signal guns of distress were fired from the ships of the combined fleet, and at day-break the St. Michael, a Spanish ship, mounting 72 guns, was discovered in a crippled state, close inshore, off Orange's bastion; she was under close-reefed courses, and had lost her mizen top-mast. After having two men killed and two wounded by the garrison batteries, she fell on shore near to the south bastion, and immediately struck her colours. She was soon afterwards taken possession of by captain Curtis, who expeditiously landed the prisoners, and carried out anchors to prevent her going further on shore. She was commanded by Don Juan Moreno, a chief d'Escadre, and had on board about 650 men. She was afterwards got off without having sustained any damage, and was condemned as a lawful prize to the garrison of Gibralter. The fleet of the enemy had suffered very much by the gale; a ship of the line and a frigate were on shore near the Orange Grove, and a French ship of the line had lost her fore-mast and bowsprit. Two others were forced from their anchors, and ran to the eastward.

At three in the afternoon of the 11th, the signals made by the enemy indicated the approach of the British fleet. About sun-set of that day, the Latona frigate anchored under the walls of the garrison, at which time the van of the British fleet was perceived in the Gut. The Spanish admiral shewed no disposition to oppose the reinforcements being thrown into the garrison, but from a want of timely attention to the circumstances of the navigation, only four or five transports could enter the bay. The rest, with the fleet, were obliged to pass to the eastward into the Mediterranean. The fleet consisted of 34 sail of the line, eleven of which were three-deckers, with 6 frigates, and 31 ordnance transports, conveying a reinforcement of upwards of 1600 men for the garrison.

Early in the morning of the 12th, captain Curtis sailed in the Latona, to apprise lord Howe of the situation of the enemy's fleet. At noon of that day, the British squadron appeared in good order off Estepona, or Marbella, and the transports, with the frigates, were working to windward, to gain the bay. As they approached the isthmus, the enemy saluted them from their mortars, and fired upon them from behind the eastern advanced guard-house.

The combined fleets, meanwhile, were very active in repairing their damages, and in forming a line of battle along the shore. In the evening of the 12th, a number of troops were embarked on board them from the camp. At night the Panther man-of-war, with several of the British transports, reached the bay. The enemy persevered in their cannonade from their land batteries, and made some fruitless attempts with shells to burn the St. Michael. The fire from the garrison was more than commonly brisk, as such a material supply of ammunition had been thrown in, and the effects were very perceptible in the enemy's works.

On the 13th of October, the combined fleets weighed anchor, and stood out evidently with an intention of preventing the transports from reaching the garrison. They amounted to 44 ships of the line, with a vast number of frigates and other smaller vessels. By the superior conduct of the British admiral, however, he was enabled to throw all the supplies into the garrison, and manœuvred his fleet so as not to shun an engagement, even with so marked a superiority of force as the enemy opposed to him. He lay in a close line to leeward of the combined fleets, but they did not think it proper to profit by the advantage of the wind.

On the 18th, the Buffalo man-of-war, with the rest of the transports, got in, and at noon of the same day, four or five ships of the line, under the orders of lord Mulgrave, were detached to the garrison with the 25th and 59th regiments. His lordship disembarked the troops with the greatest expedition, and rejoined the admiral off Tetuan, who, having now accomplished the object of his expedition, resolved to embrace the favourable wind that then prevailed, to carry him out to the westward. On the following morning, therefore, at day-break, lord Howe, under an easy sail, stood with his fleet in close order towards the Straits, the combined fleet, that was to the eastward, and consequently to windward of him, steering the same course. On the preceding evening, captain Curtis had gone off in the Latona, to communicate to the admiral the governor's confidential dispatches, and no opportunity offering for his return to the garrison, he was obliged to remain on board the fleet.

On the morning of the 20th, the wind shifted to the northward, and lord Howe having got clear of the Straits, he formed his fleet to leeward, to receive the enemy, who still kept the weather-gage. By this circumstance they were left, uninterruptedly, to take the distance at which they should think proper to engage; but in place of confiding in their great superiority, (for they had no less than 46 ships in their line) and aiming at a close and decisive action, they began their cannonade at sun-set on the van and rear of the British fleet, seeming to point their chief attack on the latter, and continued their fire along their whole line, at a considerable distance, and with little effect, until ten at night. The fire was only returned occasionally from different ships of the English fleet, as the nearer approach of the enemy, at times, afforded a more favourable opportunity for making an impression upon them.

As it was not the policy of the British admiral to seek, with so very inferior a force, a renewal of the action, (particularly as he had so successfully relieved the garrison) and as the enemy seemed studiously to shun a closer engagement, the fleets separated in the night, the combined fleets having hauled their wind, and stood on with a great press of sail.

The 2nd of February, 1783, the duc de Crillon informed the governor, by a flag of truce, that the preliminaries of a general peace had been signed at Paris on the 20th of January, between Great Britain, France, and Spain. When the boats met, the Spaniards rose up, in a seeming transport of joy, and cried out, We are all friends!—delivering the letters with the greatest apparent satisfaction. Previous to the meeting of the boats, the enemy discharged about thirty rounds, but never after the delivery of the letters fired upon the garrison. In the evening the British artillery likewise ceased. On the following day, the Spaniards advanced from their works, and conversed with the English sentries.

Admiral Graves, sailing from Jamaica, in the month of July, with a fleet of seven ships of the line, among which was the Ville de Paris, and about a hundred sail of merchantmen under convoy, was taken in a storm off Newfoundland, which proved so violent, that five of his line of battle-ships were lost, and among them the valuable French prize, together with a considerable number of the merchant-men.

This was followed by an accident attended with circumstances of a peculiarly melancholy nature. The Royal George of 108 guns was undergoing a careening at Portsmouth; and for that purpose she was laid, in a certain degree, on her side. Admiral Kempenfeldt, who commanded her, was writing in his cabin, and his crew were nearly all between decks, when a sudden squall arose, which threw the ship on her side; her gun-ports being open, she was almost instantly filled with water, and was carried to the bottom; and that gallant and accomplished veteran, with above 900 of his men, was lost.

When we turn our attention towards the East Indies, we find the British forces more successful than in the West. After the defeat of colonel Baillie, the whole Carnatic was evacuated by the British, and Madras itself might be considered as in a state of blockade. The arrival of the indefatigable sir Eyre Coote, in the latter end of 1780, and the vigorous measures which he pursued, effected a sudden and unexpected change; and relieved, almost at a single blow, the Carnatic from the ravages of a dangerous and remorseless enemy. In two days after his arrival he took his seat at the council-board, and produced orders from the supreme government of Bengal, for the suspension of Mr. Whitehill, the president, whose intemperate conduct had been a chief cause of alienating the affections of the Nizam.

Upon the arrival of sir Eyre Coote, the troops were in a wretched state of despondency, the sepoys deserting, the inhabitants treacherous, and all resources cut off. The general, therefore, ordered despatches at the same time to sir Edward Hughes, and to general Goddard, to urge them to be active in distressing the possessions of Hyder on the Malabar coast, and to promote as much as possible a peace with the Mahrattas.

In the beginning of the year 1781, Hyder's force, within the boundaries of the Carnatic alone, was estimated at above 100,000 men; whilst that of sir Eyre Coote did not exceed 7000.

The two armies encountered near Porto Novo, on the 1st of July. At seven in the morning, the British troops proceeded from that place, and after an hour's march, came in sight of the enemy strongly posted. Hyder's artillery was well served by Europeans, or those instructed by them, and did considerable execution. In this critical situation, a bold movement was necessary; and the British general determined to turn the right of the enemy; fortunately the country accorded to his wishes, and, by this movement, he was enabled to take the enemy obliquely, and avoid the full front and fire of their works and batteries; in this manner the first line only decided the fortune of the day. Though Hyder, with great dexterity and promptness, formed a new front to receive the British general, and detached a large body of infantry to prevent the second line from obtaining possession of some high grounds, yet at length European order and discipline was victorious over the undisciplined rabble of an Eastern camp. Hyder was obliged to retreat, after leaving 3000 of his best troops dead on the field of battle.

In the course of the following month, the British gained a second victory over Hyder, after fighting from nine in the morning till sun-set, within about sixteen miles of the city of Trepassore.

Some gentlemen of the factory at fort Marlborough, in the month of August, undertook an expedition against Sumatra; and all the Dutch settlements on the western coast of that island were reduced without any loss. The town and fortress of Negapatam, in the Tanjore country, (one of the most valuable of the Dutch settlements on the continent of India,) surrendered by capitulation to the English on the 12th of November, after a siege of 22 days.

The expulsion of the rajah Cheit Sing, from the zemindary of Benares, though a domestic concern of the company, is become important from the share it has had in the trial of Mr. Hastings. The rajah Cheit Sing succeeded his father in the year 1770, whose establishment in the succession had been a great object with the English East India company.

On the death of Sujah Ul Dowla in 1775, the country of Benares was ceded to the English; and the rajah continued in the same situation, to the East India company, as he had stood in to the nabob vizier, viz. as a feudal vassal, at a settled rate of tribute, which, it is by some asserted, could not legally be increased without the rajah's consent. The exigencies of the year 1778, however, induced the governor-general, Mr. Hastings, to make some extraordinary requisitions from the vassals of the company; and the rajah, Chiet Sing, was required to contribute an extraordinary subsidy of five lacks of rupees, or £60,000. It was alleged, that the rajah was disaffected to the British interest, and was desirous, as well as others of the native powers, to become independent of the company, by the aid of the French. With great reluctance, the rajah was induced to consent to the payment; and the requisition being repeated during three years, and every year worse paid than before, a demand of 2000 cavalry was at length added to the former, with which the rajah declared himself absolutely unable to comply.

On the 7th of July, 1781, Mr. Hastings proceeded on a political tour, in order to settle the affairs of Benares, and to restore order in the dominion of the nabob vizier; and also to obtain supplies from every quarter, and to conclude a separate peace with Madajee Sceindia, through the intervention of colonel Muir. The governor-general was met by the rajah at Busar, he complained of the exorbitance of the governor's demands, which were the payment of a crore of rupees, or £1,200,000, and the surrender of the fortress of Bidjegur, which he considered as "his family residence, the deposit of his women, and of his honour."

The governor, dissatisfied with the non-compliance of the rajah, laid his person under an arrest soon after his arrival at Benares, and he was committed by Mr. Markham, the resident, to the custody of the military. A large body of people immediately crossed the river from Ramnagur, and surrounded the palace where the rajah was confined; a desperate conflict ensued; and the muskets of the sepoys not being loaded, through a motive of delicacy, it was alleged, lest they should seem to mistrust their noble prisoner, the English lieutenants Stalker, Scot, and Simms, were killed on the spot, and not more than 20 of the whole party escaped with their lives.

Before major Popham could bring up the remainder of his detachment to Benares, the rajah had effected his escape, and took refuge in his fortress of Bidjegur, which he was soon afterwards obliged to relinquish; and, taking with him all the treasure he could conveniently convey, bid an everlasting adieu to his country. The booty found in the fortress was considerable, and, being divided according to the improper proportion, which custom has sanctioned with respect to prize-money, produced £36,000 for the share of the commander-in-chief, and only £6 for that of the common soldier!

The governor-general concluded a treaty of alliance and amity with Madajee Scindia of Onde, on the 13th of October.

1782. In the present distressful and distracted state of the presidency of Madras, lord Macartney was appointed, in the preceding year, to preside at that board; a nobleman whose integrity and experience well qualified him for the important station, and whose desire of signalizing his administration, by the restoration of good order, overcame the difficulties attending it, and induced him to devote his time and his talents to the business of reform and internal regulation. We find him co-operating in a spirited prosecution of the military and naval enterprises which distinguished the entrance upon his office. The successful expedition against Negapatam had been undertaken by his advice; and under his auspices sir Edward Hughes continued the train of achievements, which had done honour to the commanders, by sea and land, in the late campaign, by the reduction of the valuable Dutch factory of Trincomalé, on the isle of Ceylon, at the opening of the present year.

Exertion was now rendered more necessary by the appearance of a new enemy on the stage, who might be considered as of a very formidable character, even if we contemplate his strength and power of annoying us abstractedly; but he will become more so, if we consider them relatively to the wants of those enemies with whom we had been before contending. Whilst Hyder Ali had been making the greatest efforts for the improvement of his army, it was not in his power to establish such a naval force as was requisite for the defence of his dominions; and the consequence was, that he had the mortification to see them insulted by the English. This want was now to be supplied by France. That crown had prevailed on the Dutch states to join its alliance against Great Britain, and it was above all things desirous to attach its new allies, by convincing them of the good policy of uniting with France in overpowering a nation, which, by its industry, and the protection of a free government, had been enabled to engross a great part of the trade of Europe. With a view to that object, and to the maintenance of the French interests in Hindostan, by the protection of Hyder Ali, admiral de Suffrein, an officer of high repute, was sent to India, with a fleet of ten sail of the line, one 50 gun ship, and several frigates.

When the arrival of this fleet off the Coromandel coast was announced to sir Edward Hughes, he was so far from declining the combat, though he had only eight ships of the line and one 50 gun ship, and several of these out of condition, that he immediately put to sea, and captured six of the store ships under the French admiral's convoy. Under all the disadvantages of a tempestuous sea, and his antagonist's superior force, sir Edward then boldly challenged him to a trial of strength; and, in the battle which ensued, he obtained a complete victory, after a desperate engagement, in which both fleets sustained great damage.

Such despatch was used in refitting the shattered vessels, that within two months the rival fleets were enabled to encounter a second time. In this engagement, the brunt of the battle fell on sir Edward Hughes' ship, the Superbe, the Monmouth, and the Monarcha. Nothing could exceed the fierceness with which de Suffrein led his van to the attack of these, nor the intrepid firmness with which they sustained his reiterated assaults. In the event, nothing appears to have been gained on either side, to balance the heavy loss which their crews had suffered, but the honour which remained to the English, from having fought a superior fleet, so commanded, without having been obliged to quit the scene of action. If we consider the sanguine hopes entertained by all the enemies of Great Britain, from the arrival of the French fleet, and particularly by Hyder Ali, who expected, by its co-operation, to have been enabled to accomplish all his views of conquest in the Carnatic, we cannot but hold these actions of the British admiral in the most important and meritorious light.

Nor was this the only disappointment which Hyder suffered at this time. It had long been a grand object with that prince to gain possession of Tellicherry, a fortress on the Malabar coast, whose value was enhanced by its situation on the confines of the kingdoms of Mysore and Canara. He had held it in a state of blockade from the commencement of the war. But all his prospects in this quarter were blasted, at this time, by the arrival of a strong reinforcement to the garrison from Bombay; which enabled major Abingdon, the commandant, to take the besieging army by surprise, and to drive them, with great slaughter, from their fortified camp.

These advantages were, however, soon balanced by a heavy loss on the side of the English. Colonel Braithwaite was stationed, with what was called the southern army, consisting of 2000 veteran infantry, 250 cavalry, and thirteen field-pieces, on the Coleroon, which makes the southern frontier of the Tanjore country. In this situation he was attacked by Tippoo Saib, at the head of 20,000 Indians, and 400 French troops under M. Lally. The battle which ensued was continued three days; and never was a victory contested with more resoluteness on both sides. We cannot contemplate, without admiration, the English commander on the third day, when his troops were much reduced and worn down with fatigue, forming the remains of his brave men into a hollow square, with his artillery to guard his several fronts. Thus disposed, he repelled the impetuous assaults of Tippoo Saib's cavalry. But when Lally, as their last effort, led his Europeans to the attack with fixed bayonets, whilst the Indians attacked him, at the same time, in front and flank, he was at last overwhelmed by numbers, and was constrained to yield his enemies the honour of the day, by surrendering himself and the few followers which had not fallen in the last dreadful conflict.

The advantage derived to the enemy from this exploit was increased by the arrival of M. de Bussy, with a reinforcement of French troops to Hyder's army. This he immediately availed himself of by the reduction of Cuddalore and Permacoil; after which the rajah prepared to renew his attempt on the strong fortress of Wandewash.

Not a moment was now to be lost by the English commanders, in providing against the consequences of this reverse of fortune. Disconcerted by it in his views of conquest, sir Eyre Coote now thought only of preventing his enemy from reaping the fruits of his son's victory, by extending his conquests in the Carnatic. Perceiving by the rajah's movements that he had learned caution by defeat, as soon as he had provided for the defence of Wandewash, he adopted the only effectual expedient to bring him to a pitched battle—by threatening Arnee, a fortress which made his chief magazine for the war. This movement had the desired effect. Hyder marching his grand army to its relief, a battle ensued near its walls, in which the British troops behaved with their accustomed valour, and were rewarded with a complete victory; their enemy being routed and driven from the field. In this his last battle, Hyder had the mortification to experience that, after all his labour to form his troops after the European model, he could not give them that firmness which characterizes European troops, and that discipline which enables their commanders to rally and bring them again into action, when they appear to be broken and vanquished.

No military action, deserving of notice, occurred during the remainder of the campaign. Though not victorious, the Mysorean may yet be said to have finished, on the field of Arnee, that memorable career, which had raised him to a height of martial fame, that had never been before reached by any Indian chief. It seemed as if Coote was destined to contend only with this illustrious prince. His strength being exhausted, and his health impaired, by continual fatigue, he retired to a life of repose, during his few remaining days, covered with the honours which he had acquired by his signal services to his country.

The naval campaign, in the mean time, was prosecuted with redoubled energy. De Suffrein, who still retained his superior force, was desirous to bring his rival to an action before the arrival of the reinforcement which was now on its way from England. His challenge was accepted; and, fortunately for sir Edward Hughes, he was enabled to compensate, in some degree, for his inferiority of force, by gaining the wind in the beginning of the engagement. Making every possible advantage of this incident, he commenced the action with such fury, that, in one hour, several of the French ships were much shattered, and their line was thrown into disorder. But at this instant a sudden change of wind afforded the enemy an opportunity to escape, and, at the same time, disabled the English admiral from profiting by his victory.

TRINCOMALE was the grand object in this naval campaign. The French admiral was ardently desirous to recover a fortress so highly prized by their ally. Sir Edward Hughes, on the contrary, neglected no means for its preservation; but all his endeavours were frustrated by the activity of his antagonist, who availed himself of the absence of the English fleet to make himself master of the place.

THERE was now no remedy for the extreme chagrin felt by the English admiral and his crews, at seeing the French flag flying on the citadel, on their return to its relief, but that of a victory over the enemy, who had wrested this valuable acquisition out of their hands. To this, therefore, they had recourse. In defiance of disparity of force, which was now greater than before, they challenged their enemy to a battle. The engagement commenced with a furious attack from five of the enemy's line upon the Exeter and the Isis, the foremost of the van. These ships bore their repeated assaults, though reduced almost to wrecks, without striking; but the Exeter was obliged at last to leave the line. In the mean time, the centre divisions were engaged, the line was soon broken, and the ships of each fleet spent their fury on some rival, which they singled out for the combat. These dreadful conflicts were continued during four hours, without any decisive advantage. At seven o'clock in the evening, the body of the French fleet hauled their wind to the southward, but were exposed to a most severe fire from the ships in the English rear for twenty minutes after, when, getting clear off, the action entirely ceased.

DURING these warlike operations, negotiations for a peace had been carried on with the Mahrattas. A separate treaty having been concluded with Madajee Scindia in the preceding year, that prince became the mediator in these negotiations, which happily terminated in a treaty of peace and alliance, very advantageous to the British interests. Its most material articles were those which stipulated, that all places and countries which had been taken by the English since the treaty concluded by colonel Upton should be restored. That Salsette and the adjoining islands, together with Baroach and its territory, acquisitions of the most valuable nature, should be confirmed to the English. That Ragonant should be allowed four months to determine on his future residence; and that, on condition of his voluntarily repairing to Madajee Scindia, he should be allowed a pension of 25,000 rupees a month, (about £36,000 a-year) but that the English should afford him no protection. With respect to Hyder Ali, the Mahrattas engaged that, within six months after the ratification of the treaty, he should be obliged to relinquish to the English and their allies all places which he had taken from them during the war. But the most material article was that by which the paishwa bound himself, and the subordinate chiefs, not to suffer any other Europeans to establish factories in their dominions; and to hold no intercourse of friendship with any other European nation, except the Portuguese, with respect to their antient settlements in the Mahratta countries.

THE principles which formed the basis of this treaty were at once honourable to the British and to the Mahrattas, and evinced the mutual sincerity of the parties. An event so favourable to Great Britain was soon succeeded by the death of Hyder Ali, which relieved the East India company from a powerful, restless, and able enemy.

CHAPTER XXIX.

GEORGE III.

[1783, 1784.]

Conclusion of the American War—Its Influence in America—Character of Washington—Mr. Pitt's Efforts in favour of Parliamentary Reform—Mr. Fox's India Bill—Dismissal of the Coalition Ministry—Accession of Mr. Pitt—Violent Debates in Parliament—Election for Westminster—Arduous Struggle of Mr. Fox—Debates on that Event—Important Measures proposed and carried by Mr. Pitt.

THE prospect of peace was for a while obscured; but its cheering light at length broke forth. The emperor of Germany, having contracted a partiality for France, saw with pleasure the difficulties in which Great Britain had involved herself, and encouraged other powers to treat her with disrespect; but he thought proper to offer his mediation, as did also the unfriendly czarina. The king accepted their offers, which, however, had little influence on the treaty.

AMONG the French ministers, the chief promoter of peace was the count de Vergennes, who, finding that the war had ceased to be popular, and being satisfied with the emancipation of the Americans, vigorously counteracted in the cabinet the efforts of the advocates of sanguinary hostility. The original repugnance of Lewis to the war may be supposed to have rendered him zealous in the same cause. No prince, indeed, more earnestly wished for peace than this benevolent and unambitious monarch.

WHEN provisional articles had been adjusted with the American commissioners at Paris, preliminaries of peace with France and Spain were signed by Mr. Fitzherbert, (afterwards lord St. Helen's) and were approved by the house of peers, but not by the commons. The definitive treaties, and even the preliminaries, with Holland, were delayed above seven months from that time. The most important stipulations were of the following tenor. The thirteen colonies were declared to be "free, sovereign, and independent states;" and their limits were marked by a line drawn from the north-west angle of Nova Scotia, passing toward one of the heads of the Connecticut river, thence to lake Ontario, through the middle of that great body of water, and of the lakes Erie and Huron, to the lake of the Woods, and thence to the Missisippi, which was to form a boundary as far to the southward as fort Mobile and the borders of Florida. The right of taking fish on the borders of Newfoundland, and in the gulf of St. Lawrence, was conceded to the inhabitants of the new republic; and the Missisippi, from its source to the ocean, was left open to both nations. The loyalists were in a manner abandoned by the court which they had served; for their interests, in point of restitution of property and rights, were merely recommended to the provincial assemblies. The French were indulged with a restitution of Pondicherry and their other settlements in the East Indies, of St. Lucia in the West, and of Goree in Africa. Tobago was ceded to them, and, with this exception, they consented to relinquish all the West India islands which they had reduced since the commencement of the war. The Spaniards were not required to restore Minorca; and the whole territory of Florida was again subjected to their sway. They had endeavoured, during the negotiation, to prevail upon the court to resign Gibralter; but the proposition was rejected with disdain. The treaty with the Dutch left them in possession of all their former territories, except Negapatam.

For some years after the close of the war, the American republic rather declined than advanced in dignity and prosperity. The congress could not maintain national credit, procure due respect from foreign powers, or enforce the submission of the different provinces to its authority. Attentively considering this state of affairs, Mr. Washington, then a private citizen, earnestly recommended a revision of the federal system. A convention was proposed, for an improvement of the confederacy; a plan, which gave greater power to the congress, and rendered the provinces less independent and more connected, was adopted by the well-disposed majority; and Washington was unanimously chosen president of the United States. The influence arising from his character and reputation, added to the power with which he was now invested, elevated him, on this occasion, almost to the rank of a sovereign.

In his journey from Mount-Vernon, in Virginia, to Philadelphia, he was hailed as the guardian of his country, by the spectators who thronged the roads. He was escorted by persons of high character and distinction, praised in the addresses of corporations, honoured with triumphal arches. After a short indulgence in the festivities of the Pennsylvanian capital, he crossed the Delaware into New Jersey, and proceeded to New York, where he was inaugurated and proclaimed president. He formed his cabinet of able men; Mr. Jefferson, general Knox, colonel Hamilton, and Mr. Randolph.

The republic was then at war with the savages; and had disputes with the Spaniards on the subject of boundaries and navigation, and with Great Britain on supposed infractions of the treaty. To put an end to the war, the president sent negotiators; but it was not before the year 1790, that the Creek barbarians would agree to a treaty. As late as the year 1794, hostilities were continued by various tribes; but general Wayne then restored peace. With the British government, it was stipulated in the same year, that the posts occupied by the subjects of our sovereign, within the territories of the United States, should be relinquished, and that compensation should be made for irregular naval captures: but French goods were still seizable in American vessels; a freedom which so exasperated the French (who acrimoniously censured their old allies for submitting to it) that it required all the address of the president to prevent a war with that nation. With the Spanish court a treaty was concluded in 1795, by which the limits of dominion were settled in a satisfactory manner for the Americans, who were, at the same time, gratified with the free navigation of the Mississippi.

The high character of the president entitles him to encomiastic notice. Judgment, fortitude, integrity, and correctness of morals formed the chief features of his portrait. He pursued with undeviating steadiness what he conceived to be right; and, in the grand object of his political life, his perseverance commanded success. As a warrior, he was brave without rashness; as a commander, cautious and vigilant; strict, without inordinate severity; humane, without facility of compliance or weakness of indulgence. As a statesman, he attended to practical advantage, rather than to speculative perfection. If Great Britain had allowed to the Americans the full benefit of her constitution, he would not have renounced her control, nor resisted her authority. But he knew that they had a fair claim to just government; and, for his strenuous efforts in support of that claim, his memory will never be reproached by the manly advocates of honourable freedom.

The manner in which Mr. Fox and his associates gained possession of the cabinet, did not give general satisfaction to the public. It seemed rather to be a factious encroachment on the prerogative of the sovereign, than a fair offer of new counsellors to his unconstrained assent and approbation. It might therefore be supposed, that the king would embrace the earliest opportunity of shaking off a yoke, to which necessity alone had induced him to submit. While he waited for a conjuncture favourable to his views, he acquiesced, with seeming readiness, in the schemes of the new ministers.

A most interesting debate occurred, when Mr. William Pitt renewed his efforts, without success, in recommendation of parliamentary reform, for which many petitions had been presented in the course of the session. He lamented the May 7, 1783.

decline of the genuine spirit of liberty, and the progress of courtly influence and corruption. He wished that the house of commons might become a true organ of the public voice, and that the popular part of the constitution might be restored to its due weight and importance. With this view he proposed an augmentation of the number of representatives for counties, and of members for the metropolis. Mr. Powys, and lords North and Mulgrave, opposed the scheme with all the obstinacy of prejudice; Mr. Thomas Pitt approved it in part; Mr. Fox and Mr. Beaufoy contended for a reform, on the grounds of reason and constitutional expediency; and Mr. Dundas, regardless of the sentiments which he had delivered in a former debate on this subject, supported the propositions of his new friend, whom he expected again to see in the enjoyment of ministerial power.

From the time of the prorogation to the next meeting of parliament, this country, undisturbed by the din of arms, was agitated by the contests of party. In the mean time, commerce, which had suffered greatly during the war, began to recover from its depression; and the arts, which had been neglected, revived with fresh lustre. Though the loss of the American colonies excited reflections degrading to the court, it was scarcely regretted by the people, who hoped to derive from the renewal of the trade with those provinces, benefits as considerable as any which had before accrued from their mutual intercourse.

The French government, at this time, pursued, with apparent zeal, those schemes of internal improvement which the war had interrupted; and when the empress of Russia, availing herself of the weakness of the khan of the Crimea, had taken possession of that peninsula, the count de Vergennes exerted the influence of his court, for the prevention of those hostilities, which so violent a procedure seemed to threaten. The British cabinet, on the contrary, encouraged the Turks to enter into a war with the Russians; but pacific persuasions were more successful, and all claim to the disputed territory was renounced by the porte.

Nov. 11. When the British parliament re-assembled, his majesty recommended two objects to its studious deliberation: the prevention of illicit trade, and the improvement of the state of the East India company. A committee of enquiry was appointed by the commons for the former business, and the members of the cabinet had frequent conferences on the latter subject. From the resolute spirit of Mr. Fox, some strong measure was expected; and the bill prepared by him exhibited traces of his bold and determined character. He introduced it by an able speech, which was admired even by those who decidedly disapproved his plan. He represented the subject of discussion as unusually important, connected with the best interests of the British empire, affecting the honour of the nation, and involving the fate and happiness of thirty millions of persons. The system of 1773, he said, had made a considerable change in the different departments of India administration; but it did not appear to be the result of the most judicious policy, or the most enlightened views; and it had by no means proved successful in the execution. Tyranny and rapacity still prevailed, and abuses of the grossest kind were repeated with connivance and encouragement. To obviate the ill effects of these continued enormities, and also to prevent the bankruptcy of the company, a new plan, comprehending all the energy of rigid reform, was essentially necessary. The authority of the directors, having so long been improperly and injuriously exercised, ought to be suspended, and the power of the company's servants ought to be reduced within the bounds of moderation, instead of being suffered to branch out into the wild luxuriance of licentiousness. The bill by which he hoped to effect this reform, embraced a great variety of objects. It required the strict obedience of the governor-general, and all the officers of the company, to the orders of commissioners named by parliament, who were to be assisted in their new trust by the advice of nine proprietors of India stock. It prohibited the rulers of the provinces from the exchange or acceptance of territory, from unprovoked invasions, the loan of troops to independent princes, and other unjust or unnecessary acts of power. It annulled all grants of monopoly, proscribed presents in general, and checked the assignment of farms to the servants of civil officers. It also provided for the proper treatment of protected princes, as well as for the security of the zeminders and polygars in their possessions, and pointed out a mode of adjusting the dispute between the rajah of Tanjore and the nabob of Arcot. By the bill which nominated commissioners, all the powers of the former court of directors, and general court of proprietors, were granted to earl Fitzwilliam, Mr. Frederick Montagu, and five other gentlemen, for four years; and they were not to be removed at the mere pleasure of the king, but only at the desire of either house of parliament. These, and other parts of his plan, the minister discussed with acuteness and spirit; and his chief partisans supported it with plausibility and animation.

This bold scheme met with strenuous and vehement opposition. Mr. William Pitt declared that he could not think of it without horror, and could not look at its harsh features without extreme disgust. Its tendency, he said, was hostile, both to private property and to public freedom. Its principles were so arbitrary and so violent, that every thing must yield to its influence. If the parliament should suffer it to be enforced, no property or person would be secure from the precedent which it would establish. The alleged necessity for such an invasion of purchased and chartered rights did not exist. The charges of delinquency and deficiency had not been substantiated to such an extent, as to authorize a breach of parliamentary faith, or a deviation from the national honour and probity. In addition to the general atrocity of the measure, the influence which it would create was dreadfully dangerous. It would subject the king to the permanent control of an aspiring faction; and the due balance of our admired constitution would be lost. Mr. Thomas Pitt considered the measure as a direct attack on the liberties of Englishmen; he was shocked at its gross injustice, and alarmed at its pernicious tendency. Mr. Dundas maintained, that all the humane and wise purposes of the framers of the two bills might be effected without a seizure of the property, or a violation of the franchises of the company; and he conjured his hearers not to assent to the creation of an enormous and unexampled influence, which might overbear the prerogative of the crown, and subvert the fabric of the constitution. Mr. William Grenville inveighed against the bill for the appointment of commissioners, as an instrument of influence and corruption, and as a step to the invasion of the most sacred rights. Mr. Powys, and other gentlemen, opposed it on similar grounds in strong and pointed terms.

These attacks were eagerly repelled by Mr. Fox. In a detail of calculation, he controverted those statements by which the directors had exaggerated the financial credit of the company. He ridiculed the dread of a dangerous violation of chartered rights, and contended, that former acts of regulation, which had not excited extraordinary alarm, had infringed existing charters. Grants of privileges might justly be altered, or even revoked, by the governing power of a nation, when they were grossly perverted and abused; and if any case ever called for such interference, the present most imperiously did. Commercial charters, more particularly than others, might be varied or annulled, in consequence of the flagrant misconduct of the society, or the individuals for whose benefit they were granted. They were either destructive, or suspensive of general rights, and therefore peculiarly required a vigilant inspection of the conduct of those who were thus favoured with exclusive grants. The apprehension which some members entertained, that the influence of the crown would be augmented by the scheme, he easily obviated; but he was less successful in dispelling the fears of those, who accused him of an intention of erecting a new power, a fourth estate, in the realm, an imperium in imperio. The company itself, he remarked, had long been assailed with similar objections; and no new power would be created in the present instance. The commissioners, undoubtedly, would have considerable influence; but, from their well-known characters, there was no reason to expect that they would make an improper use of it, and if they should be so inclined, the provisions of the two bills would sufficiently check them. The due execution of their trust would be secured by due regulations; they would be responsible for every act, and even for inaction. If they were liable to be dismissed at the will of the crown, there was no hope of rendering their appointment beneficial or salutary. The redress of India grievances could not be accomplished without the adoption of a permanent system; occasional expedients, and desultory measures, would merely palliate the evils which demanded a remedy.

Mr. Burke supported the bills with a copious effusion of eloquence, of which I can only give a faint sketch. Having traced the history to a distant period, delineated the general character of the people, and noticed their laws and institutions, he examined the conduct and proceedings of the society which had acquired so large a portion of that once flourishing territory. Not content with moderate possessions, the directors, or the officers employed in their service, had devised extravagant projects, and undertaken extraordinary wars, for the extension of dominion and power. They had violated every treaty which they had concluded, and had betrayed every independent prince, with whom they had formed any connexion. They had arbitrarily interfered in the internal government of the princes who were dependent on the company, had exacted enormous aids and tribute, and had perpetrated various acts of injustice and criminality. In the government of the subject provinces, the happiness of the natives had been merely a secondary consideration. They were ruled with a rod of iron, plundered without mercy, oppressed without remorse. The evils which they endured were not alleviated with conciliatory manners, nor did the pride of state, or ostentation of charity, affect to repair the mischiefs which ambition and rapacity had occasioned. Other conquerors had left monuments of art or beneficent utility; but if the English should at this moment be driven out of India, nothing would remain to shew that it had been occupied, during the inglorious period of their dominion, by any thing better than the ouran-outang or the tiger.

Upon the whole, said Mr. Burke, it appeared, from fair and diligent enquiry, that the affairs of the company, from a long course of mismanagement, both political and commercial, were in a most disordered state; that our India territory, instead of being highly useful to Great Britain, was likely to become one of the greatest burdens of this nation; and that the abuses were so complicated and enormous, as to render a temporary transfer of the powers of the directors necessary, for rescuing the British character from disgrace, and preventing the ruin of our Asiatic interests.

Lord North was confident that the most salutary effects would flow from the regulations now proposed. He considered a society of merchants as unfit for the government of an extensive territory; and, as the powers granted to the company had been wantonly abused, he could not think it improper or unjust to suspend the operations of the charter. Mr. Erskine defended the two bills, both in point of policy and of right. Sir Henry Fletcher and sir Grey Cooper contended chiefly for their expediency.

The friends of the scheme prevailed on one occasion by a majority of 109; on another by a plurality of 114 votes. The commissioners' bill at length passed the house of commons; and the ministry confidently hoped to carry it into effect. But when the vessel destined for the relief of India was proceeding full sail, an unforeseen storm arose, by which the adventurous pilot was compelled to desist from his voyage.

Suspecting the ambition of Mr. Fox, the king watched with anxiety the progress of the India bill; but he had not formed any regular plan of action, when earl Temple, having requested an audience, warned him of the danger which menaced his prerogative, and urged him to oppose the erection of a new and dangerous power in his dominions. The consequence of the interview was an intimation circulated among the peers, that whoever should vote for the bill would be considered by his majesty an enemy. The effect of this interference soon appeared; and the views of the ministry were suddenly baffled and confounded.

On the second reading of the bill, the earl of Abingdon pronounced a severe invective against the scheme and its chief author. The bill, he said, contained propositions fatal to the just prerogative of the crown, and to the liberties and property of the people—propositions as pregnant with ambition and mischief as those which had inspired the minds of the antagonists of Charles I. The Cromwel of the day had endeavoured to support his plea of necessity by false statements, and had shewn himself a more daring violator of chartered rights than either the second Charles or James. His lordship then moved, that the judges should be ordered to give their opinions of the tendency of the bill, and advise whether it ought not to be rejected as unconstitutional and dangerous; but the peers exploded the motion, after a short debate. When the India company had been heard by counsel against the bill, the duke of Chandos moved for an adiournment; and the duke of Portland took this opportunity of animadverting on the improper freedom which had been taken with the name and sentiments of a great personage. Earl Temple acknowledged the interview, and justified the advice which he had given to his sovereign. On a division, the opponents of the bill had a majority of eight votes.

Dec. 17. In the next debate which occurred on this subject, when earl Gower had pourtrayed the bill in the most unfavourable colours, the earl of Carlisle exhibited a very different picture of it. It bore in his eye the vestiges of truth and propriety, the features of wisdom and humanity. It held out a remedy for disorders which had risen to an alarming height, and promised the only security for the preservation of our India empire. These praises were disallowed by the earl of Coventry, but were justified by the earls of Sandwich and Derby. Lord Camden argued against the bill, pronouncing it to be unjust and unconstitutional; and it was also attacked by the eloquence of lord Rawdon. Its rejection was now decided by a majority of 19, the numbers being 95 and 76. The prince of Wales had before given his suffrage for it, but he did not vote on the final question.

This bill seems to have owed its rejection to clamour and faction, rather than to a real sense of its demerit, or a sincere conviction of its unjustifiable violence. It may be argued, that when the public faith is pledged to a charter, by which certain privileges are granted, those who expect to derive benefit from the grant are bound to make a proper use of these favours, and to keep constantly in view the grand object of the institution; and that if they so grossly fail in these respects, as not only to endanger their own association, but even to expose to great injury and disgrace the nation to which they belong, strict justice demands the revocation or suspension of such charter, and the laws of honour sanction the demand; for, the obligation being violated by one party, the promises and stipulations of the other also become void, from the very nature of agreement. On this ground the bill may be said to have been in a great measure justified by the very reprehensible conduct of the East India company. With regard to the allegation, that it menaced the king with imperious control, it may be observed, that the patronage of India, added to other sources of power, might have enabled an ambitious minister to domineer over every branch of the legislature; and the influence of the king might have been more nominal than real. But it ought not to be forgotten, that though the sovereign would not have had the power of discarding the new directors of the affairs of Hindostan, he could at any time dissolve the parliament by which they were supported, and, by thus appealing to the people, might obtain from their loyalty the means of re-establishing his prerogative.

The king's interference did not escape the severity of parliamentary animadversion. Mr. Baker proposed, that the commons should declare it to be highly criminal to report any opinion of the king upon a bill depending in either house, with a view of influencing the votes of the members. Mr. William Pitt urged the house to disregard idle rumours; adding, that if ministers really thought themselves precluded, by the secret influence of others, from the effective pursuit of their own measures, they ought immediately to resign their employments. Lord Nugent applauded the conduct of earl Temple, as an instance of that good old English spirit, which would not be silent in the moment of danger, and of that patriotic virtue, which would check the career of a daring faction. Lord North affirmed, that none but those who, as ministers, were responsible for their proceedings, had a right to offer advice to his majesty on points depending in parliament. Mr. Fox reprobated the royal interference in legislative deliberations as at all times unconstitutional, but as particularly alarming when exercised for the defeat of a bill, which had been demanded by the most urgent necessity, had triumphed over strenuous opposition by the force of argument, and had been honoured with the sanction of a very considerable majority of the most respectable characters in the nation. If such conduct should be tamely endured, the house of commons, he said, would become an organ of despotism, and its voice would degenerate into a mere organ of secret influence. He rallied Mr. Pitt on his eagerness to re-enter into office, and declared himself not unwilling to retire, when the will of his majesty should be announced for that purpose. If a new ministry would be formed, without the confidence of that house or of the people, he had no desire of being a member of such a cabinet.

The motion passed by a majority of 73; and it was also voted, that whoever should advise the king to prevent or interrupt the discharge of the important duty, of providing a remedy for the evils of India, should be considered as an enemy to his country.

These offensive resolutions hastened the explosion of the king's displeasure against the two leaders of the coalition. A message was sent, soon after midnight, to Mr. Fox and lord North, demanding the seals of their offices, without the indulgence or compliment of an interview. Their associates in the ministry were likewise discarded; and the advice of earl Temple and Mr. Pitt supplied the vacancies. The marquis of Carmarthen and Mr. Townshend (who had been created lord Sydney) were constituted secretaries of state; earl Gower became president of the council, in the room of lord Stormont; the great seal was again consigned to lord Thurlow; the privy-seal was transferred from the earl of Carlisle to the duke of Rutland; the removal of lord Townshend from the board of ordnance, made way for the re-appointment of the duke of Richmond; and lord Howe was placed at the head of the admiralty. Mr. Dundas was not forgotten amidst these changes, being appointed treasurer of the navy; nor was Mr. Grenville left without an employment in the service of his country, for he was declared paymaster of the forces, though he was not long permitted to enjoy that post, without the participation of lord Mulgrave. Mr. Pitt secured for himself the command of this new phalanx, and the chief direction of affairs of state, by obtaining the combined offices of first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer.

The leaders of the coalition, confiding in their parliamentary strength, resolved to obstruct the career of their rivals, by spirited and vigorous efforts. They procured from the majority of the commons, an address against the prorogation or dissolution of the parliament. The business of the treasury was impeded by restrictive votes; the bill against mutiny was deferred; and strong resolutions were fulminated against the court.

After a vote which displeased the new lords of the treasury, as it restricted the acceptance of bills from India, the commons adjourned for some weeks. In this interval Mr. Pitt's party gained friends, and rose in popularity. Resolutions calculated to limit the disposal of public money marked the first appearance of Mr. Fox after the recess; and two motions from the earl of Surry followed, one of which stated the indispensable necessity of forming an administration which should enjoy the confidence of that house and of the public; while the other arraigned the late appointments, as being accompanied by new and extraordinary circumstances, not tending to conciliate or engage the confidence of the house. In the course of debate, Mr. Pitt affirmed, that he had entered into office to avert the mischiefs which might be dreaded from the violent schemes of the framers of the India bill, and disclaimed all thoughts of resigning his post, in compliance with the factious wishes of such men. The crown, he said, had an indisputable right to make choice of ministers; and, as he and his colleagues had not yet been found incompetent or unfaithful to their trust, the house could not, without a palpable encroachment on the prerogative, insist on their dismission. Mr. Erskine was surprised at the inconsiderate boldness of the man, who could venture to act as minister in an assembly which he had insulted and reviled, and which held very different principles from his own, particularly in the grand business that ought to be the first object of the attention of government; and he contrasted this behaviour of the young statesman with that of his illustrious father, who had uniformly suffered his political existence to depend on the good opinion of the house of commons. Mr. Fox, while he admitted the royal right of ministerial selection, contended, that if the crown should fix upon individuals whom the commons might deem unable to sustain the weight of public affairs, the house might demand a resignation, without adducing any specific charge, or stating any instance of misconduct; or that there might be circumstances in the appointment itself, so obviously menacing the constitution with danger, as to justify the interposition of the representatives of the people. The house adopted one of the motions without dividing; the other passed by a majority of 54. As a sequel to these resolutions, it was voted, that the continuance of the new ministers in office was repugnant to constitutional principles, and injurious to the interests of the king and his people.

Jan. 12.

Having prepared a bill for the regulations of the affairs of India, Mr. Pitt recommended it to the house, as one which would be equally efficacious with that of Mr. Fox, in the correction of abuses and disorders, without creating undue influence, invading property, or violating charters. Mr. Fox, however, opposed it, as augmenting the influence of the crown, fostering abuses, and endangering, by absurd provisions, the welfare and preservation of India; and it was rejected, with little debate, though the difference of number was very inconsiderable, the votes being 222 against 214. Mr. Fox then proposed the revival of his plan, with such modifications as might render it more generally acceptable; but he wished to know whether the parliament would be suffered to discuss it without interruption. Mr. Pitt, though repeatedly urged to explain the king's equivocal answer to the late address, long remained silent amidst the clamours of the house; and when some warm expressions from general Conway provoked him to rise and speak, he refused to answer what he deemed irregular interrogatories. A strong address to his majesty was now expected from the irritation of the assembly; but Mr. Fox calmly moved for an adjournment.

To promote an union of parties, many independent members of the house of commons held meetings at the St. Alban's Tavern, and voted an address to Mr. Pitt and the duke of Portland. The former replied, that he would agree to such an union as might be consistent with honour and principle; and the latter professed his anxious desire of an establishment of such an administration as might be entitled to general confidence and support. An interview was proposed by the mediators, and even urged by the king; but his grace required as a preliminary, that Mr. Pitt should comply with the wish of the commons, by a resignation either actual or virtual; and the minister's refusal put an end to the affair.

It was the opinion of some very distinguished characters, that the popularity of Mr. Pitt, and the whole of his colleagues, was of a delusive and unfounded nature, and that its destruction could be at no great distance. This opinion, however, was not fully realized. The memorable contest between ministers and the house of commons continued for a long period, during which the popularity of the former rather increased than diminished; for in two keenly-contested elections, for the boroughs of Hertford and Hull, two distinguished friends of the former administration were rejected. These victories on the part of the new administration, might indeed be regarded as trifling; but this cannot be affirmed respecting the city of York, for which the poll was finally closed on the 6th of April, 1784, when the once venerated lord John Cavendish, a nobleman of unblemished character, and the most amiable manners, together with his fellow-candidate, were completely unsuccessful. Messrs. Foljambe and Weddel likewise declined their contest for the county of York. Mr. Fox himself had one of the severest struggles for the city of Westminster to be met with in the history of electioneering, and was at last with difficulty victorious. The candidates for this city were lord Hood, Mr. Fox, and sir Cecil Wray. For two days Mr. Fox had a majority over the other two candidates; but during the third day's contest, fortune seemed to have deserted him, owing to the powerful opposition of the friends of the crown. After the election had continued near a fortnight, all persons, except Mr. Fox and his friends, would have considered his cause as entirely hopeless; but they were not to be intimidated by the gigantic and formidable opposition of the first lord of the treasury. The mistake of ministers consisted in this, that they did not apprehend the election would be of long duration, and of course they had nearly exhausted the whole of their artillery at the commencement of the poll. Fox and his party perceived that it might be prolonged for several weeks to come, and were convinced, that great numbers of electors had not yet made their appearance. The prodigious opulence of the nobility in favour of Mr. Fox, was at least a counterbalance to ministerial influence. They did not discover any strenuous exertions at the commencement of the poll, in consequence of which their resources were still very great. They possessed one advantage, far beyond any of their opponents, in the beauty, the engaging qualities, the fascinating manners, the intrepidity, industry, and exertion of the duchess of Devonshire. In open defiance of the calumnies which might be raised against her by an exasperated ministry, she was finally victorious: and on the 17th of May, Mr. Fox had a majority of 235. Every attempt was made, which meanness and corruption could devise, to render the election of Mr. Fox null and void; but they were, as all such endeavours ought to be, finally unsuccessful.

The first trial of strength, in the house of commons, was on the subject of this election. Mr. Lee complained of the disobedience of the high bailiff to the precept of the sheriff, and moved for a vote, declaring that he ought to have returned two members. This mode of proceeding was deemed unjust by Mr. Kenyon, the master of the rolls, who wished that the officer might be first heard; and, on his moving the previous question, a majority of 147 supported the ministerial side. A more ample majority (168) appeared against an amendment proposed by the earl of Surry, who could not agree to that part of the address which thanked his majesty for the late dissolution of parliament.

After pleadings and examinations respecting the disputed election, it was directed that the high bailiff should be directed forthwith to make a return. Mr. Fox, who then sat for the borough of Kirkwall, contended that this officer had not sufficient evidence to warrant his acceding to the demand of a scrutiny; that even if such evidence had existed, he was not justified by law in suffering the inquisition to preclude a seasonable return to the writ; and that he and the ministry had concerted this expedient to deprive an obnoxious candidate of the benefit of Mr. Grenville's bill. Mr. Pitt maintained, that as the high bailiff could not determine the majority of legal votes, in a case of so doubtful a nature, he was excused from an implicit obedience to the precept; and the house rejecting the motion, merely ordered that the scrutiny should be carried on with all practicable despatch.

On the meeting of this parliament, May the 18th, the commons re-chose Mr. Cornwall their speaker. The sense of the two houses respecting the minister, and his majesty's resolution to retain him in office, then appeared in the house of lords, expressing "their satisfaction and gratitude, that in the exercise of the powers vested in his majesty by the constitution, he had been graciously pleased to recur to the sense of his people, at a juncture when the situation of public affairs called loudly for that exertion," and in the great majority by which an amendment to the address in the lower house, proposed by lord Surry, was rejected.

Among the propitious events, with which Mr. Pitt entered upon his administration, was the completion of the treaty of peace and friendship with the Dutch states; which was signed at Paris two days after the meeting of parliament.

The first affair of importance, relative to civil policy, which the minister submitted to the consideration of the legislature, was a proposal, for a commutation of a part of the duty on tea for an additional tax on windows. It appearing, that of twelve million pounds of tea annually consumed in England, not half was sold by the East India company, it was proposed for the improvement of the revenue by preventing smuggling, to lower the duty £4 12*s.* 10*d.* per cent.; and to make good the deficiency of £600,000 to the revenue, by an additional window tax. This measure was strenuously opposed, on the grounds of objections which were afterwards perceived and felt by the nation; but such was now the strength of the ministerial party, that the bill was passed by great majorities in both houses.

The minister's success in this trial of his strength gave him confidence to resume the grand business of the regulating act. That he might conciliate the favour of the company itself, and predispose it to promote his plan, he prepared the way first by the commutation act, which tended to its benefit by increasing the consumption of tea; and afterwards by a bill for its accommodation and relief, which had for its object the respite of duties, the payment of bills, and the ascertainment of dividend. He then brought in his bill for the government of India; which differed but in few points from that which he had proposed in the preceding parliament; and in those it tended to enlarge the powers of the board of control. Yet so different were the sentiments of the present house of commons from those of the preceding, that, after warm debates, it was passed by a majority of 276 votes to 61 in the lower house. It again experienced a strong opposition in the house of peers. But its opponents were more respectable from character than numbers. Being left in a small minority, as their last resource, they entered a protest, expressing their disapprobation of it in very severe terms.

The minister, having concluded this important affair in a manner that equalled his most sanguine expectations, went through the arduous task of providing the supplies necessary to answer the extraordinary expenditure occasioned by the late war.

1784. The business of this session, which had been protracted to an unusual length by the variety and importance of affairs transacted in it, was closed with an act of a very humane nature, for the restoration of the estates forfeited in Scotland by the rebellion of 1745. His majesty then put an end to the session with a speech, in which he expressed his sense of the zeal and attention which the parliament had shewn to the public service, his approbation of what had been done by it for the settlement of affairs in India, the hopes he entertained of the happy effects of this measure, and his acquiescence in the means which the house of commons had adopted to provide for the exigencies of the state, and the support of public credit.

CHAPTER XXX.

GEORGE III.

[1785, 1786.]

Debates on the subject of Parliamentary Reform—Rejection of that Measure—Irish Affairs—The Duke of Richmond's Extraordinary Scheme of National Fortification—Commencement of Proceedings against Mr. Warren Hastings—Measures preparatory to the Abolition of the Slave Trade—Amount of several Voyages of Discovery—Death of Captain Cook—Misfortunes and Miraculous Voyage of Captain Bligh.

THE most important subject of discussion which occupied the wisdom of parliament, during the ensuing session, was the reform of our national representation. The premier had pledged himself to promote that object to the utmost of his power; and he now brought forward a bill to amend the representation of the people of England in parliament. The outline of his plan was to "transfer the right of choosing representatives from thirty-six boroughs, which were decayed, or falling into decay, to the counties, or the chief towns, which were at present unrepresented. That a fund should be provided for the purpose of giving to the holders and owners of the boroughs thus disfranchised, an appreciated compensation for their property; and that the right of voting for knights of the shire should be extended to copy-holders." So strong was the attachment of the house of commons to the present system, and so prevalent the apprehension that the measure, if successful, would facilitate the designs of factious and designing men, that the bill was rejected by a majority of 278 to 174.

Jan. 25, 1785.

After this, Mr. Pitt, in consequence of the report made by the commissioners of accounts, brought in bills for the better auditing and examining the public accounts, and for the reform and regulation of the public offices, which were received with general approbation.

These being passed, a new and efficient commission of examination and control was instituted, and many of the inferior departments of offices were consolidated.

Another matter of great importance, now submitted to the consideration of parliament, was a plan for establishing such a commercial intercourse between Great Britain and Ireland, as might be beneficial to both countries, and might place the finances of the latter upon a footing that should be more advantageous to the state. This salutary measure was strongly recommended as a means of calming that turbulent spirit, which had long prevailed in Ireland. The removal of commercial restraints, and the recovery of constitutional rights, with which they had been gratified, had been found ineffectual to that purpose. Extreme distress was still felt by the Irish manufacturers, owing chiefly to the disadvantages which they laboured under, with regard to the duties which were respectively paid on goods exported to, and imported from England. This occasioned discontent among the people, and made them proper instruments in the hands of those active senators, who came forward at this time as the zealous advocates of reform. The same persons who had been instrumental in the deliverance of their country from its legislative and judicial dependency, were now exerting themselves to establish a new model of the system of representation. So far back as in the year 1781, a meeting of delegates from the volunteer corps of Ulster had been convened at Dungannon, which declared their object to be, "To restore the constitution to its original purity, and to root corruption and court influence out of the legislative body." After the treaty of peace had rendered the volunteers no longer useful for national defence, they still continued to be embodied. A meeting of their delegates was held at Dungannon in 1783; a plan of reformation was there proposed; and it was agreed, that a national convention of representatives from the volunteer army should assemble at Dublin the same year. A committee was appointed to correspond with the advocates of reform in England and others. On the 10th of November, a convention was held in that city, wherein a plan of reform, analogous to that of Mr. Pitt, was agreed upon; and Mr. Flood, in consequence of it, made a motion for leave to bring in a bill for "a more equal representation of the people in parliament," which was repeatedly rejected. Undaunted by ill success, the citizens of Dublin drew up a petition to his majesty, representing their grievances. At the same time they circulated an address, to stimulate the body of the people to a general and vigorous exertion for the attainment of their objects; and in this, in order to strengthen themselves, and to unite the whole nation in one cause, they proposed to admit the Roman catholics to a participation of the right of voting for representatives.

It is not unfrequently seen, that the ardour of popular assemblies proves ruinous to the cause in which they are engaged. Such was the case in the present instance. Many of those who were desirous of a reform upon protestant principles, were alarmed at a proposition which would at once have given the Roman catholics an ascendancy in the kingdom. Disunion was the immediate consequence. The earl of Charlemont, general of the Ulster volunteers, dissented from the proposition; and the example of a nobleman so deservedly respected, had great influence on the whole body.

The measure proposed, of holding a national congress at Dublin, of deputies from each county, city, and town, was another step which led to the ruin of this popular cause. It not only excited apprehensions in many of the advocates of reform, of views in the party leaders inconsistent with the welfare of the state, but afforded government a just occasion to interpose its authority. Accordingly, on information that H. Stephens Reily, sheriff of Dublin, had presided at an assembly, August the 19th 1784, for the purpose of choosing delegates for such a congress, Fitzgibbon, the attorney-general, proceeded against him by attachment from the court of King's Bench. The result was, that the sheriff was sentenced by the court to imprisonment for a week, and a fine of five marks. The congress, notwithstanding, was held on the 25th of October. But the numbers being incomplete, the assembly was adjourned to the 2nd day of January ensuing; having passed several resolutions, importing that their proceedings were in conformity to the constitution of Ireland, and exhorting the nation to support them in the measures they were taking for a parliamentary reform. An adjourned meeting was accordingly held, first on the day appointed, and finally on the 20th of April, and Mr. Flood, in consequence, repeated his motion for his bill of reform, which was again rejected.

In the mean time, loud complaints were made of the ruinous state of the trade and manufactures in Ireland; and the popular tumults, occasioned by it, rose to so formidable a height at Dublin, that the necessity of applying a more effectual remedy to the growing evil became daily more evident. For this end, a number of resolutions were proposed by Mr. Orde, secretary to the lord-lieutenant. These, having received the approbation of a decided majority, were transmitted to England, to serve as the basis of an equitable arrangement of a commercial intercourse between the two countries. On receiving these, Mr. Pitt immediately brought forward his propositions, the general purport of which was, "To afford Ireland a permanent participation of the commercial advantages of Great Britain, when her parliament should permanently secure an aid of the surplus of the hereditary revenue of that kingdom, towards defraying the expence of protecting the general commerce in time of peace." In their passage through the two houses, much obstruction was experienced from the difficulty of reconciling the interests of the Irish with those of the Scotch and English manufacturers. The apprehensions of injury to the former were expressed in petitions from Manchester and other towns. After the merits of the propositions had been elaborately discussed, during the three months, and they had undergone material alterations, to accommodate them to the wishes of the British manufacturers, they received the legislative sanction, and were transmitted to Ireland.

On the introduction of a bill, correspondent to their temper, by Mr. Orde, very animated debates ensued, in which Mr. Grattan and Mr. Flood distinguished themselves by their harangues, to dissuade the house from assenting to an arrangement so inadequate to the desired ends. The spirit of jealousy, before prevalent in the legislature and nation, was roused by their popular eloquence, and concurred with it in producing the intended effect. This bill was indeed passed by 127 to 108 votes. But so small a majority not being deemed sufficient to the prosecution of a business of such importance, it was thought advisable to abandon it, till it could be resumed with a fairer prospect of general approbation.

A SCHEME of extended fortification, framed under the auspices of the duke of Richmond, drew the early attention of the house of commons. A board of military and naval officers had been appointed for the examination of the subject; and Mr. Pitt now informed the house, that the opinions of these investigators were favourable to the scheme. He at first declined the production of any part of the report; but, being strongly urged to a compliance, he agreed to the presentation of the greater part, with other papers desired by different members. He afterwards moved, that, to secure the dock-yards of Plymouth and Portsmouth by a permanent system of fortification, conducted on œconomical principles, was a measure intimately connected with the national defence, and necessary to enable the fleet to act in distant services with full vigour and effect. If a plan of this kind had been adopted during the late war, our fleets, he said, would not have been so confined as they were to the vicinity of our ports, but might have been employed more effectually in offensive operations. Mr. Bastard compared the schemes of the duke of Richmond with the romantic absurdities of don Quixote, and declared that he would never consent to the adoption of a system tending to the discouragement of the naval service. He could not concur with those who would tear the ensign of British glory from the mast-head, and fix it on the ramparts of a garrison. He added, that the constitution would be endangered by the multiplication of forts and barracks, in which the confined soldiers would lose the character of citizens, and become ready abettors of the arbitrary schemes of a court. He moved an amendment, denying the expediency of a system of fortification so extensive as that which was recommended by the board of enquiry. Captain Macbride, who was a member of that council of officers, treated the report as the result of the duke's artifices and influence, rather than the unbiassed opinion of the board. Colonel Barré also remarked, that the officers had been deluded by the sophistry of the master-general, and that Mr. Pitt would not have been so zealous in this wild and extravagant project, if his conscience had not been taken by surprise. Lord Mahon supported the duke's plan, chiefly because the works might be defended by a very small number of men. Lord Hood and some other naval officers pronounced the system to be expedient and judicious; but Mr. Fox and Mr. Windham opposed it as derogatory from the honour and consequence of the navy.

Mr. Sheridan ridiculed the zeal of the noble engineer; and argued, that, from the manner in which the report was framed, and from various circumstances, it did not sanction or authorise the system. If the officers had been left to their free judgment, and had expressed a decided and unreserved approbation of the plan, he would have acquiesced in their determination; but, as the opinions given by the military officers were founded on hypothetical suggestions, and on the data of the master-general, for the truth or propriety of which they refused to become responsible,—as the data involved the supposition of events highly improbable,—and as there was reason to believe that the unparticularised minutes of the naval officers were unfavourable to the plan,—he could not give his assent to the report, or to the motion which the minister had drawn from it. The division upon this question exhibited an exact equality of votes. It was therefore the duty of the speaker of the house to decide the point; and he boldly and judiciously voted for the amendment.

This session was remarkable for the commencement of a prosecution against Mr. Hastings, for crimes and misdemeanors committed during his oriental administration. In a studious perusal of the records of the affairs of India, Mr. Burke had discovered what he deemed the most satisfactory proofs of the criminality of the governor-general; and he resolved, whatever might be the consequence, to pursue the delinquent with all the indignation of offended justice. He foresaw that his course would be retarded by difficulties and by opposition; but no considerations of this kind could restrain his ardour. In a meeting of anti-ministerial politicians, when the expediency of the prosecution was discussed, lord North and other members of the party objected to the measure; but Mr. Burke persisted in his determination, and Mr. Fox consented to join his efforts to those of a friend whom he revered. The improved eloquence of Mr. Sheridan was associated in the same cause; and the logical acumen of Mr. Windham aided the confederacy of zeal and talent.

Having deliberated upon the different modes of prosecution which might be adopted, Mr. Burke fixed on that of impeachment at the bar of the house of lords. To substantiate the charges, he moved for a multiplicity of papers, some of which were granted, while others, after warm and able speeches on both sides, were refused. When he had prepared nine articles of charge, he presented them to the house; and others followed, till the number reached twenty-two. Some of the charges were not very important, even if they had been fully proved; but many were of sufficient weight to draw down the severities of censure and punishment, if they had been established by irrefragable testimony.

Mr. Hastings, being allowed to defend himself before witnesses were examined, made pompous boasts of his services, and freely animadverted on the character and conduct of his chief accuser. To the charge respecting the injurious and cruel treatment of the Rohillas, he replied, that he had merely assisted the nabob of Oude, the ally of the company, in punishing the treachery and perfidy of that tribe of adventurers, by compelling them to quit a territory which they had usurped. The article which accused him of stopping the tribute due to the mogul, and depriving that prince of two provinces which had been assigned for his support, was answered by remarks on the impolicy of suffering the Mahrattas to possess them, after he had thrown himself into their hands. The expulsion of Cheit Sing from the zemindary of Benares, was vindicated by assertions of the contumacy of that traitor. The defendant allowed that the jaghirs of the begums of Oude, (the dowries of the mother and grandmother of the nabob vizier,) were guaranteed by the company, and affirmed that the proposal of resumption was accompanied with the promise of an equivalent; but he maintained, that the forcible opposition to that measure, and the treacherous intrigues of those ladies and their partisans, justified him in agreeing to what had been termed their spoliation. The charge concerning Farruckabad was repelled by a denial of all responsibility for the good or bad government of that province; and, instead of having promoted the depopulation and the miseries of Oude, he declared that he had effectually remedied the disorders of that country. The pretended breach of faith toward the ranah of Gohud, which formed another charge, was merely, he said, the discontinuance of the grant of aid and protection to a base and perfidious ally; and the exercise of force at Sahlone, he thought, deserved praise instead of censure, as it was directed against rebellious banditti. On the heads of revenue, contracts, and increase of establishments, he admitted that rigid œconomy did not prevail in every instance; but he claimed the merit of general attention to the true interests of the company. Being charged with the irregular acceptance of presents, he answered, that he had received them for the benefit of his employers, and had never applied any part of them to his own use without the permission of the court of directors. He contended, that the accusations drawn from the war with the Mahrattas, and from the peace with that state, were ill-founded; for he was not the author of the war, and the pacification had been almost universally considered as honourable and advantageous.

June 1. In the adduction of the first charge, the eloquence of Mr. Burke was diffuse and declamatory, strong and vivid, indignant and pathetic. He asserted the purity of his motives for the prosecution, his freedom from passion, and his regard for public justice. He represented the grand question, not as a mere dispute respecting the character of an individual, or a point of municipal regulation, but as a national and imperial question, decisive of the good or ill government of millions now existing or yet unborn. He lamented the difficulty of bringing forward the charges with full effect, from the exorbitant power and commanding influence which the accused governor had enjoyed, the remoteness of the country in which he had acted, and other discouraging circumstances: yet he confided in the strength of the evidence which he had found means to procure, and trusted to the honour and humanity of the house for the success of his well-meant endeavours. After a general survey of the charges, he detailed that which concerned the Rohillas. He described in flattering terms the state of their country, their simplicity of manners, their zeal for agriculture and commerce. He denied that there was any just or even plausible ground for the violence to which they were subjected. He stigmatised the rapacity and villany of the nabob by whom they were attacked, and the cruelty of the governor who had assisted that prince in the work of ravage and desolation. He did not mean to affirm that the whole nation had been banished or exterminated: he confined the remark to 60,000 men, women and children, who had been driven from their homes by the ministers of remorseless tyranny. For this conduct alone, without regard to the other heads of accusation, Mr. Hastings, he thought, deserved exemplary punishment.

The guaranty of the company for the payment of the money claimed from the Rohillas by the nabob, was represented by Mr. Hardinge as an after-thought, and a weak pretence for gross injustice and cruelty; but lord Mulgrave and Mr. Grenville thought, that the concern of our countrymen in the expedition was sufficiently justified by policy and by prior engagement. Mr. Fox endeavoured to rescue the character of the Rohillas from the odious imputations thrown out by Mr. Hastings, and spoke of the war undertaken against them in pointed terms of censure; and Mr. Francis, with great warmth, supported the accusation. The house, however, by a majority of 52, voted against the validity of the charge.

June 13. The article of crimination, in the affair of Benares, was moved by Mr. Fox, who contended that the governor-general had acted in an arbitrary and oppressive manner towards Cheit Sing, had harassed him by repeated exactions beyond the amount of the stipulated tribute, had insulted him by an ignominious arrest, and had malignantly promoted his ruin. Mr. Pitt did not agree with the mover in every part of the charge; but he admitted the criminality of Mr. Hastings in resolving to exact from the rajah the enormous sum of fifty lacks of rupees (above one half of a million of pounds sterling) for a mere delay in complying with a small and justifiable demand. His assent to the motion gave great joy to the accusing party. The allegations of major Scott, Mr. Grenville, and other speakers who inveighed against the conduct of the rajah, and applauded or excused that of his great adversary, made little impression upon the house; and the charge was allowed, by a majority of 39, to be a fair ground of impeachment.

Few subjects of national or general policy excited greater solicitude in the liberal and humane, than the question of the slave-trade. Mr. Wilberforce, to whom the management of this business was assigned, being disabled from attending the house by illness, Mr. Pitt moved a resolution, importing, that the house, in the ensuing session, take into consideration the circumstances of the slave-trade. The final result of this motion, after much procrastination, will be recorded in the history of 1791. In the mean time, in order to afford relief to the unhappy sufferers, Mr. William Dolben proposed a bill to regulate the transportation of slaves, from the coast of Africa to the West Indies. In the prosecution of this motion, it was delivered in evidence at the bar of the lower house, that five feet six inches in length, and sixteen inches in breadth, was the average space allotted to each slave. The lower deck of the vessel was entirely covered with bodies. The space between the floor of that deck and the roof above, in height about five feet eight inches, was divided by a platform also covered with human bodies. The slaves were chained two and two by their hands and feet, and were, by means of ring-bolts, fastened to the deck. In that sultry climate, their allowance was a pint of water each day; and they were usually fed twice a day with yams and horse-beans. After meals they were compelled by the whip to jump in their irons, which by the slave-dealers was called dancing. The motion was opposed, with a zeal disgraceful to humanity, by the merchants of London and Liverpool. The lord-chancellor Thurlow so far forgot the duties and the decorum of his station, as to term the motion, in derision, "a fit of philanthropy;" but the exertions of the premier counteracted the bigotry and selfishness of his colleagues, and the bill was passed in both houses by a respectable majority.

The advancement of art, science, and useful knowledge, was an object of all others the most congenial with the wishes of the sovereign; and the voyages of discovery, by which the reign of George III. was distinguished, will always be regarded as the most decisive evidence of his philanthropy and his wisdom.

Voyages of this description, in the Pacific ocean, had been made, by order of his majesty, by commodore Byron, in the years 1764, 1765, and 1766; and by captains Wallis and Carteret, the former in the Dolphin, and the latter in the Swallow sloop, in the years 1767, 1768, and 1769; and some interesting discoveries had been made by them chiefly on the south of the equator.

But the most memorable, and in their results the most important, voyages, in these and in the north-eastern seas, were performed by captain James Cook. Having recommended himself to the admiralty, by his services as a naval officer, and his skill in the science of navigation, he was appointed in 1768, to conduct an expedition to the South seas, accompanied by Mr. Green as astronomer, and Mr. Solander and sir Joseph Banks as naturalists, for the purpose of observing the transit of Venus, which was to take place in the month of June, in the ensuing year. He was instructed, at the same time, to prosecute discoveries in that quarter of the globe. No man could be better qualified for the commission with which he was honoured. His understanding was vigorous, his frame and constitution robust, his disposition enterprising, his temper patient and persevering; and he had that ardent fondness for his profession, which, when united with talents, may not improperly be distinguished by the appellation of genius.

Leaving England in the ship Endeavour, August the 26th, 1768, he took a south-westerly course, and having doubled cape Horn, he steered for Otaheite, where their observations were made. After that he visited the neighbouring islands of Huaheine, Ulietea, Otaha, and Bolabola, to which he gave the name of Society Islands. Then sailing to New Zealand, in the same hemisphere, he made a survey of the two islands, and discovered the straits between them, afterwards called by his name. When he had explored the eastern coast of New Holland, before unknown, he steered for England by the cape of Good Hope, and reached it June the 12th, 1771.

He sailed upon his second voyage in July, 1772, and took a south-westerly course. After visiting Otaheite and the Friendly Islands, he proceeded to latitude 71, where he was stopped by a barrier of ice. In traversing these southern regions, he discovered Palliser Islands, and New Caledonia, the island, which he named Georgia, in honour of his sovereign, and an unknown coast, called by him Sandwich Land, the Thule of the southern hemisphere. He returned from his voyage in July, 1775; having, among other objects, ascertained the important question of a southern continent; for he had traversed that hemisphere, between the degrees of 40 and 70, in such a manner, as not to leave a possibility of its existence, unless near the pole, and out of the reach of navigation.

He sailed the ensuing year on his third and last voyage; the chief object of which was the discovery of a north-east passage. On this voyage, after making some discoveries in the southern hemisphere, he steered for the western coast of America; which he traced till he came to a strait which divides it from Asia. Having made such an accurate survey of the coasts of each, as to demonstrate the impracticability of a northern passage, he sailed to the Sandwich islands, where, unfortunately for his country, he was killed in 1779, in the month of February, in a skirmish with the savages of Owhyhee. Whilst I am relating the enterprises of this celebrated navigator, which were such as added essentially to the science of geography, we ought not to be inattentive to another part of his merit, noticed by his companion and biographer, captain James King, which will give pleasure to every humane person; the method which he discovered, and so successfully pursued, for preserving the health of seamen; which forms a new æra in navigation, and will transmit his name to posterity, among the friends and benefactors of mankind.

That no doubt might be left on the minds of men, respecting the existence of a passage to the East Indies by the north-east, commodore Phipps and captain Lutwick were sent out, before Cook's last voyage, to carry on the discoveries which had been made by the Russians and others, in the seas near the north pole. They sailed in June, 1773; they landed at Spitzbergen; and, having passed Hachyt's Headland, they proceeded so far as the 81st degree of latitude, where they were arrested by the ice, and with difficulty disengaged themselves; the thermometer at that time standing at 37° 46′. The result of this voyage, the journal of which is a narrative of difficulties, hardships, and dangers, corresponded with the subsequent report of Cook; that no passage would ever be found practicable in that direction. Even in these remote regions, nature has bestowed on her works beauties of a peculiar kind, the description of which will be gratifying to those who are disposed to such contemplations. The narrator of this voyage thus describes the country near Smearingburgh harbour, in the 81st degree of latitude:—"The country is stony, and, as far as can be seen, full of mountains, precipices, and rocks. Between these are hills of ice, generated, as it should seem, by the torrents that flow on the melting of the snow on the sides of those towering elevations, which, being once congealed, are continually increased by the snow in winter, and the rain in summer, which often freezes as soon as it falls. By looking on these hills, a stranger may fancy a thousand different shapes of trees, castles, churches, ruins, ships, whales, monsters, and all the various forms that fill the universe. Of the ice-hills, there are seven that more particularly attract the notice of a stranger. These are known by the name of the seven iceburgs, and are thought to be the highest of the kind in that country. When the air is clear, and the sun shines full upon these mountains, the prospect is inconceivably brilliant. They sometimes put on the bright glow of the evening rays of the setting sun, when reflected upon glass, at his going down; sometimes they appear of a bright blue, like sapphire, and sometimes like the variable colours of a prism, exceeding in lustre the richest gems, disposed in the most exquisite forms, glittering with a lustre that dazzles the eye, and fills the air with astonishing brightness.

Among the naval enterprises of the English, the means employed by government for the introduction of the bread-fruit tree, which had been found at Otaheite, into the West India islands, is deserving of notice. Sir Joseph Banks having given it as his opinion, that this tree might be successfully cultivated in them, captain Bligh sailed in the autumn of 1787, with a vessel destined to bring a cargo to the West Indies. The ship being laden with them, the captain took his departure from Otaheite April the 4th, 1789. But twenty-three days after, when the ship was in the midst of the Pacific, steering its course for the Moluccas, the crew mutinied, and put the captain, and eighteen of the crew, who would not join the mutineers, overboard into the ship's boat, with only an hundred and forty pounds of bread and thirty of meat, to shift for themselves. Fortunately they were provided with a compass and quadrant: with the assistance of these, in forty days, during which there was almost continued rain, they reached the Dutch settlement of Timor, which was calculated to be 4000 miles from the place where they were embarked.

This disaster did not, however, prevent the execution of the design. After several unsuccessful attempts, the introduction of the bread-fruit, says Mr. Edwards, was happily accomplished, in January, 1793, by the arrival at St. Vincent of his majesty's ship Providence, captain W. Bligh, and the Assistant brig, captain N. Portlock, from the South seas, having on board many hundreds of those trees, and a vast number of curious plants, which were properly distributed through the island of St. Vincent, and Jamaica, and have already afforded the pleasing prospect, that his majesty's benevolence will be felt in the most distant periods.

CHAPTER XXXI.

GEORGE III.

Attempt on the Life of the King by Margaret Nicholson—Commercial Treaty with France—Establishment of a Settlement for Convicts at Botany Bay—Internal State of France—ORIGIN AND CAUSES OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION—Character of Lewis XVI., of his Queen, and of the principal Nobles and Courtiers—Review of Continental Affairs—Debates on the Impeachment of Mr. Hastings.

WHILE his Britannic majesty was in danger of being embroiled with France, he adjusted all differences with the court of Spain. Disputes had occurred with respect to the logwood country, and
July 14. a convention was now signed, allotting a new district to his subjects for Musquito shore, which they agreed to evacuate, and in some respects extending their privileges.

1786. This negotiation had not long been concluded, when the king's life was suddenly exposed to danger. As he was alighting from his carriage on the 2nd of August, a woman approached him, on pretence of offering a petition, and aimed at him with a knife; but fortunately he escaped all injury. The bold assailant was named Margaret Nicholson, who, being examined by several medical gentlemen, and also by some members of the privy-council, was declared to be insane, and was therefore confined in Bethlehem hospital, instead of being tried for high treason. A public thanksgiving was ordered, for the safety of so valuable a life; and addresses of congratulation were sent to court from all parts of the kingdom.

The commercial agreement with France was now approaching to completion. It was at length prepared for signature, and received the sanction of both courts. It was stipulated in general terms, that there should be a perfect reciprocity of navigation and commerce, between the subjects of the two kings, in all their European dominions, with a view of giving fair encouragement to the produce and manufactures of both countries, by a discontinuance of prohibitory duties, and putting an end to illicit trade. A particular tariff was adjusted with regard to a great number of commodities; and all articles which it did not include were to be imported on the terms allowed to the most favoured nations. This treaty, though not universally acceptable in Great Britain, appears to have given satisfaction to a considerable majority of the nation. While the king was reflecting with pleasure on its accomplishment, he sustained a domestic affliction, in the loss of the princess Amelia, who died unmarried, in the seventy-sixth year of her age, on the 31st of October, bequeathing the greater part of her ample property to her nephews, the princes Charles and Frederic of Hesse-Cassel. She lived chiefly in retirement, cultivating the pleasures of social life.

The embarrassments in which the prince of Wales had involved himself, by his want of œconomy, gave rise to some difficulties. Mr. Newnham repeatedly mentioned the case, at the desire of the prince, who had found his royal father unwilling to comply with his wishes. The minister deprecated the agitation of an affair of such delicacy in the house, without authority from the king; and his expostulations delayed the alderman's proposals. In the conversations which occurred, allusions were made to the supposed marriage of his royal highness with Mrs. Fitzherbert. Mr. Fox pronounced this report to be an infamous falsehood; and indeed the prince and that lady were not married according to the forms of the established church. An accommodation at length took place between the king and his son; and the business was regularly brought forward in a message from the crown, stating that the prince had contracted great debts, the discharge of which, out of his annual income, would render it impossible for him to support an establishment suited to his rank and station; that his majesty had therefore ordered the annual payment of £10,000 to the prince out of the civil list, in addition to the former allowance; and that he trusted to the liberality of parliament for the liquidation of the debts, as his son "had given the fullest assurances of his firm determination to confine his future expences within his income." This application was answered by a request, that the king would advance £161,000 for the payment of the debts in question, and also £20,000 for the reparation and improvement of Carlton-house; and the commons, with one voice, promised to indemnify him.

One of the acts of this session provided for the establishment of a court of judicature in New South Wales, a part of the great island, (or continent,) of New Holland. The prisons of the realm being inconveniently crowded, the idea of a distant removal, combined with a hope of colonial advantage, had occasioned the resolution of sending convicts to the country bordering on Botany Bay, of which captain Cook had made favourable mention. About 800 delinquents, of which number three-fourths were males, were sent out under the care of captain Phillips, who was commissioned to act as governor of the future colony. The duration of the voyage was about eleven months; and when the fleet had reached the bay, the scarcity of fresh water rendered it expedient to seek another spot. Port Jackson, being found more eligible, became the primary seat of the criminal exiles. The necessary rigour of the colonial government operated to the repression of crimes, and the preservation of general order; and on many of the convicts a sense of shame had an extraordinary influence.

After long debates on the delinquency of Mr. Hastings, a vote of impeachment followed, and on the 10th of May, Mr. Burke, at the bar of the house of lords, "in the name of the house of commons, and of all the commons of Great Britain," impeached Mr. Hastings of high crimes and misdemeanors. Being taken into custody, the prisoner entreated the peers to admit him to bail. His request was granted, and while he was bound in the sum of twenty thousand pounds, two of his friends gave security each for ten thousand pounds. The trial was postponed to another session, and by various delays it was protracted to an extraordinary duration.

Before the singular and momentous revolution in the public opinion, and in the relative measures of the continental states, the changes of domestic policy, and the contentions of domestic parties, fade into insignificance; and the situation of France, at this important period of its history, will peculiarly demand the attention of the historian. 1787.

To the limited eye of man, incapable of pervading futurity, and of removing the darkness which surrounds it, Lewis XVI. presented, at the close of the American war, a very different, and a much more enviable aspect than the sovereign of England. Fortunate in having succeeded to a prince who was sunk in dissolute pleasures, and lost to all public exertion, before his reign expired, he ascended to the throne of Henry IV. under every flattering circumstance of youth and of prosperity. His want of any eminent talents seemed to be amply compensated by œconomy, application, decorum of manners, and, above all, by a selection of wise and able ministers. A successful war, which eclipsed and obliterated the disgraces and defeats sustained by France, in her last rupture with England, endeared him to a loyal and affectionate nation, characterised for ages by its predilection and attachment to its monarchs. A queen distinguished by endowments of mind, of manners, and of person, not less than by her high rank and imperial descent, had formed the bond of connexion between the houses of Bourbon and of Austria; while she rendered Versailles the residence of pleasure, gaiety, and magnificence. France appeared to re-ascend in the scale of Europe, in the same proportion as Great Britain declined; and flattery, if not reason, already predicted the revival of the proud age of Lewis XIV.

But to confound the speculation of policy, and to evince the hasty transitions of human greatness, it was precisely at this very juncture that the seeds were sown, which were afterwards matured, which overturned the very elements of order and government, stained the palace of Versailles with blood, and produced the extinction of property, personal security, and every thing dear to mankind. The troops which were sent as auxiliaries to the rebellious provinces of Great Britain beyond the Atlantic, speedily imbibed the spirit of freedom which they were commanded to defend, and did not relinquish these sentiments, so incompatible with absolute monarchy, when they returned to their native country. On the other hand, the anticipation of the public revenue, necessarily produced by a war, however glorious and successful, added to the immoderate expences of a dissipated and luxurious court, soon reduced the king to adopt a measure, which, though disinterested, and even patriotic, opened the way to shake his throne. Lewis was persuaded to break the royal household, to dismiss about 400 officers, holding posts immediately about his person, and to content himself with a less expensive and splendid establishment. Perhaps no advice more replete with calamity could have been conceived or followed. The pomp and external paraphernalia of majesty being once withdrawn, and the numbers of nobility, attached to the sovereign by interest, vanity, and affection, being once disbanded, the throne was left naked, unprotected, and exposed to insult. Experience has evinced its destructive tendency; and has shewn, that only a limited monarch, who reigns in the affections of his subjects, and whose interests are intimately blended with those of his people, can remain an object of respect and homage, divested of the splendor and protection of a royal court and numerous household.

The empress-queen Maria-Theresa closed, at this period, a reign of forty years, marked by the most striking vicissitudes of prosperous and of adverse fortune. During the existence of the powerful combination, which shook her throne in the commencement of her life, she exhibited the most undaunted magnanimity, the greatest resources of mind, and a courage superior to her sex. Driven from Vienna in 1741, while Bohemia and Austria were overrun by the French and Bavarians, she found protection and succours in the loyalty of her Hungarian subjects, who, at sight of her beauty, youth, and misfortunes, forgot their hereditary jealousy and enmity of the imperial house from which she sprung. The afternoon and evening of her reign, though frequently disturbed by foreign wars, were passed by her in the discharge of every duty demanded from a sovereign to her people. Mild, clement, humane, munificent, and ever extending the proofs of her parental tenderness to her wide extended dominions, she was idolized by the Hungarians, beloved by the Flemings, and dear to every order of citizens. That piety and fortitude which had characterised her life, accompanied and brightened her dying moments.

Her crowns descended to her son Joseph, a prince who had given premature expectations of genius and capacity, and whose emulation of the king of Prussia promised to render him worthy of so great an antagonist. But Europe was soon undeceived in this favourable anticipation of the talents of Joseph II. Agitated with perpetual and varying schemes of conquest; restless and incapable of repose; planning innovations in religion and manners, which were no sooner executed than revoked; oppressive and despotic, without the art either of concealing these qualities, or of rendering their effects palatable to his subjects; menacing, at the same moment, the just franchises of the Netherlands, and the antient liberties of Hungary; dreaded in the empire, and detested in his own capital; anxious to enlarge the limits of his dominions, even at the expence of faith and justice; rapacious of ecclesiastical property, and profuse only of the blood of his people; Joseph soon alienated the affections of every rank, and closed a tempestuous reign, unregretted and unlamented; leaving the house of Austria in embarrassments, produced by his violence and ambition, scarcely inferior to those, which had so nearly overturned and extinguished it, at the death of his grandfather Charles VI.

Two illustrious and extraordinary princes then filled the thrones of Muscovy and of Prussia. A woman was still destined to sway the sceptre of the czars, and to govern the immense regions extending from the Frozen to the Caspian sea. Unequalled in magnificence, and unconquered in war, Catherine II. had enlarged the limits of her vast dominions, covered the Black sea with Russian fleets, and threatened the entire subversion of the Ottoman power. Protectress of the sciences and liberal arts, she cultivated the friendship of d'Alembert, courted the correspondence and the praises of Voltaire, and, like Lewis XIV., extended her munificence to men of letters throughout every kingdom of Europe. Intoxicated with success, and elevated to the summit of human grandeur and felicity, she forgot the friendly hand which had aided her arms, and taught them the way to victory. While dreaded and admired in every quarter of the globe, she seemed to have chained the inconstancy of fortune, and to defy the changes and clouds which so frequently darken the conclusion of a female reign.

Frederic, covered with laurels, and retired from Berlin to the solitary magnificence of Potsdam, in the bosom of literary repose, and sinking under the pressure of augmenting infirmities, advanced towards the termination of his memorable life and reign. Alienated from, or indifferent to the misfortunes of England, he regarded, with a philosophic and averted eye, her late unequal contest against so many powers; and extended no relief, nor made any exertion in favour of his antient ally.

Portugal alone, among so many neutral or hostile states, ventured at this distressful moment to give some affirmative marks of friendship to the crown of Great Britain.

While Europe exhibited this aspect, so little calculated to awaken hope, fresh losses and defeats awaited the English arms beyond the Atlantic. The capture of the island of St. Eustatius, which, on its first promulgation, had diffused a general joy throughout the nation, produced in the event only obloquy to the captors, and a suspension the most untimely and injurious in our naval and military exertions; while the troops which should have acted with vigour against the enemy, were sunk in inactivity, or occupied in plunder.

At length, however, the genius of Great Britain, for a time obscured and fettered, began to assert its antient energy; and liberated from domestic anarchy, prepared to re-appear on the theatre of Europe, from whence she had been banished by internal calamities and distress. The signature of the "Germanic league" at Berlin, whose object was the preservation of the liberties of the empire against the ambition of Joseph II., was the first symptom exhibited of returning attention to the concerns of the continent; and though this confederation was only acceded to by his Britannic majesty in his capacity of elector of Hanover, yet its effect extended unquestionably beyond its ostensible object, and again recalled the English nation to general view and consideration.

While under a wise and vigorous government, we were thus resuming our antient eminence and dignity among the European states, the clouds of discontent and civil commotion were rapidly collecting over the monarchy of France. The finances, involved, since the cessation of the late war, in augmenting embarrassments and inextricable difficulties, it might have been found beyond the probity of a Sully, or the capacity of a Colbert, to re-establish: in the hands of Calonne, raised to the superintendance, they presented a prospect of public insolvency, as imminent as unavoidable. Though the court of Versailles was much diminished in majesty and splendor, by the numerous reforms which had successively taken place; yet the ministry had not substituted any judicious system of frugality, nor adopted any measures of energy or wisdom, either for the alleviation of national burdens, and liquidation of the enormous debt, contracted under the late and present king, nor (a measure which seemed to be still more necessary for their personal safety) to guard against the gathering storm of public violence and indignation.

Lewis XVI. had already, in a considerable degree, survived the respect, though he continued to enjoy the affection of his people. The first years of his reign, conducted by Maurepas and Vergennes, had been distinguished by the most brilliant success; which, while it dazzled and flattered the national vanity, had in a great measure concealed from view the ruin which it occasioned in the finances. The king possessed none of those qualities, either corporal or mental, calculated to fascinate, and to supply the place of more solid endowments. His figure was destitute of dignity, and his address awkward and embarrassed. He neither knew how to assume the open and winning manners of Henry IV., nor how to adopt the majestic condescension of Lewis XIV. Attached to the queen from motives rather sensual than intellectual, and restrained by religious scruples from forming any connexions of gallantry with other women, he never in any instance violated his nuptial fidelity, though surrounded by courtiers anxious to anticipate, and eager to administer to his desires on the first intimation. Addicted to the pleasures of the table, and sometimes induced to pass the limits of temperance and sobriety, he yielded, in those moments of facility, to the demands which the profusion of the queen, and of his brother, the count d'Artois, made it necessary for them continually to renew. His own expences were moderate, and his pleasures few. The former were chiefly confined to the construction of the castle of Compiegne, and the repairs of the palace of Versailles. The latter consisted chiefly in the amusement of the chace. Though much neglected in his education during the life of Lewis XV., his mind was not uninformed; and he had attained, since his accession to the throne, a very considerable acquaintance with polite letters, history, and geography, by his own private application and solitary study, unassisted by any aid. In the art of reigning, he had unfortunately made little progress or proficiency. Unambitious and moderate in his character, he formed no views of conquest. He even disapproved, though but passively, of the alliance with America, into which his ministers had led him at the commencement of his reign; and suffered himself, with some degree of aversion and reluctance, to be made an accessary to the independence of the thirteen colonies.

His parts, however sluggish, inert, and limited, yet were not inadequate to the comprehension and discharge of the high duties annexed to his station. He unquestionably loved his people, and passionately desired, at the price of every personal renunciation and sacrifice, to render his reign dear to France. Averse to cruelty, and of a nature accessible to the impressions of pity and humanity, he threw open the gates of the castle of Vincennes, which for ages had been one of the principal prisons of state; and mitigated, in numerous instances, the rigour of arbitrary power, which his grandfather had strengthened and abused. His behaviour on the night of the 5th of October, 1789, has evinced, notwithstanding the doubts which have been entertained on that point, that he did not want personal resolution and fortitude. But the quality in which he was eminently deficient, and to the want of which may be principally ascribed all the calamities of his life, was political courage and decision. In times of tranquillity and repose, this defect might not have been perceived; or if discovered, might have yet been limited in its effects: in tempestuous periods, and popular insurrections, it convulsed the monarchy, and menaced the existence of the throne itself.

The character of the queen, though strongly contrasted with that of Lewis XVI., was perhaps still more calculated to alienate the affections, and excite the clamours of the nation. Of a figure favoured by nature, and adorned with gracious and insinuating manners, she was formed to attach mankind. The short period which elapsed, subsequent to her marriage with the dauphin in 1770, and previous to her ascending the throne, was marked with the most general partiality, and by all the flattering prognostics of poetry and genius, who anticipated the future glories and felicity of her reign. Her education at the court of Vienna, under the severe inspection of Maria-Theresa, a princess eminent for her chastity and piety, seemed in some measure to guarantee the existence of these qualities in her daughter. But Maria-Antoinette appears to have inherited scarcely any of the characteristic virtues and vices of the Austrian family, except her attachment to the house from whence she sprung. The fond predictions of adulation, offered to the dauphiness, were not realised by the queen. Her levity of manners; her expensive prodigality; her dissipations; her attachments; her retirements; perhaps, more than all these defects, her supposed abuse of the ascendant, which she had acquired and preserved over her husband, gradually estranged every order of the people; and eventually, as the public embarrassments augmented, rendered her generally odious. Her actions were examined with the most severe and unjust spirit of national enquiry. Her political connexions with the imperial ambassador were as loudly arraigned on the one hand, as her personal intimacy with the count d'Artois, was strongly censured on the other. Imputations the most injurious to her fame, as a woman and a wife, were added to accusations of her disposition to sacrifice the interest and squander the treasures of the kingdom over which she reigned, in order to aggrandise her brother the emperor. She was accused of ministering to the weaknesses, and even stimulating the appetites of the king, with a view to avail herself of his fondness, or temporary privation of reflection.

The continual visits, and long interviews, which she accorded to Mademoiselle Bertin, excited sentiments of disapprobation in those, who thought the leisure of the first queen in Europe indecently thrown away, in disquisitions upon a cap, or consultations upon a handkerchief. Her purchase of the palace of St. Cloud, in the midst of general pecuniary distress, was taxed with equal imprudence and profusion. Her frequent retirements to Trianon were stigmatised, as exhibiting scenes unfit for the public eye. The mysterious and inexplicable transaction, relative to the famous necklace, asserted to have been purchased by her; although the cardinal de Roan, and the comtesse de la Motte, were the victims of it, yet had left impressions disadvantageous to her honour in the minds of a nation, disposed to see all her actions through an unfavourable medium. Her predilection for, and her attachment to the duchess de Polignac, suffered the most malignant comments of satirical prejudice; and the liberal donations, or high employments, with which that family was distinguished, necessarily added to the load of public execration. The accumulated topics of popular invective and animadversion, were circulated with rapidity, and received with equal avidity, by an ignorant and credulous multitude, who filled the arcades of the "Palais Royal," and who imbibed the most inveterate detestation of their queen, as conceiving her the author of the public distress. They had already in some degree marked her out as a victim to the general indignation; and anxiously awaited for the favourable occasion, which should liberate the sovereign and the nation from the pretended evils of her influence, and leave Lewis XVI. to the impulse of his natural beneficence and affection for his people.

The count de Provence, the eldest of the king's two brothers, acted a very inferior and subordinate part upon this great theatre. Either destitute of talents to excite public attention, or repressing them from motives of prudence and situation, he appeared only in the back ground; and formed a contrast to the imposing qualities which distinguished the count d'Artois. Of a figure much more graceful and elegant than either of his brothers, this latter prince was likewise adorned with more dignified, if not more courteous manners. Attached to the queen, from similarity of taste and character, he even exceeded her in profusion, expence, and dissipation. After having passed the morning on the "Plaine de Sablons," in the dress and occupation of a jockey, he only retired from these fatigues to repose in the arms of Mademoiselle Contat. His little palace of "Bagatelle," in the "Bois de Boulogne," was at once the scene of the most refined and voluptuous debauch, and of the most profligate pleasures, which luxury could devise or assemble. Two sons already advancing towards manhood, and whose constitutions promised vigorous health, attracted the eyes of the nation; and gave him a manifest superiority to the count de Provence, whose marriage had not been fruitful. The feeble and debilitated state of the dauphin, whose infirmities already appeared to menace a premature end, left only the duke de Normandie between him and the eventual succession to the crown. Though not endowed with any eminent talents, yet, as being of a character more decided and affirmative than either the king or the count de Provence, he came more forward to public view; and, by his adherence to the queen, influenced very considerably the affairs of state.

At a greater distance from the throne, but decorated with the title of First Prince of the Blood, was seen the duke of Orleans. Possessed of an immense revenue, and having in reversion all the domains of his father-in-law, the duke de Penthieure, he might be esteemed the richest subject in Europe. His reputation for generosity and munificence bore, however, no proportion to his ample possessions: on the contrary, though profuse in the gratification of his appetites, he was accused by the popular voice of an attention to œconomy unworthy of his high birth and splendid fortune. Emulous of being thought to resemble Henry IV. and the regent duke of Orleans, from both of which princes he derived his descent, he had no similarity to either, except in the foibles which shaded the character of the former, and in the vices which disgraced the conduct of the latter. The beneficence, the heroic valour, and clemency of mind, which characterised the king of Navarre, were not to be traced in his degenerate grandson. The sublime talents, the military genius, and the various endowments of a statesman and a general, which were combined in the regent, were as vainly sought in the duke of Orleans.

Abandoned to pleasures of every description, yet had he no elevation nor refinement in his amusements. His personal courage, which had sustained some injury, and excited some sarcastic comments, from his behaviour under Orvilliers in 1778, had not been retrieved by his unpropitious attempt to signalize himself, when he accompanied Charles and Robert in their balloon. The malignant reflections formerly thrown out upon his intrepidity as a naval officer, were followed by pasquinades upon his supposed apprehensions in the balloon; and he was said to have been as unfortunate in the park of Meudon, where he alighted from his aerial excursion, as he had been at an earlier period of life, in the vicinity of the islands of Ushant. Notwithstanding these aspersions and defects, he yet possessed qualities which, if conducted by judgment, might have redeemed him from the load of obloquy under which he was oppressed. His talents were certainly above mediocrity, his mind enlarged, his manners condescending and popular, his understanding cultivated by letters, and an extensive acquaintance with mankind.

He was the only prince of the house of Bourbon, who had ever visited England in person; the duke d'Alençon, brother to Henry III. of France, having been the last, who, in the prosecution of his design to marry Elizabeth, had passed over into these kingdoms. The disorders in the finances, and the desperate or arbitrary measures to which the court was compelled perpetually to have recourse, in order to raise new loans, and obtain supplies, had given the duke of Orleans an occasion, of which he gladly availed himself, to regain his long-lost popularity. To this public and ostensible cause of his alienation from the court, were added some private misunderstandings, which had their origin in the interference of the queen, to prevent an alliance which was projected, between the eldest son of the count d'Artois, and the daughter of the duke of Orleans; a marriage which, it was more than possible, might elevate the young princess to the throne of France. Animated and stimulated by these motives, he seemed to awake from the dissolute pleasures in which he had been plunged, and to assume the more dignified and ingratiating character of an opposer of despotism, and a protector of the people. This change of conduct soon produced its full effect; and he passed, with the most rapid transition, from the contempt and reprobation of the inhabitants of Paris, to the height of favour and general attachment.

Such was the aspect which the court of Versailles presented at the commencement of the year 1787, and such were the principal characters and personages of which it was composed. The sources of discontent, and even of revolt and insurrection, were numerous and augmenting. The ordinary channels of revenue were either dried up, or had become inadequate to the exigencies of government. Recourse was therefore reluctantly had to other modes of obtaining supplies; and the convocation of the "Notables" was proposed by Calonne to the king, and adopted immediately as the only remaining expedient.

In these critical circumstances of perplexity and distress, Vergennes, whose high reputation and superior talents had hitherto diffused a lustre over all the councils of France, and alone sustained the tottering load of public credit and grandeur,—this celebrated minister, the successor of Maurepas, and who since his death had, during eight years, held the first place in the administration, was removed by death from a scene to which all his abilities perhaps would have been found unequal. Fortunate in his alliances, in his wars, in his negotiations, in his acquisition of fame, in the enjoyment of the royal favour and the popular opinion; he was yet more happy in not surviving these frail and uncertain possessions. Unlike to Louvois and to Fleury, he neither forfeited the affection of his sovereign, nor outlived his own talents and capacity. Admired, regretted, and lamented, his death seemed to be the signal which unloosed the jarring elements of civil commotion, and which marked the æra of the extinction of tranquillity and obedience.

The dismission of Calonne followed in a few weeks; and the elevation of an ecclesiastic, the archbishop of Toulouse, to the supreme control of the finances, whatever expectations it might at first awaken of alleviation and redress, only tended in the event to aggravate the national calamities, and to increase the popular discontent. New systems, equally unproductive as the preceding, and only calculated for temporary relief, afforded neither a remedy to the pressing necessities of the court, nor to the clamorous grievances of the people. The "Notables" were found to be equally incompetent and averse to adduce any cure for these multiplied distempers of the state. They were therefore dissolved; and the nation already began to demand an assembly of the "States-general," as the last and only measure, competent to extricate and retrieve them from the danger of impending bankruptcy and ruin.

But the troubles and internal feuds of the Dutch commonwealth, which had been long nourished and fed by the political liberality of the cabinet of Versailles, which had grown up under the fostering hand of Vergennes, and which a series of deep and artful negotiations had inflamed and augmented, now approached rapidly to their crisis. Never could they have attained to their maturity at a more inauspicious moment for France; and never was the triumph of fortune, over the machinations of policy, more conspicuously exemplified.

William V., prince of Orange, possessed the stadtholderate of the United Provinces. Allied by name, rather than by blood, to the great house of Nassau, so fertile in heroes and in legislators, few traces of the sublime qualities, which have rendered that family immortal, were to be discovered in their successor. But in the princess, his wife, sprung from the houses of Brandenburg and Nassau united, the characteristic energy of both was visible. Driven out of the province of Holland, by the indignities and insults with which the republican faction had treated the prince, whom they had compelled to retire to Nimeguen, she had the courage to set out for the Hague, and, unattended by any guards, to traverse a hostile country, in the hope of adjusting, by her presence, address, and flexibility, the points in dispute between her husband and the states. In this arduous and delicate attempt she was frustrated, and even her person laid under an arrest, by the brutality of one of the military officers, in the service of the republic. Obliged to abandon her project, and to return to Nimeguen, she invoked the protection and assistance of the king of Prussia, to reinstate the exiled stadtholder in the hereditary dignities and offices, of which he had been so unjustly deprived. It was not to her uncle that she addressed these entreaties. The great Frederic was no more: he had paid the common tribute to mortality, and had expired at Potsdam, in August 1786, under the accumulated weight of age and diseases. But though he no longer animated in person the councils of Berlin, the vigour of his genius survived; it seemed even to have attained new force in the hands of a sovereign, whose more active period of life led him to adopt measures of decision, and whose near relationship to the princess of Orange stimulated him to warmer exertions in her behalf.

The juncture was favourable to the Prussian interposition; and England, under the auspices of a minister, prompt to seize the occasion of again re-appearing, with dignity and effect, on the continent, avowedly joined and aided the attack upon the enemies of the house of Orange. An army of about 15,000 men, commanded by the first military genius in Europe, the duke of Brunswick, entered the territories of the states-general, in September 1787, and overran, with the same rapidity that Lewis XIV. had done in the last century, the province of Holland. Amsterdam itself, the centre of disaffection, and the last asylum of the French and republican factions, after a short and ineffectual struggle, capitulated, and received the conqueror. A complete but almost bloodless revolution was effected; and the Hague, so long a prey to discord and to animosity, saw the stadtholder return, and occupy his high station with every expression of loyalty and attachment.

France, embarrassed and incapable, from her domestic misfortunes, of interfering, either with honour to herself, or efficacy to her friends, though she appeared to make a feeble effort in their favour, yet ultimately gave way to the storm, and consented to disarm; nay more, publicly to deny her having ever intended to injure that party, in whose support she had expended her treasures, and for whom, in more auspicious æras, she would have involved Europe in blood and hostility. The high reputation which so signal a success reflected on the councils of Great Britain, was contrasted and rendered more splendid by a comparison with the fallen state of her antient rival, who, only a few years preceding these events, in conjunction with America, had seemed to give laws in every quarter of the globe. The energy and wise precaution of the minister did not, however, remit its vigilance, or content itself with having liberated the Dutch republic, and reinstated the stadtholder. Attentive to profit by this fortunate and propitious moment, and to avail himself of the gratitude, with which the assistance extended to Holland had equally impressed the government and the people, he cemented those sentiments, by immediately framing, and eventually concluding, a defensive treaty with the United Provinces. It was signed in April 1788, and was evidently built on the model of that which had been terminated, under the auspices of Vergennes, between France and Holland, towards the close of the year 1785. Reciprocal succours, naval and military, were stipulated; and the bands of political union were drawn as close as human wisdom and mutual interest could devise.

This alliance, so much approved, and so highly beneficial to England, was succeeded by a second, similar in its tenor, nature, and tendency, between the courts of St. James's and Berlin, which was ratified in the month of August, in the same year. They had been preceded by a subsidiary treaty between England and the landgrave of Hesse, which enabled the former power, on the payment of a certain annual sum, to demand from the latter, at a very short notice, a body of twelve thousand troops.

Thus, in the space of only four years, which might be said to have elapsed since the complete triumph of the sovereign and the nation over the "Coalition," had Great Britain, under the conduct of a minister who had not yet attained his thirtieth year, risen from a state of unexampled depression to her antient superiority among the European kingdoms. The finances had been re-established by a system of unremitting and severe œconomy. Commerce, aided and emancipated by the wise regulations of an enlarged policy, opened new sources, and navigated seas hitherto unknown or unexplored, in the prosecution of its objects. Public credit attained a point of elevation and permanence, unparalleled since the commencement of the unfortunate war with America. The councils of England, conducted on principles, not of a crooked duplicity, but of rectitude and magnanimity, excited respect and approbation in the surrounding states, while they diffused prosperity and felicity over every part of the island.

Political alliances, and connexions on the continent, added the prospect of stability to every measure, which was calculated for internal security or commercial advantage. The calamities of lord North's administration, and the anarchy which succeeded that unfortunate period; the defalcation of thirteen provinces, and of both the Floridas, from the empire; the disgraces of Saratoga, and of the Chesapeak; the tumults and conflagration of London; in a word, the varied and accumulated misfortunes, which, in a long series of years, had oppressed and almost overwhelmed the commonwealth, were already erased from the recollection. A mild and happy calm had smoothed these troubled waves. The sovereign was deservedly dear to every rank and order of his subjects, who united in regarding him as their father and benefactor. The government, beloved at home, was respected abroad; and the people, happy beyond the example of former times, looked up with equal affection and veneration towards the source of these multiplied benefits.

But amidst the present flattering aspect of affairs, an unexpected and disastrous change was preparing to manifest itself, which no human prudence could have foreseen, or precautions delayed. We were destined to experience, in its fullest extent, the mutability of fortune, and frangibility of greatness; to hold out a memorable lesson to our own and to future times, that the splendor and felicity of man, however solid the foundations on which they may seem to repose, are in the hands of a superior Being, who confers or withdraws them in an instant. I am arrived at that awful and affecting period, when the feelings of all those, who shall peruse these sheets, will anticipate my own; and which, from a variety of motives, I should wish to cover under a veil of oblivion, if the publicity of the great leading facts, and, still more, if the instruction conveyed by the narration itself, as one of the most interesting portions of modern annals, did not supersede my personal inclinations. It is not, however, either in my plan or my intention, to relate the private history of that extraordinary period; or to drag into day-light facts and anecdotes, which, curious and entertaining as they must appear to posterity, are in every sense unfit for the perusal of the present age. Sentiments of duty, delicacy, and respect towards a prince inexpressibly dear to his people; towards a queen, who, for a long series of years, and in every relation of domestic life, has been blameless and exemplary; towards those illustrious persons, on whom the sceptre of George III. must, in the ordinary progress of events, devolve; even motives of prudence, propriety, and decorum arrest my pen, and prevent me from shading a picture, the outline only of which, it is either wise or necessary to hold up to the public eye, placed as we are so near the object. Previous, however, to entering into a detail of the proceedings on the regency, it will be necessary to return to less important subjects.

The frequent consideration of the affairs of India had led to the accusation of sir Elijah Impey. The charges adduced against him were of the following tenor; that he had acted as the instrument of Mr. Hastings in the unprincipled attack on the life of the rajah Nunducomar, whom he unjustly condemned to death; that he had betrayed great partiality and injustice in the Patna cause; that he had systematically extended his jurisdiction; that he had behaved improperly in the Cossijurah cause, had accepted an additional office in defiance of an act of parliament, and was an abettor of the schemes of the governor-general against the begums of Oude and Cheit Sing. When he had made his defence at the bar, it was moved that the first charge should be declared to be a ground of impeachment, after a long speech from sir Gilbert Elliot, who contended, that the authority of the court by which the rajah was tried did not extend over all the inhabitants of British India; that, if it had, the act which rendered forgery a capital crime was not intended to be operative in that country; and that sir Elijah appeared, throughout the business, as the agent and solicitor for the prosecution, rather than an impartial administrator of justice. Mr. Fox reinforced the arguments of sir Gilbert; but Mr. Pitt vindicated the conduct of the judge, and maintained the applicability of the law to the inhabitants of Calcutta, as one of whom the rajah was tried; and, by a majority of 18, the charge was rejected. The house postponed the investigation of the other articles; and no impeachment resulted from the whole inquiry. 1788.

The friend of the judge who so easily escaped judicial cognisance, was subjected to a long trial before the high court of peers in Westminster-hall.* When the articles of accusation and the answers had been read, the lord-chancellor asked who appeared to substantiate the charges. "I stand forth," said Mr. Burke, "at the command of the commons of Great Britain, as the accuser of Warren Hastings." He then commenced a wonderful display of eloquence, which occupied the attention of the court, and a numerous assemblage of admiring auditors, during four days of trial. After an interesting appeal to the justice of the tribunal, he detailed the history of Hindostan from early times, and exhibited a luminous view of the successive governments, the institutions civil and religious, the arts, customs, and manners, of the various tribes of inhabitants. He traced the progress of English intrusion, and minutely described the establishments made by our countrymen. He lamented that, instead of acting as friends or instructors of the natives, they had marked their way by treachery and rapine, and had taught vice rather than virtue. He expatiated on their unjust proceedings, their usurpations of power, and their frequent enormities. He particularised the acts of Mr. Hastings, developed his system of policy, exposed his arbitrary and rapacious views, and endeavoured to hold him up to universal execration, as a monster of tyranny. The governor-general had attempted to justify some of his oppressions by alleging, that, as he found the people in a state of slavery, he had a right to exercise a despotic authority over them. From what source, the orator asked, could he derive such a right? Not from the India company; not from his sovereign, or from either house of parliament; not from the Koran, the institutes of Timour, or the Gentoo code; for by none of these could it be said that despotism was sanctioned. The claim only arose from his own depraved mind and distorted conceptions. He seemed to have adopted a geographical species of morality, and to have formed his ideas of the rights of men, and the principles of government, by the degrees of latitude and longitude, without considering that the immutable principles of justice were suited to every clime, and requisite for every plan of administration. He did not scruple to employ the most infamous villains as his agents, and was therefore answerable for the enormous cruelties perpetrated by those ruffians—cruelties which the accuser depicted with such warmth of colouring, that some of his female hearers were convulsed with horror.

Mr. Burke concluded his speech, or rather his course of orations, by impeaching Mr. Hastings, in the names of insulted and oppressed millions; in the name of that religion which he had disgraced, of that constitution from which he had wantonly deviated, of that system of eternal justice which he had basely violated, which was paramount to all civil ordinances, and coeval with the law of nature.

The committee appointed to manage the impeachment proposed, that, after the adduction of one charge, Mr. Hastings should be required to defend himself particularly against that article, before another should be brought forward; but, though this proposal was justified by reason and precedent, it was pronounced by the lord-chancellor to be contrary to the general practice of courts of law; and a majority of the peers ordered, that all the charges should be heard before the defence should be demanded. The managers acquiesced in this dictation, though Mr. Fox declared that it was the right of the commons to pursue any mode which they might deem most conducive to public justice, and to follow the constitutional law of parliament in preference to the rules of inferior courts.

Feb. 22. This speaker then asserted the pride which he felt in being thus employed. He boasted of the deliberate and dispassionate manner in which the impeachment had been brought forward, not by the men who had the chief sway in the house of commons, but by a party that had little weight or influence, and whose endeavours could only be successful from being exerted in the cause of truth and justice. Proceeding to the Benares charge, he observed, that when the supposed sovereignty of this district had been transferred by the nabob of Oude to the company, Mr. Hastings assumed a greater power over Cheit Sing than his former lord-paramount had ventured to exercise; that he violated his compact with the rajah by demands of extraordinary supplies in three successive years; that he seemed to be actuated on these occasions by personal animosity, not less than by a spirit of rapine; that he converted what had been a mere recommendation from the council of Calcutta into an authoritative demand, by requiring from the rajah a body of cavalry; and accepted (for the use of the company, as he afterwards alleged) a sum of money apparently intended to purchase a rescue from future tyranny. Not content with these exactions, the governor undertook a journey to Benares, to extort a very exorbitant fine, for what he termed the contumacy of the rajah; refused to admit him to an audience; and commanded the seizure of his person. For the sanguinary attack upon the soldiers who executed this order, by the enraged dependants of Cheit Sing, Mr. Hastings was certainly accountable.

On the next day of trial, Mr. Grey closed the charge with spirit and elegance. He animadverted on the allegations of misgovernment, of a concealment of great treasures, of an insubmissive and rebellious spirit—imputations which were by no means proved against Cheit Sing. He noticed the rajah's behaviour under the disgrace of an arrest, in which he had acquiesced with humiliation, not without mildly remonstrating against such treatment. He remarked that, under the sway of a Mohammedan prince, this vassal had found protection, but that, under British sovereignty, his portion was misery. He reprobated the orders given for plundering the fort, in which the mother and the wife of Cheit Sing resided, and contrasted the subsequent condition of the country with its prosperous state under the rajah.

Witnesses were then examined with a view of substantiating this charge, and many papers were read for the same purpose. Mr. Anstruther summed up the evidence with ability, but was less animated than the three preceding speakers.

The next charge was opened by Mr. Adam, who entered into geographical and historical details relative to Oude, treated of the lineage and quality of the begums, invalidated the pretences for depriving them of their property, and execrated the inhumanities to which they and their friends had been exposed. Mr. Pelham enlarged on the same subject; and, after a series of evidence, the talents of Mr. Sheridan illustrated the same charge. Having offered some remarks on the peculiar sanctity of the female character in the East, he detailed the injurious treatment which had been offered to the begums, instead of that protection which was due to their persons and property. Their treasures, he said, had been guaranteed to them by treaty; but no agreements could bind Mr. Hastings when he thought it his interest to infringe them; and, in the prosecution of his rapacious aims, he had even armed the son against the mother. He had repaired to the capital of Oude, and, regardless of the distress of the nabob, had drawn from him £100,000, for the benefit of the company, or rather for his own advantage. He had even propagated the report of a rebellion in that province, that he might have a pretence for a renewal of rapine. Of the rebellion no proof appeared, even in the affidavits upon which so much stress had been laid by the governor-general. Far from giving any encouragement to refractory spirits, or to the enemies of the British government, the begums had shown a sincere regard for our interests; and, at a time when Mr. Hastings was in very perilous circumstances, they were ready to assist him, rather than promote his ruin. The commotions of Oude arose from the rapacity and violence of the English, not from the intrigues or the machinations of secluded females. The charge of rebellion was not devised by the governor before he had determined on the ruin of the begums; it was an after-thought, suggested as a medium of justification. The idea of seizing their treasures originated with him, not with the nabob, by whom it was subserviently adopted, on pretence of a right derived from the Koran; and, though that prince was very unwilling to concur in the resumption of their jaghirs, the governor insisted on the execution of both measures. He ordered Mr. Middleton to prosecute both services with the most active zeal, till the begums should be entirely at the mercy of the nabob; but, for the consequent cruelties perpetrated at Fyzabad, he did not hold himself responsible, because he was not present on the occasion. He sent an Impey to invigorate the flagging conscience of a Middleton, while an Ali Khan was encouraged by the more determined villany of a Hyder Beg.

When Mr. Sheridan had expatiated on these points, had embellished his harangue with elegant effusions of morality and sentiment, he concluded with a forcible appeal to the justice of his noble auditors. His speech was universally admired; and, if he had given no other specimen of his abilities, the record of this alone would transmit his name to posterity with distinguished lustre. But, with all the applause which it obtained, it did not make such an impression on the peers as to convince the majority of the guilt of the impeached governor: in that point of view, its effect was trivial and transitory.

CHAPTER XXXII.

GEORGE III.

[1788 to 1789.]

Tranquil Situation of England—Alarming Indisposition of his Majesty—Grief and Loyalty of the Nation—Debates, on the proposal of a Regency, between the Ministerial Party and that of the Prince of Wales—Recovery of his Majesty—National Exultation—Parliamentary Acts—Bill for the relief of Protestant Dissenters—Changes in the Ministry.

IT is not easy to imagine or to parallel, in the history of the eighteenth century, a period of more perfect serenity, than that which England presented in the autumn of 1788. The king, accompanied by the queen, and surrounded by his family, after having tried the effects of a relaxation from public business, and of the medicinal waters of Cheltenham, had returned to Windsor, not indeed in a state of vigorous health, but by no means in any such declining state of indisposition, as to excite alarm among his subjects. The prince of Wales, as usual, passed the summer at his marine pavilion at Brighthelmstone. Mr. Pitt, occupied in the functions of his station, was detained in the vicinity of the capital; while Mr. Fox, whose faculties of body and mind had been not a little exercised and exhausted, by a toilsome attendance in Covent Garden, during the extreme heats of August, which was thought requisite to secure the election of lord John Townshend, as member for Westminster, indulged a degree of necessary repose, and withdrew for a short time from the hurry of political life. He quitted England, and repaired to Switzerland and Italy, as a scene calculated to amuse and entertain, while it restored and invigorated a constitution, impaired by constant exertion. The great leaders of ministry and opposition, having laid aside their political animosities, were dispersed, in peaceful inactivity, over every part of the kingdom. From this state of public recreation and felicity the nation was suddenly and rudely awoke, by the reports of his majesty being attacked by an unexpected and dangerous illness. The precise nature of it was for several days unascertained and unexplained, even to those, whose residence near the court should have enabled them to obtain early and authentic information. Meanwhile, fame augmented the evil; and the death of the sovereign was believed either to have already taken place, or to be imminent or inevitable.

THE grief and distraction which were manifested in every part of the island, on the publication of this calamitous event, can only be compared with that of the Roman people, on the news of Germanicus being seized with mortal symptoms at Antioch; as the distressful situation of the queen bore some resemblance to that of Agrippina. Passim silentia et genitus, nihil compositum in ostentationem, et quanquam neque insignibus lugentium abstinerent, altius animis mœrebant. Time, however, gradually divulged the truth, and changed the apprehensions of the nation for the situation of the king. His disorder was understood to have fallen upon the brain, and to have produced (as might be expected) a temporary privation of reason. As the cause of this alienation of mind was extraneous and violent, it might be hoped that it could only be of short duration; but the issue was uncertain, while the suspension of all government, and of every function attached to the kingly dignity, was immediate and indisputable. A species of inter-regnum in fact took place; though unaccompanied by any of those circumstances, which usually characterize and attend that unfortunate state. The kingdom, anxious, and with eyes directed towards their sovereign, betrayed no symptoms of confusion, anarchy, or civil commotion. The first minister continued to exercise, by a general submission and consent, the powers delegated to him before the king's indisposition; and the political machine, well constructed and properly organized, sustained no derangement or injury from this shock, except those inseparably connected with delay in the transactions, or negotiations, pending with foreign courts.

1788. Meanwhile, the heir to the monarchy had quitted Brighthelmstone, on the first information of his father's malady, and repaired to Windsor, whither he was followed by the duke of York. Physicians were called in, though ineffectually; and as the nature of the distemper, and of its final termination, opened a wide field to conjecture, change, and alteration, an express was sent to overtake Mr. Fox, in whatever part of the continent he might be found, and to entreat that he would return without delay to England.

The two houses of parliament, in consequence of the preceding prorogation, met in a few days subsequent to these extraordinary events. The general agitation and curiosity, even if they had not been aided by other emotions, of hope and fear, of ambition and of public duty, would alone have produced a numerous attendance. Mr. Pitt opened the subject of their meeting in a very concise and pathetic manner; lamented the occasion, expressed his hope that the cause would speedily be removed, and, in pursuance of that idea, advised an immediate adjournment for a fortnight. The proposition was received in deep silence by the opposite side of the house, and assented to in mute acquiescence. Their leader was not yet arrived; and consequently time was wanted to adjust and determine on their plan of action, under circumstances so delicate and unprecedented. In the interval which took place, his majesty was removed to the palace of Kew. The prince of Wales returned to Carlton-house; and Mr. Fox, impatiently expected, after a journey, which he performed with incredible expedition, from Bologna, in a very infirm and disordered state of health, arrived in London, and assumed his just pre-eminence in the councils of his party.

Those councils evinced their nature and object as soon as their late adjournment was at an end; and Mr. Fox, generously, though perhaps injudiciously, stepping forward in the senate, rather laid claim to the vacant sceptre, in the name and on the behalf of the heir-apparent, as belonging and devolving on him of right, than preferred his pretensions with modesty and submission, at the bar of the assembled nation. Perhaps a step, more injurious to the great personage whom it was intended to serve, or more pregnant with consequences to be deprecated, of every kind, could not have been devised or executed. Perhaps too, when time shall have withdrawn that curtain, which is still stretched across these interesting events, we may discover, that in advancing so unqualified a demand of the regency, he did not precisely follow the dictates of his own elevated mind and illuminated judgment. It awakened a jealous spirit of enquiry into the supposed origin and foundation of that asserted right, in the breasts even of the most liberal and unprejudiced. It compelled administration to probe that problematical and obscure part of the British constitution. It reminded those, to whom the writings of Shakspeare were familiar, of that affecting and pathetic scene, in which Henry IV., under a temporary privation of his faculties, finds, on his recovery, that his eldest son has carried away the insignia of royal dignity, which, had he only waited a few hours, would have been his by devolution.

The discernment of Mr. Pitt saw, and instantly enabled him to profit by, this error in his antagonist. He demanded the discussion and decision of so great and leading a principle, which led to conclusions unlimited and undefined, as well as subversive of the tenure on which a king of England had originally received his crown; previous to any ulterior disposition and distribution of offices. He was joined by a majority of the house in this requisition, and thus commenced his resistance under auspices and circumstances peculiarly favourable. It was in vain that the prince of Wales, already rendered sensible of the injury which his cause had sustained in parliament, and among the people, by Mr. Fox's unqualified claim of right, endeavoured to wave and prevent all further discussion of so invidious a subject. It was in vain that the duke of York, in his brother's name, and by his authority, renounced any such assumption of power, and made this public declaration in the house of lords. Nor was Mr. Fox's attempt to qualify his first assertion, and to give it a more mitigated sense, received with better success in the other house.

The assertion of the right of the heir apparent to the regency, induced the minister to propose the discussion of that point, before any steps were taken to supply the deficiency in the government. Mr. Sheridan deprecated the agitation of this topic as inflammatory; but Mr. Pitt thought that less mischief would result from the consideration of it, than from leaving it undecided. Before it was investigated, a warm debate arose in the upper house, in which, after earl Fitzwilliam had recommended a forbearance of dispute upon this point, the dukes of York and Glocester also opposed the discussion, particularly as their royal relative had no idea of assuming or exercising any power (whatever might be his claim) but that which should be derived from the authority of the lords and commons. It was on this occasion that the lord-chancellor, while he wished the question to be postponed, expressed his grateful sense of the kindness of his sovereign, by saying, If I ever forget him, may God forget me.

Mr. Pitt did not consider the question of right as a point of abstract speculation; it was, he said, a question of fact and of precedent rather than of theory. He referred to the reign of Henry VI. for the most analogous cases. In the minority of that prince, the parliament had appointed a regent, or protector, and had subjected him to the control of a council. A similar course had been pursued when the same monarch, indisposed in body and in mind, was incapable of governing. He instanced other cases, in which an appointment had taken place, proving the sense of our ancestors to have been adverse to a claim of right on the part of the heir apparent. As precedent thus favoured his opinion, reason also led to the same conclusion; for on the incapacitation of the royal branch of the legislature, the right of providing for the security of the realm seemed properly to belong to the hereditary counsellors of the king and the representatives of the people. He moved three resolutions; one asserting the incapacity of the sovereign, another declaring it to be the right and duty of the lords and commons to adjust the mode of supplying the defect of the personal exercise of the king's authority, and the third stating the necessity of their devising the means of giving the royal assent to such a bill as they might frame for the regulation of the powers and authorities adapted to the present exigency. The master of the rolls denied the prince's right; but his claim was asserted by lord North, who would not allow that any former case could justify the proposed interference of the two houses. Mr. Fox spoke diffusely on the same topics; argued that the usage which rendered the crown hereditary, was also applicable to the regency; and said, that the peers and commons had no other concern in the supply of the vacancy of the executive power, than merely to adjudge the regent office to the princely claimant. On a division, Mr. Pitt was supported by 268 voices, while 204 disapproved of his suggestions.

The debate was renewed when the three resolutions were reported. Dec. 1788. Sir Grey Cooper opposed the second and third as unnecessary and unjustifiable; Mr. Windham professed the same sentiments; and Mr. Anstruther cautioned the house against the danger of misapplying the great seal. Mr. Dempster moved without effect, that the prince should be requested to act as regent, and give the royal assent to the proposed bill. Mr. Burke particularly inveighed against the third resolution, which, he said, was pregnant with peril and alarm. The scheme of creating a puppet or pageant, to supply the place of a king, by first putting the great seal to a commission for opening the parliament, and afterwards to another for passing a bill, was palpably unconstitutional; and it might be carried by ambitious men to an unwarrantable extreme. Such an apprehension, the solicitor-general observed, was ill-founded; for the necessity which created the right would also limit that right. Lord North reprobated that extraordinary assumption of power, which would create a phantom for ministerial purposes, and extinguish for the time the executive branch of the constitution. Mr. Fox affirmed that such a legislature as was now proposed, was more dangerous than even a direct usurpation of the two houses; for a conduct of the latter kind would not be endured by the people, whereas the former, being apparently sanctified by the exteriors of the constitution, however destitute of its spirit, might insidiously lead to the greatest mischiefs. That this monster of a legislature was intended to limit the power of the regent, was, he added, a very alarming consideration, derogatory from the honour of the crown, and repugnant to the national welfare. Mr. Pitt defended the intention of using the king's name without his consent, when that use was directed by the wisdom of the parliament; and vindicated the restriction of regent power, that no injury might arise from eventual misconduct to the authority of the sovereign.

The proceedings of the commons were delayed for a week by the indisposition and death of Mr. Cornwall, the speaker, and the election of Mr. Grenville to the vacant office. The re-examination of the physicians, proposed by Mr. Loveden, formed another cause of delay; and even after the committee had reported the result, the house made a slow progress. Mr. Pitt, naming the heir of the crown for the regent, brought forward a plan of restriction, which, he said, would still leave sufficient power in the hands of the prince to provide for the public security and welfare. One of the limitations had reference to the creation of peers; another tended to prevent the grant of pensions or places for life; he also proposed, that the officers of the household should not be controlled by the regent, but should be subject to the directions of the queen; and that her majesty, assisted by a council, should have the care of the king's person. Mr. Powys was disgusted with these invidious restrictions, these mutilations of the constitutional authority of the crown, which were inconsistent with the spirit of the late vote for the renovation of the executive power; and he moved for the investment of the prince with the undivided royal authority. Lord North dreaded very serious evils from the adoption of the minister's plan, repugnant as it was to the constitution, and promotive of jealousy, animosity, and contest. The new speaker of the house plausibly defended the limitations, as barriers against the ill advice which might be given to the prince. Mr. Sheridan was lively and sarcastic; and he did not scruple to impute malignant and factious motives to the framers of this dangerous scheme. Colonel Fullarton ably combated the restrictions, which, he thought, were not only hostile to the constitution, but threatened the realm with all the mischiefs of imbecility and distraction. He therefore trusted, that every man who had a regard for the welfare of his country would concur in the rejection of the plan. Mr. Fox inveighed against the illiberality of fettering a prince, of whose abuse of power no just suspicions could be entertained, and condemned the impolicy of creating such a weak and disjointed government. By a difference of 73 votes, a negative was put on the motion of Mr. Powys.

The grant of unusual power to the queen was opposed by lord Maitland, who hinted that her majesty might be induced or advised to conceal the king's recovery; and Mr. Bouverie, though he wished her to be the guardian of the royal person, moved that she should have no power over the household. Mr. Grey was apprehensive that such power might, by sinister councils, be rendered mischievous. Mr. Fox did not think that any ill effects could arise from the free creation of peers by the regent, to whose proper authority this branch of the prerogative was necessary; but he had strong grounds for disapproving the allowance of power to the queen, because wholly needless, and might be exercised to the great detriment of the state. After several divisions, the popositions were voted according to the wishes of the ministry.

In the house of peers, the restrictive resolutions were enforced by the weighty recommendation of earl Camden, who pronounced them to be justifiable, expedient, and politic, and ridiculed the objections of those who apprehended counteractive influence from the lords of the bedchamber, as if the patronage of the navy, of the army, the church, the law, and other departments, would not be sufficient for the purposes of government, without a supplementary authority over the officers of the household. The bishop of Llandaff (Dr. Watson) conceived that the only proper mode of supplying the present deficiency would be, to declare the prince of Wales regent; after which step any limitations that seemed to be necessary might be discussed. The restriction relative to the peerage was censured by the earl of Sandwich, lord Stormont, and other noblemen, who thought that occasions of rewarding merit by such a grant might arise, and that this appendage of royalty might be usefully exercised against a factious confederacy. That part of the scheme which tended to deprive the regent of all power over the personal estate of the king, was attacked by lord Loughborough, who said, that the subsisting law of the land secured this property from encroachment, and that the resolution would convey unjust suspicions of the prince's honour. These and other objections were fruitless; the resolutions were adopted by the peers; and a joint address was presented to the prince, requesting him to accept the limited regency. Mr. Pitt had before communicated to him an outline of the intended plan, and had received an answer of strong disapprobation; but he consented to undertake the office, that no danger might arise from a longer suspension of the exercise of the royal authority.

Recourse was now had to the great seal, that the parliament might be opened in form, though Mr. Burke stigmatised this procedure by the appellation of a robbery, and accused the ministers of committing a forgery and fraud to support violence, and prosecute the climax of villany. The meeting being thus legitimated, the bill of regency was introduced. It was assailed by Mr. Burke with his usual intemperance. The princes of the royal blood being excluded from the care of the king's person, and the queen's council and the household being likely to be factious, he said that the whole house of Brunswick was by this attainted, outlawed, excommunicated, and that it would render the prince a mere cipher, a clerk to the officers of state. He made other hyperbolical remarks, to which the house paid no regard. A new point warmly debated was, whether the restoration of the king's health should be determined by the two houses, or his authority should be resumed on the mere declaration of his competence by the queen's counsellors, and some members of the privy-council. The latter mode was recommended with success by Mr. Pitt and Mr. Dundas; while Mr. Marsham and Mr. Powys thought that constitutional maxims required the former. In this discussion, Mr. Burke gave offence by remarking, with feelings (as some of his hearers supposed) of joy and exultation, that the king had been smitten by the hand of the Almighty, hurled from the throne, and reduced to the condition of the meanest peasant.

The month of December elapsed in these contests, and the year 1789 commenced under the most gloomy presages. Mutual asperity and reproach embittered every debate. No appearances of convalescence or recovery, so ardently anticipated by the nation, had yet manifested themselves in the malady of the king. In addition to the keenest sensations of private distress, as a mother and a wife, the queen saw herself on the point of being placed in the most painful, though indispensably necessary situation; that of being entrusted with the care of the royal person, and of standing in a sort of rivalry and competition to her eldest son. The prince, who aspired to a regency unfettered by any restrictions, betrayed, in his reply to a letter which the first minister addressed to him, and in which the great features of that intended delegation of the royal power were delineated, his warm resentment and dissatisfaction at many of those restrictions. He concluded, however, by reluctantly and coldly consenting to receive it, curtailed and degraded as it might be by ministerial or parliamentary distrust.

A second examination of the physicians who had attended his majesty, during the course of his disorder, which took place before a committee of the house of commons, and which was certainly not conducted, on the part of opposition, with either delicacy or judgment, tended to throw very little light on the great object of public enquiry; the probable duration and period of this affecting malady. Mr. Pitt constantly and warmly maintained the probability of its happy termination; and regarding it as neither distant nor hopeless, made the resumption of the royal power by the sovereign with facility and celerity, as soon as he should be enabled to wield the sceptre, the first and leading principle of all his measures and propositions.

The adherents of the prince of Wales saw the prospect of his father's recovery through a very different medium, and conceived it not only improbable, but to be hourly augmenting in that improbability. They were sustained in this opinion by Warren, as the minister was confirmed in his opposite sentiments by Willis; two physicians, on whose contradictory prognostics and apprehensions each party implicitly relied. The former, at the summit of his profession, and unquestionably possessed of great medical skill, was yet accused by the public voice of leaning in his inclination towards the party of the prince. The latter, brought from a distant province, to attend the sovereign under his severe disorder, and having been peculiarly conversant in that species of disease, boldly and early asserted, that he entertained scarcely any doubts of the king's perfect re-establishment at no remote period. The event fully justified his prediction.

Meanwhile, the introduction of the propositions, upon which the regency bill was meant to be founded, and the restrictions intended to be imposed upon the power of the future regent, which were brought forward by the first minister in the house of commons, carried the rage and virulence of party to the utmost height. The negation of the power of creating peers; the nomination of a council to assist the queen; and the complete reservation of the royal household; were all arraigned and condemned in the warmest terms by Mr. Fox, as dictated only by ambition, and not arising from state necessity, or even from regard to the situation of the monarch. The history of France, under the unhappy reign of Charles VI., was cited as bearing a manifest resemblance to the present disastrous period; and a queen, equally venerated and beloved by the nation, was compared to the unnatural Isabella of Bavaria; as her son the dauphin's abandoned and persecuted state, was asserted to be similar to that of the prince of Wales.

Unmoved by these invectives, and sustained by conscious rectitude of intention, the minister steadily pursued his way; nor was he, in this critical and distressing moment, deserted by either house of parliament. The chancellor, Thurlow, who, at the commencement of the king's illness, had been supposed to have listened to proposals for forming a part of a new administration; anxious to evince the falsehood of so unjust an aspersion, and to give the most unequivocal proofs of loyalty and of adherence to his sovereign, under the present circumstances, collected all the energy of his mind, in the various appeals which he successfully made to the honour and patriotism of the house of lords.

In this stage of the public business, at a moment when the king's situation appeared most to exclude hope, and while the house of commons were fully occupied, in framing the principal component parts of the act which was to establish the regency, Mr. Fox withdrew from the scene; and quitting London, retired to Bath. His disordered state of health was assigned as a pretext for this secession, at so extraordinary and critical a juncture; but the public conceived the motives of it to originate in very different causes. Dissension and jealousy had already pervaded the councils of Carlton-house. The distribution of offices, under the approaching regency, had produced alienation among the chiefs. An interior cabinet, different in its views, and opposite in its objects, to the great ostensible leaders of the party attached to the prince of Wales, had set up a separate standard, and formed a distinct interest. Difference of opinion had manifested itself, upon some very delicate and personal points. Cabal and intrigue had penetrated into the closet. His royal highness was generally supposed to have experienced difficulties, if not peremptory refusals of gratifying his wishes, on the part of the duke of Portland; and that, in relation to persons and things, peculiarly near his heart.

These numerous sources of disunion were still, however, in some measure concealed from view by their very nature, and the mutual interest and honour of the parties themselves. The great acts of parliamentary legislation proceeded, and were nearly approaching to their termination. A very short period, probably not exceeding three days, must have completed the bill, which was to declare the incapacity of the sovereign to conduct the national affairs, and to transfer the sceptre, though with diminished influence, to his son. The members of administration were on the point of resigning their charges, and the new ministry, already settled, prepared to enter on office; while the English people, fondly attached, by every sentiment of loyalty and affection, to their monarch, as well as from gratitude and esteem for the first minister, in dejection and silence looked on, and saw the government transferred to others, who, whatever abilities they might collectively possess, certainly neither merited nor enjoyed the general approbation and confidence.

But the term of inter-regnum and misfortune was now arrived; and the impending calamity which had menaced England with all the evils of a regency, far more to be deprecated and dreaded than those from which the country had escaped in 1784, was suddenly and unexpectedly dissipated. The disorder, under which the king had suffered during three months, and of which the violence had hitherto appeared to baffle all medical skill and exertion, gradually but rapidly subsided. Sanity of mind and reason resumed their seat, and left no trace of their temporary subversion. Time confirmed the cure, and restored to his subjects a prince, rendered supremely and peculiarly dear to them by the recent prospect and apprehension of his loss. The vision of a regency faded and disappeared, as the sovereign came forward to public view, and was totally extinguished by the resumption of all the regal functions.

The demonstrations of national joy far exceeded any recorded in the English annals, and were probably more real and unfeigned than ever were offered on similar occasions. It was not only that a king beloved and respected was recovered from the most afflicting of all situations incident to humanity, and enabled to reascend the throne. Sentiments of disapprobation, of general condemnation, affixed to the measures and conduct of the opposite party, heightened the emotions of pleasure, by a comparison with that state from which the kingdom had been so fortunately delivered. No efforts of despotism, or mandates of absolute power, could have produced the illuminations, which the capital exhibited in testimony of its loyalty; and these proofs of attachment were renewed and even augmented, on the occasion of his majesty's first appearance in public, and his solemn procession to St. Paul's, to return thanks to heaven for his recovery. Serenity and tranquillity, so long banished, resumed their place, and soon effaced the recollection of a calamity, not more awful and alarming in its appearance and progress, than speedily and happily extinguished.

Among the most interesting matters which were brought before parliament this session, was the repeal of the corporation and test acts, as far as related to protestant dissenters. The application was made by a motion of Mr. Beaufoy, which Mr. Fox supported with great force of eloquence and argument; resting chiefly on the reasonableness and natural justice of restoring to persons of this description the privileges enjoyed by members of the English church, and a full power, according to their talents, of rendering themselves useful to the state. His reasonings were combated by the premier, on the principles of expediency and civil utility: government, he asserted, had a right to prevent any civil inconvenience which such opinions might produce; without waiting till, by their being carried into action, the inconvenience should actually arise. He considered the established church as a part of the constitution of the country, and the acts in question as justifiable on the principle of self-defence. They had now existed for above a century, and had ever been looked upon as one of the bulwarks of the constitution. He was supported by lord North, and the motion was rejected by a majority of 122 to 102. The same fate attended a bill introduced by earl Stanhope into the house of peers, for relieving members of the church of England from sundry penalties and disabilities, for absenting themselves from service, and other things made punishable by law, and for extending freedom in matters of religion to all persons, papists only excepted. By this bill it was intended, not only to repeal the penal statutes relative to such offences, but to give freedom of discussion, by speaking, writing, and printing, on all religious subjects; a freedom which, it was feared, would be highly prejudicial to the peace and welfare of the community, by loosening the bands of society, and opening a door to licentiousness and civil disorder as well as to irreligion.

Before the close of the session, two bills were passed, which are deserving our notice, as of material importance to the commercial world: one of these was introduced by a motion, which Mr. Fox now repeated, for a repeal of the shop-tax, which proved successful; the minister making no opposition to it. The other was a bill, brought forward by the chancellor of the exchequer, for repealing the existing duties on tobacco, and substituting duties of excise. The odium which had ever attended the excise taxes in England, afforded the friends of the manufacturers, who petitioned against the measure, strong grounds for opposition, of which they availed themselves. But the great addition which it promised to the revenue, without any additional burden to the community, was a circumstance that outweighed the objections made to it, and gave the plan the approbation of a great majority in both houses.

Such were the principal transactions of this session, which was not closed till the beginning of the month of August. In the mean time, Mr. Grenville had been appointed secretary of state, in the room of lord Sidney, and Mr. Henry Addington was raised to the vacant chair of the speaker. He was elected, in opposition to sir Gilbert Elliot, by a majority of 215 to 142 votes; and his subsequent demeanor, in the discharge of all the duties of his office, did honour to the patronage of his friends, and to the judgment of the house of commons.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

GEORGE III.

[1789.]

An historical Sketch (continued) of the Rise and infant Progress of the French Revolution; including Anecdotes of the principal Individuals connected with that important Event, and developing the Causes by which it was occasioned and matured—Affairs of the Netherlands and of Turkey.

The attention of Europe, which had been so powerfully attracted towards England, during the continuance of the severe indisposition of George III., was now to be directed to another object, scarcely less productive of change, and pregnant with the most important consequences. France, so long inured to servitude, and only tracing the existence of her liberties in the page of forgotten historians or antiquaries; whose fetters, originally imposed by Richlieu, and strengthened by Mazarin, had been rivetted by the lapse of nearly two centuries, by the proud tyranny of Lewis XIV., and by the profligate despotism of his successor: France, stimulated by the writings of genius and philosophy, which, in defiance of arbitrary power, have illuminated and dignified the present age, aspired to freedom. The weakness of the sovereign; the incapacity or timidity of his ministers; the exhausted state of the treasury and finances; the unexampled and pertinacious opposition of the parliament of Paris, to register or sanction the royal edicts for the imposition of new taxes; the failure of the harvests, and consequent augmentation in the price of bread; all these concurring circumstances contributed to produce and accelerate a revolution.

The various parliaments of the kingdom, in terms of energy and firmness, to which they had been long disused, clamorously demanded the immediate convocation of the states-general, as the only constitutional or adequate remedy to the distempers of the state. They adhered to this requisition, not only in defiance of the displeasure of the crown, which was manifested by the banishment of the parliament of Paris to Troyes, in Champagne, but in opposition to their own essential interests, and even eventual existence. The nobility, attached by so many ties to the sovereign, and the natural supporters of his prerogative, irritated at the attempt made by Calonne, and persisted in by the archbishop of Toulouse, to deprive them of their exemption from the projected land-tax, or impot territorial, joined the courts of judicature in their refusal to register the measures proposed, and forsook their hereditary maxims of policy, to adopt the popular party. The irresolute conduct of the first minister, under these delicate and trying circumstances, invigorated and emboldened the enemies of government; and the spirit of remonstrance, complaint, and menace, disseminated with industry, became daily more general and alarming.

The archbishop, after many inefficient and unsuccessful plans for the re-establishment of the finances, and some ill-conceived exertions of severity and power against his opponents, felt himself unequal to combat the gathering storm of national indignation; and, retiring from a situation of danger and eminence, abandoned his master to the mercy of events. He even quitted France, and passed the Alps into Italy; as Calonne, under similar expressions of general resentment, had done in the preceding year; when, finding the royal protection withdrawn, and already impeached by the parliament of Paris, he retreated first into Holland, and thence crossed the sea to England. In this perplexed situation, Lewis XVI., compelled to dismiss one minister, and forsaken by the other; surrounded with embarrassments, and having only a choice of evils; conscious that the very foundations of his throne and monarchy were crumbling under his feet; endowed with no talents or great qualities, which might enable him to sustain his own dignity, coerce his subjects, or restore order and energy in the public affairs; alarmed and terrified at the demonstrations of discontent which appeared in the capital and the provinces; under the pressure of these various considerations and apprehensions, he embraced the resolution of meeting the wishes of the nation, and of laying the distresses of the crown before the representatives of the people.

1789. Necker, who had conducted the finances during the prosecution of the late war with England, and who had attained a very unmerited degree of popularity since his dismission from office, was reinstated in his employment of comptroller-general. The avowed enemy of Calonne, whom he accused of peculation and malversation, he appeared to the public in various controversial writings, defamatory of that minister, and tending to criminate him, as a defaulter, in the eyes of France and of Europe. The famous Compte rendu au Roi, in 1781, in which he laid open to his own sovereign, and to all mankind, the expenditure, revenue, and resources of his country, may be regarded not only as an unprecedented disclosure of the hitherto sacred and unrevealed arcana of the French monarchy; but as having operated much beyond the immediate and ostensible pretext of his own justification, by awakening and directing the reflections of every class of men, towards the profuse distribution of the public treasure.

Simple in his exterior, and decent in his manners, Necker attained the fame of disinterestedness and probity. Equally republican in birth and in principles, he flattered by these circumstances the prevailing spirit and genius of the times. Avowedly odious to the party of the queen, and of the count d'Artois, he could hardly be supposed to possess the real confidence or attachment of the king, who had only been driven, by his own distress, and the current of popular favour, to have recourse to his assistance and services. Deficient in all the essential qualities of a great minister, and ignorant of those enlarged principles of taxation and revenue, which were alone competent to the extrication of so vast a monarchy as France, he supplied these defects by little arts and narrow projects, adapted to the exigencies of the day. In the canton of Bern, his talents might have entitled him to respect, and they would have been in their proper sphere. An able arithmetician, but a feeble statesman, he only appeared in the first station of finance, to evince how inadequate were his abilities to that dangerous elevation; and, after vainly attempting to sustain an ill-founded reputation, he at length retired to oblivion, unlamented, and almost unnoticed by that nation, among whom he was so lately idolized.

Although the recal and nomination of Necker appeared to give general satisfaction, and awakened the hopes of his numerous and sanguine admirers, yet these symptoms of approbation gradually subsided. The temporary effect of his name, in raising the public credit, produced no permanent or beneficial consequence. Languor and debility characterised every operation of finance; and government became less competent to resist the encroachments of the people, in proportion as its embarrassments multiplied. The Parisians, rendered clamorous by the high price of grain, and attributing this scarcity more to the arts of monopoly, than even to the indirect interference of the court, in permitting the exportation of corn, than to any deficiency in the productions of the earth, proceeded to acts of violence bordering on insurrection. The introduction of a body of military forces into the capital, repelled, not without a considerable effusion of blood, these first symptoms of revolt, and restored a degree of tranquillity and submission.

NOTWITHSTANDING this apparent check to the spirit of popular innovation, every circumstance tended to evince that the numerous subjects of complaint, on the side of the people, could not be extinguished by any expedient short of unconditional submission on the part of the crown; or of an appeal to the sword, if the former measure should be thought too degrading for a prince born in the purple, and accustomed to regard his power as unlimited and irresistible. The naked and unprotected majesty of the throne, no longer environed, as under Lewis XIV., by a splendid household, and the pomp of royalty, formed a very inefficient barrier against a nation, enthusiastic in their demands of a constitution, and who seemed to be determined to seize the favourable moment, for curtailing the odious prerogative, of issuing letters de cachet, and of raising supplies by arbitrary mandate. The levities and profusion of the queen; the haughty tone which was assumed by the count d'Artois on several occasions; and the supposed subservience of the king to his wife and brother, increased the frenzy for reformation, and added to the general effervescence. Yielding with ungracious reluctance to these manifestations of the approaching storm, the king consented to adopt the humiliating and unwelcome advice, offered by his minister, of convoking the states-general at Versailles; but, at the same time, stimulated to resistance by his own feelings, as well as by the exhortations of those who were continually near his person, he began to prepare for extremities, and to assemble forces.

THE duke of Orleans, who at an early period of the present troubles had been ordered to retire to his seat at Reinsy, on account of the active part which he had taken in opposition to government, had obtained from the lenity or indulgence of the court, permission to revisit Paris. Less sensible of this act of favour, than irritated by the act of severity which preceded it, he determined on revenge, and embraced with ardour the popular cause. His high quality, and near alliance to the sovereign; his immense revenues; his central situation at the Palais Royal, in the heart of the metropolis; his numerous connexions and extensive influence; this combination of circumstances enabled him to become a very dangerous and formidable opponent to the crown, in its present fallen and debilitated state. He probably did not apprehend the extremities, to which his own intrigues might conduct a tumultuous assembly; or he might fallaciously conceive, that he would always be able to direct its operations, and to superintend its movements. It is even possible, as his enemies assert, that the flattering prospect of the regency, which always opened itself to his ambition, as neither a remote nor improbable event, conduced to determine his line of action, and to prevent him from seeing the precipices, with which such a pursuit was surrounded. He was elected a member of the states general, for Crepy in Valois, and took his seat in the assembly.

THIS extraordinary convocation of all the orders in the kingdom, which had not been summoned since the regency of Mary of Medicis, and whose very existence seemed to have been annihilated by three long reigns of arbitrary power, was opened, with the utmost solemnity, by Lewis XVI., assisted by the princes of the blood, and accompanied by all the external splendor becoming so august a ceremony. Many sources of internal discord and confusion, almost inevitable from the competition, and opposite pretensions or interest, of the nobility, clergy, and third estate; the facility of introducing corruption among so vast and mixed a body of men; above all, the loyalty and adherence naturally to be expected from the two first classes of the state; these inherent vices in their formation inspired the court with a confidence, that no unanimity or vigorous exertion would ever characterize so heterogeneous a mass. The first proceedings of the assembly justified these expectations. Much time elapsed in disputes, arising from the incompatibility of the respective demands of the different orders; and though these were at last happily terminated, by the nobility and clergy renouncing, or acquiescing in the claims of the delegates of the people, yet the sovereign still possessed great resources, and various means of protracting or averting any act, militating virtually against his prerogatives.

Had Lewis XVI. been left to the impulse and direction of his own character, it is probable that he would have continued to yield to the encroachments of the democratical spirit, which had already produced so many involuntary concessions, on the part of the crown; and which, increasing in vigour as it proceeded, avowedly aimed at giving birth to a free constitution, and a limited monarchy. He wanted, however, the energy, elevation, and courage, requisite to sustain him in a struggle against his people, and to enable him to repress their attempts at emancipation. But in the queen and the count d'Artois, resentment at the inroads of a nation, whom they had long regarded as only formed for servitude, and the habitual exercise of arbitrary power, warmly impelled to every exertion for its preservation, while it dictated the most decided measures for repressing and chastising a mutinous and discontented capital.

They united their efforts to sustain the irresolution of the king, and succeeded. It was determined, in the cabinet of Versailles, to adopt the most vigorous principles; to dissolve the national assembly, to dismiss the comptroller-general, and to punish the insolence of the metropolis. Prudence and address were, however, requisite to mature these counsels, and to facilitate their execution. A great body of forces, principally consisting of the Swiss and German regiments in the service of France, was gradually collected from different provinces. The mareschal de Broglio, an officer of high military reputation, and of known attachment to the crown, was named to the supreme command. Every preparation for maintaining the royal authority, if necessary, by the most spirited and severe acts of punishment, was made, without even the affectation of disguise or concealment. The capital, incapable of resistance, and unconscious even of its own capacities of defence; destitute of leaders, of arms, and of troops, waited patiently the chastisement which impended.

Paris, involved in circumstances even more distressful than those in which it stood when invested by Henry III. in 1589, and under an equal necessity of submitting to the conditions which an incensed monarch might have dictated, was snatched from pillage by a revolution, not less sudden and unexpected than that which, two centuries preceding, had deprived Henry III. of his life. The frantic and sanguinary zeal of a monk effected this deliverance in one instance; in the other, the Parisians were indebted to the timidity, delays, and want of decision in the court. During the first days of July, the metropolis, though turbulent and riotous, made no exertions to oppose the army, by which it was encircled and surrounded. The partisans and supporters of the royal power were numerous, and ready to evince their zeal and loyalty. The prevot des marchands, who is the first principal magistrate, was in the interests of the crown. The Bastile awed one part of the capital, as the Hotel des Invalides did the other. Paris, taken in the toils of arbitrary power, might have been disarmed and deprived of the means to excite future commotion. The imprudence, pusillanimity, and impatience of the court, rendered these advantages of no avail, and precipitated the unfortunate prince upon measures, which terminated in irremediable disgrace and ruin.

Mistaking or neglecting the most obvious principles of policy and wise precaution, which dictated to commence the plan of operations by subjecting Paris, whence alone any danger was to be apprehended, the king was induced to dismiss Necker with expressions of indignation, which were accompanied by menaces and insult on the part of his brother, the count d'Artois. This step, which evinced a total change of resolutions, and which, from the popularity of the minister, was likely to produce a violent fermentation in every order of men, was followed by others equally injudicious. The states-general were driven into the Salle des Etats, where they held their meetings, by detachments of the guards; who surrounded them, and who waited only the orders of the court, to proceed to greater extremities against the obnoxious representatives of the nation.

Had these manifestations of vigour been only sustained, by instantly attacking and entering Paris, it is not to be doubted, that, unprepared as it still was, and unwilling to expose to the licence of an incensed soldiery the lives and properties of its citizens, the capital would have been without difficulty reduced to obedience. But an ill-timed and fatal delay, equally injurious with the preceding precipitation, gave the inhabitants time to recover from their first emotions of surprise and apprehension. They saw the timidity and imbecility of the government, who, having sounded the charge, dared not advance to the attack. They profited by this want of exertion; and passing from one extreme rapidly to another, they almost unanimously took up arms against their rulers and oppressors. Joined by the French guards, who, from a long residence in the capital, had been peculiarly exposed to seduction, and who at this decisive moment abandoned their sovereign, the Parisians broke through every obstacle by which they had hitherto been restrained. The supplies of arms and ammunition, which had been provided for their subjugation, were turned against the crown; and the Hotel des Invalides, the great repository of military stores, after a faint resistance, surrendered.

The prince de Lambesc, who alone, of all the officers commanding the royal troops in the vicinity of Paris, attempted to carry into execution the plan for disarming the capital, was repulsed in a premature and injudicious attack which he made, at the head of his dragoons, near the entrance of the garden of the Thuilleries. Already the prevot des marchands, Monsieur de Flasselles, convicted of entertaining a correspondence with the court, and detected in sending private intelligence to de Launay, governor of the Bastile, had been seized by the people, and had fallen the first victim to the general indignation. His head, borne on a lance, exhibited an alarming example of the danger, to which adherence to the sovereign must expose the individual, in time of anarchy and insurrection.

1789. The Bastile alone remained; and while it continued in the power of the crown, Paris could not be regarded as free, or even as secure from the severest chastisement. It was invested (July the 14th) by a mixed multitude, composed of citizens and soldiers who had joined the popular banner. De Launay, who commanded in the castle, by an act of perfidy, unjustifiable in any circumstances, and which rendered his fate less regretted, rather accelerated than delayed the capture of this important fortress. He displayed a flag of truce, and demanded a parley; but abusing the confidence which these signals inspired, he discharged a heavy fire from the cannon and musquetry of the place, upon the besiegers, and made a considerable carnage. Far from intimidating, he only augmented, by so treacherous a breach of faith, the rage of an incensed populace. They renewed their exertions, with a valour raised to frenzy, and were crowned with success. The Bastile, that awful engine of despotism, whose name alone diffused terror, and which, for many ages, had been sacred to silence and despair, was entered by the victorious assailants. De Launay, seized and dragged to the Place de Greve, was instantly despatched, and his head carried in triumph through the streets of Paris.

Few captives, either of inferior or of eminent rank, were found in the apartments of the Bastile. The count de Lorges, at a very advanced period of life, discovered in one of the dungeons of the Tour de la Berlandiere, was liberated, and exhibited to the public curiosity in the Palais Royal. His squalid appearance, his beard, which descended to his waist, and, above all, his imbecility, resulting probably from the effect of an imprisonment of thirty-two years, were objects highly calculated to operate upon the senses and passions of every beholder. It is indeed impossible, however we may lament or condemn the ferocious spirit which has characterized and disgraced the French revolution, not to participate in the exultation, which a capital and a country, so highly illuminated, and so long oppressed, must have experienced at the extinction of this detestable and justly-dreaded prison of state. Nor does the rapidity with which it was captured excite less admiration, when its powers of resistance are considered, and the speedy relief which might have been afforded to it, by the numerous bodies of regular forces, with which Paris was surrounded on every side.

With the Bastile expired the royal authority and consideration. The despotism of the French princes, which long prescription, submission, and military strength seemed to render equally sacred and unassailable; which neither the calamities at the close of Lewis XIV.'s reign, the profligacy and enormities of the succeeding regency, nor the state of degradation into which the monarchy sunk under Lewis XV., had ever shaken; that power, which appeared to derive its support almost as much from the loyalty and veneration, as from the dread and terrors of the subject, fell prostrate in the dust, and never betrayed any symptom of returning life.

Paris, liberated from all restraint, or even wholesome police, appeared to riot in the intoxication of freedom; and stained its acquisition by scenes of violence and blood, unworthy of the first capital in Europe. Every trace of obedience disappeared; and even the promoters of the late insurrection were not secure from the capricious fury of a frantic and savage populace, who filled the Place de Greve with clamours, and frequently tore the victim, whom their indignation had selected, from the hands of justice.

But at Versailles, consternation and alarm filled the court, on the arrival of this extraordinary intelligence. Yielding at once to the united impulse of his terrors and his natural inclinations, the king, without even preserving the forms of majesty, however fallen, repaired to the national assembly rather as a suppliant than a monarch. Disordered in his dress, and unaccompanied by his guards or usual attendants, he betrayed his agitation in the speech which he addressed to the states. Only two days preceding this melancholy exhibition of degraded dignity, he had replied to a remonstrance which they presented to him, in terms of determination mixed with menace. He now adopted the language of distress, invoked their assistance, disowned his intention to employ force for the subjection of the capital, assured them that he had already sent orders to withdraw the troops which had invested Paris and Versailles, and professed his desire to give the most unequivocal proof of his deference to the wishes of his subjects. He concluded by imploring them to make known these his paternal dispositions, to the inhabitants of the distracted metropolis.

The assembly, which trembled a few hours before for its own safety, and had expected to be offered up as victims to the vengeance of an irritated sovereign, replied with expressions of loyalty and affection to these gracious declarations, though evidently extorted by fear. It was, however, far otherwise at Paris; where the populace, deeming their triumph incomplete while the king remained tranquil in his palace, not only exacted his personal and immediate presence among them, to sanction their outrages on his authority, but accompanied this demand with menaces, if refused, of setting fire to Versailles, and at once extinguishing the obnoxious princes of the house of Bourbon in the flames. A monarch endowed with qualities such as Lewis XIV. possessed, would perhaps have refused compliance with this humiliating requisition; and while his army was yet entire, and the royal dignity not totally degraded, have embraced the generous resolution of meeting the storm, of trying the fortune of war, and at least devolving to his successor the prerogatives which, as his successor, he pre-received and exercised. But Lewis XVI. possessed no abilities competent to so magnanimous and unequal a struggle. He had already abandoned his attempt to maintain the royal power in its original vigour; and he had now scarcely any option between the loss of his throne, and a complete submission to the arbitrary pleasure of a populace, thirsting for blood, inflamed by success, and daily offering up victims to its revenge.

Under these melancholy circumstances, he did not hesitate to yield obedience to the mandate, which it was no longer safe to refuse. After such a night as Charles I. may be supposed to have passed, previous to his attending the scaffold, but unaccompanied by that serenity and fortitude, which eminently distinguished the English monarch in the last act of his life, he set out for Paris. Conscious, however, of the perils attendant on his appearance in the metropolis of his dominions, and doubtful of escaping from the rage of the multitude, to whom he was to be presented he prepared for death, as at least a possible event. He received the sacrament, made some private dispositions of his affairs, and gave various orders in consequence. Though desirous to see and embrace his son and daughter before his departure, he had yet firmness sufficient to refuse himself this indulgence, fearing it might affect him too deeply, and disqualify him for the part which he was to perform. J'en aurai plus de plaisir, said he, si je reviens. A gentleman who was near his person on this occasion encouraging him, and venturing to answer for his safety, the king replied, Henry Quatre valoit mieux qui moi; et cependant on l'assassiné.

Though he quitted Versailles at an early hour, it was late before he entered Paris, from the delay occasioned by the immense multitudes, who assembled to see him pass, and who testified no sentiments of loyalty in their acclamations. When arrived at the Place de Greve, and conducted to the Hotel de Ville, the new mayor, M. Bailli, who had been elected to supply the late unfortunate first magistrate, insulted the fallen prince by a mock surrender of the keys of his capital; which he accompanied with a sarcastic and insolent reflection, on the different situation in which Henry IV. stood, when he received a similar testimony of its submission and allegiance. The cries of the people, who insisted that the king should shew himself on the balcony; compelled him to give this last proof of his deference to their wishes; and to add to the condescension, he accepted from the hands of the mayor the national cockade, which he first carried to his lips, and then placed in his hat. After having been detained and exhibited as a captive to his own subjects, during the greater part of the day, without sustenance or refreshment of any kind, he was at length permitted to return to Versailles, and conceal his emotions in the privacy of his own apartments.

While this humiliating scene was acted before the eyes of all France, which were turned towards so unusual and attractive a sight, the adherents to the late measures, terrified at the menaces thrown out against them, and dreading the most fatal consequences of popular fury, profited of the king's absence and visit to his capital, to effect their own escape.

The count d'Artois, regarding himself as peculiarly marked out for proscription and impeachment, and apprehensive that even his proximity of blood to the sovereign might prove an insufficient protection to his life, fled among the first, carrying with him his sons, the dukes d'Angouleme and de Berri; two youths, who were successively presumptive heirs to the crown, in case of the demise of the dauphin. In the hurry of a precipitate retreat, it was found extremely difficult to furnish a few hundred louis d'ors to a prince, for whose expensive gratifications, only some days before, the treasures of the monarchy were insufficient. He took the road to Flanders; and was already far advanced towards the frontiers, before his departure was known or suspected at Paris.

When so distinguished a personage, and one so nearly allied to the throne, deemed himself no longer safe, even in the royal residence; it cannot excite wonder, that those of a less elevated condition, and who were equally obnoxious to an enraged populace, should consult their safety by instant flight. The principal roads were covered with illustrious fugitives, under every possible disguise and concealment. The prince of Condé quitted Chantilly, followed by his son and grandson, the dukes of Bourbon and Enghien. The prince of Conti, the last in succession of the blood-royal, after undergoing many extremities of hunger and fatigue, arrived at Luxembourg; to which place likewise the mareschal de Broglio, abandoning his army, repaired without delay.

The duchess of Polignac, so long unrivalled in the affections of the queen, and round whom all the pleasures of the court of Versailles were used to assemble, tearing herself from this scene of dissipation, attained with difficulty the town of Basle in Switzerland; after having encountered numerous dangers, and been preserved from the last degree of violence, when she passed through Sens, by the happy presence of mind, which distinguished an abbé by whom she was accompanied. At Basle, by one of those singular accidents which evince the power of fortune, she found in the inn, at which she alighted, the late minister, Necker, who, having passed through Swabia after his dismission, on his way to Geneva, here first received from his enemies the intelligence of the revolution. The baron de Bretenil, pursued by the most marked detestation of his countrymen, evaded, as well as the prince de Lambese, the snares prepared to intercept them; the former reaching Bern in safety, as the latter did Turin. Monsieur de Besenval, less fortunate, was seized at Brie Comte Robert; and even the solicitations of Necker himself, who endeavoured to interpose in his behalf, were insufficient to obtain his enlargement.

In this general consternation, the queen, abandoned by all her dearest connexions, remained with her two children, friendless, and almost alone in the palace of Versailles. No prince of the royal family ventured to abide the storm, except the count de Provence, who, during the continuance of all these disorders, had enjoyed a distinguished share of, at least, negative approbation; and whose conduct, throughout the critical circumstance which preceded the sedition of Paris, had been such as to conciliate, in some degree, the popular favour.

The duke of Orleans, to whose intrigues or opposition to the crown may be greatly ascribed the rapid progress of the general discontent, and the excesses of the people, viewed from the Palais Royal, with secret pleasure, the effects of his machinations, and enjoyed his triumph over the vanquished court. The military command of the national troops, and of the capital, was conferred by almost unanimous delegation on the marquis de la Fayette; as the supreme civil and municipal jurisdiction devolved on Bailli, mayor of Paris. The union of both these powers was, however, frequently found unequal to imposing proper restraints on the ungoverned passions and savage violence of a populace, new to freedom, and who stained its acquisition by daily acts of vengeance and cruelty. The heads of Foulon and Berthier, one of whom had occupied a high situation in the late ministry, and the other had been intendant of Paris, were carried through the streets; and the circumstances with which the death of these eminent persons was accompanied, are only to be compared, in horror and atrocity, with those attendant on the massacre of St. Bartholomew, or the assassination of the mareschal d'Ancre, under Lewis XIII.

Meanwhile, at the instigation and request of the national assembly, Necker was recalled and invited, by letters of the most flattering, and even penitential tenor, from the king himself, to resume the superintendance of the finances. He yielded, though with apparent reluctance, to these entreaties, and repaired to court, loaded with expressions of general attachment and veneration, in every place through which he passed; while the credulous and deluded multitude expected from his presence a speedy redress of all their grievances, the revival of public credit, and a remedy to the scarcity of grain, which had excited the clamours of the capital and the kingdom. To the admiration and astonishment of mankind, in an absolute monarchy, so strongly cemented as that of France appeared to have been, and in which loyalty was antiently esteemed to be characteristic of every class of citizens, no efforts were made to support the royal power. An enthusiastic passion for liberty pervaded all the provinces; and the revolution commenced on the banks of the Seine, spread with equal rapidity and unanimity to the foot of the Alps and Pyrenees, to the Rhine and the Mediterranean.

No permanent calm succeeded to this storm of popular indignation. Elated with the possession of freedom, and exercising, in many instances, a tyranny more oppressive and severe than that from which they had just escaped, the people meditated new and greater invasions upon the dignity, as well as upon the prerogatives of the crown. The press, freed even from that wholesome and necessary restriction, which governments the most relaxed impose upon the publication of opinions, compensated for the fetters which it had so long worn, by giving birth to every species of licentious production, and insolent attack upon persons of the highest rank. The queen was peculiarly the object of these libellous invectives; and every accusation, private or political, which malignity could invent, to alienate the affections, and irritate the passions of mankind against her, was circulated and publicly exposed to sale.

Although all the pomp and majesty, which in better times had surrounded and concealed the sovereign, was now entirely withdrawn; though only guarded by the burgesses of Versailles, and destitute of any military protection against insult and outrage, Lewis XVI. stood exposed to every enterprise, which a mutinous capital might undertake to execute; yet some vestiges of personal liberty he still retained. He was free to enjoy the diversion of the chace; and the national assembly, convoked at Versailles, continued to hold its meetings there, under his immediate superintendance and inspection. It was even thought decent and necessary, on the part of the new tribunes of the people, to march some regiments, in the month of September, on whose adherence they conceived that they could safely rely, to perform the ordinary functions of state; at the same time that they prevented any escape, if such was intended by the king.

But where so many inflammable materials were collected, it was not possible that any considerable time could elapse, before they burst into a conflagration. After one or two attempts, which the vigilance and activity of la Fayette prevented from being carried into execution, the populace of Paris, excited by various arts, and incensed at the queen for having brought the dauphin, and presented him to the officers of the regular troops after a public entertainment, rose as by universal consent, and determined to march to Versailles. By what motives, or with what intentions, the conductors of this armed mob were actuated, it is perhaps impossible positively to assert. The deepest and blackest designs have, by popular malignity, been attributed to the duke of Orleans; no less than the attainment of the regency, at whatever price, and by every mode, however treasonable and flagitious. Many of the circumstances which distinguished that extraordinary scene, unquestionably evince a plan not more artful than nefarious; and which seemed calculated, by operating on the fears of the sovereign, to induce him to abandon the throne and seek his safety in flight; while the queen, who was more an object of national obloquy and aversion, might be instantly offered up as a victim to the frantic multitude.

Oct. 6. 1789. It is difficult to do justice to the horrors of a night, similar only to those which are furnished by the annals of Charles IX., and which remind us of the times of Catherine of Medicis. Posterity will scarcely credit that, at the conclusion of the eighteenth century, and in a country eminently distinguished by all the softer virtues of humanity, acts of blood and ferocity, more savage than the janizaries of Constantinople usually exercise against their despots, were performed with impunity. The singularity and incredibility of the recital will be augmented by recollecting, that many of the most violent among these ruffians were women, or, at least, habited in a female dress. Armed with every destructive weapon, they assaulted the guards who were stationed at the door of the queen's apartments, burst into them, murdered those who opposed their progress, and penetrated to the chamber in which she slept. The efforts which were made to retard their fury, and the cries of Sauvez la Reine, which echoed through the palace, gave her an instant in which to escape. The first queen in Europe was saved from a death the most ignominious, by the interval of almost a single moment. Undressed and nearly naked, she gained a private staircase which conveyed her to the king, who received her in his arms, where she fell senseless with terror. The materials of the bed from which she had just risen, after undergoing the strictest search in hopes of discovering the unhappy object of their pursuit, were scattered over the room, as some gratification to their disappointed vengeance.

Lewis XVI. himself, appearing on the balcony of his apartment, in the language and attitude of supplication, vainly implored the populace to spare his guards, whom he saw massacred at his feet; without the power of extending to them any relief. He as vainly besought the queen to yield to the necessity of the time, and to retire to Rambouilliet, where her person would at least be secure. Exerting a courage superior to her sex, and elevated above a sense of the danger to which she was so conspicuously exposed, she firmly persisted in her refusal to fly; and declared her determination to accompany the king, and at least to expire as she had lived, a queen of France. Yet, conscious of the probability of her falling a sacrifice to the popular rage, she armed herself with a poinard, as a last resource against the degradation of plebeian violence and brutality.

It is impossible, how much soever we may condemn certain parts of her conduct and character, not to admire the heroism and magnanimity of this deportment, in which we seem to recognise the blood of so many emperors, from whom she was descended. The weakness of the woman was, notwithstanding, mingled with the fortitude of the sovereign; and when she entered the coach, which was to convey herself and the captive king from Versailles to Paris, terrified at the cries of a furious multitude, who seemed to demand her forfeit life, she threw herself into the arms of la Fayette, who offered her his hand at the door of the carriage, and whose protection she invoked, to preserve her from outrage and death. Placing the dauphin in her lap, and seated by her husband, the cavalcade moved slowly towards the capital, while the heads of murdered gardes du corps, borne on poles, and held up to her view, presented a melancholy prospect of her own probable destiny.

They at length reached the palace of the Thuilleries, thus accompanied, and took possession of that part of it destined for their reception and residence; while cannon, mounted at the principal avenues, under pretence of safety and defence, secured them from rescue, and rendered escape impracticable.

Perhaps no day so ignominious to the royal dignity had been beheld, since the elevation of the Capetian princes to the throne of France. The capture and imprisonment of Lewis IX. at Damietta, of king John at Poictiers, and of Francis I. at the battle of Pavia, however unfortunate and humiliating, yet were at least softened by many considerations. Those monarchs were all taken in arms, after exerting the most heroic acts of valour against their conquerors, and owed their misfortune only to the chance of war. Even Henry III., when he fled from his capital, pursued by the Guises, yet retained his personal independence, and soon returned to besiege and to chastise his rebellious subjects. Lewis XVI. sunk below esteem or commiseration, and not having exerted either ability or courage in the defence of his invaded prerogatives, only held a precarious life, at the mercy of a seditious and insolent populace, who, having already imprisoned, might, in any moment of resentment, terminate the reign of their fallen and degraded king. The palace in which he was confined, having been in a great measure neglected for more than a century, during which time Paris had rarely seen any sovereign resident in the metropolis, was totally unfit for the reception of a court; and even the apartments which were occupied by the king himself, were in so ruinous or decayed a condition, as not altogether to exclude the inclemency of the weather. To this situation was a monarch reduced, who, only a few months before, might be regarded as at the summit of human greatness; and the foundations of whose throne, strengthened by a long possession and by habits of obedience, seemed to bid defiance to all the ordinary convulsions which overturn empires, and destroy the firmest fabrics of human power and wisdom.

The late event, which is a memorable epoch in the revolution, was ascribed to the machinations of two factions, having different views in effecting it. The republicans, whose design was, either to abolish monarchy, or to render the sovereign a mere insignificant pageant, were desirous of the king's removal to Paris, that they might have him completely in their power. The duke of Orleans' cabal, whose grand object it was to invest that prince with sovereign power, wished to preserve the monarchy entire; and these hoped to open a way to the execution of their plot by filling the king's mind with terrors, and frightening him out of the kingdom.—The democrats succeeded. A vote was passed, "that the national assembly was inseparable from the king." And that they might give every possible security to their own persons, when surrounded by the Parisian mob, strong resolutions were passed respecting their inviolability. The president, Mounier, one of the most disinterested patriots in the assembly, then, foreseeing that from that moment the assembly must lose its independency, and become the instrument of a tumultuous populace, actuated by a desperate faction, and that the liberty for which he had been struggling would be sacrificed to democratic tyranny, immediately seceded, and was accompanied by Tolendal and other partisans of free monarchy.

The two factions had hitherto co-operated, from their common desire to subvert the present system. Their peculiar views now became obvious to each other; and they were seen divided by rivalship of power. The republicans, having the populace devoted to them, and having no farther occasion for the duke of Orleans' purse, were desirous to free themselves of a prince, whose views clashed with their own. La Fayette had supplanted Mirabeau in his popularity; but, notwithstanding, he had an ascendant with the Parisians, and was the idol worshipped by them for the moment, yet he rejoiced to be the agent in destroying the duke's power, which involved in it a partial destruction of that of his cabal, and especially of his rival, Mirabeau. Instantly availing himself of his present favourable circumstances, therefore, he insolently told the duke, "that his name was made the pretext for disturbances, the signal of all the disorders; and that he must leave the kingdom." Philip, who was as pusillanimous as he was base, being furnished with an ostensible mission for England, immediately repaired to that country. Mirabeau, despising a prince who had the villany of an usurper without courage to usurp, and who thus tamely deserted his own cause, when the schemes which he had planned for him were ripe for execution, expressed his contempt in very pointed language; telling him, that "he was not deserving that trouble which he had taken for his sake." The ambitious leader, then despairing of ever governing the state, as the minister of that flagitious and despicable prince, made overtures to the court, that he might be introduced into the administration. But the republican party, fearing the effects of his intrigues, voted a resolution, that "no member of the national assembly should accept a place in the ministry." Finding himself foiled in his attempt by this self-denying ordinance, he, as his last resource, once more devoted himself to the people.

Such was the state of parties after the removal of the national assembly to Paris, an attention to which is essential to a proper understanding of the subsequent events. The assembly signalised the re-commencement of their proceedings by several very important measures. Having provided for their own security, they now attended to that of the public, by a decree to authorise magistrates to require military aid in case of riots. This was occasioned by the summary and outrageous execution of a baker by the mob, under a false charge of being a monopolizer of bread. At this time, lettres de cachet were abolished; the parliaments were suspended from their functions; the remains of aristocratic power were annihilated by destroying all distinction of orders; and a new bank was established under the auspices of the assembly, by the name of caisse d'extraordinaire, for the purpose of reviving public credit, and restoring trade. Moreover, that they might establish an entire new system of things, a fresh division of the kingdom was ordered, into eighty-three departments, to be subdivided into districts and cantons, each having its assembly for the purpose of administrative government; and into electoral assemblies of the departments, and primary assemblies of the cantons, for that of electing representatives of the people in the national assembly. But the most memorable measure of this period, was the decree by which the clergy and monasteries were despoiled of their estates, estimated at 150,000,000 livres; which were decreed to be national property. Of this revenue, it was resolved that 80,000,000 livres should be appropriated to public uses; pensions were settled on the clergy, which were not to be less than 8200 livres, or about £60 a year, besides the glebe. These arrangements, which were not completed till the ensuing year, occasioned warm debates; and notwithstanding the measure was strongly recommended by the expediency of it, particularly as affording a property, on the security of which the state was enabled to issue its assignats, yet the opposition made by the partisans of the ecclesiastics, called forth the eloquence of Mirabeau and the strenuous revolutionists to bear it down. Nor was the resistance of it confined to the assembly. Commotions took place in different provinces, when this decree was known; which was thought an act of extreme ingratitude, as well as injustice, towards the clergy, who had recently given the nobles an example of willingness to join the tiers etat in one chamber, and to unite with them in their plans of reform. There have been ages, when such a violation of the property of the church, and the rights of corporate bodies, would have brought on a religious war; but in the present, temporal considerations were seen to preponderate against the interests of the church and reverence for the priesthood.

Among the memorable events of this year must be noticed the death of the dauphin, who was kindly taken by fate from the miseries which befel the other branches of his family, at the age of eight years, a few days before the king's removal to Paris.

From the disorders of France I pass to those of the Netherlands. The emperor, being of a restless impatient disposition, and fond of any innovations which tended to gratify his arbitrary spirit, had made such regulations in the government of those provinces, as infringed the privileges of the nobles, the clergy, and the people. Their remonstrances and their opposition were disregarded; and he insisted on their full submission to his will. The severities exercised by his order drove many from the country; the emigrants were protected by the Dutch, encouraged by the court of Berlin, and not unfavoured by Great Britain; an insurrection followed, in which the opposers of the court were so successful as to intimidate the emperor, who endeavoured to disarm them by conciliatory proposals.

His offers were treated with contempt; the insurgents dislodged his troops from Brussels; and the greater part of the Netherlands renounced his authority.

Dec. 20.

Great Britain and her allies, from a desire of preventing the aggrandisement of the Russian empress, laboured to draw off her Danish auxiliaries; and she at length waved the demand of their aid, on condition that the interposing states should observe a strict neutrality in the affairs of the north. But though no longer opposed by the Danes, the Swedes were very unfortunate in this campaign. The porte, which subsidied Gustavus, likewise suffered considerably from the valour and perseverance of its enemies.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

GEORGE III.

[1790, 1791.]

Disturbances in France—Celebration of the Anniversary of the Bastile—Conduct of France towards Foreign States—Affairs in Germany and the Netherlands—Dispute respecting Nootka Sound—Motion for a repeal of the Test Act—Transactions in India—Conduct of Russia and Prussia—The Second Session of Parliament—Debates on the Measures adopted against Russia, the Canadian Bill, &c.—Quarrel between Messrs. Burke and Fox on the Subject of the French Revolution—Philanthropic Establishment at Sierra Leone.

The French were, perhaps, of all European nations, except the Turks, the least capable of profiting by a revolution. Of warm and impetuous dispositions, they were ready to rush into violent changes. Having little patience, and less judgment, they did not give a fair trial to their innovations, or reflect with coolness on the nature of their capricious schemes. Instead of a deliberate correction of abuses, and a gradual reform, they blindly and precipitately destroyed old establishments, rooted up the wheat with the tares, and annulled at once both good and bad institutions. By absurd and inconsistent regulations, they weakened the effect of those parts of the new government which were unquestionable, and introduced such confusion, as paved the way for the appeal of artful men to the passions of the rabble, and for the rise of arbitrary power in an altered form.

The labours of the convention were not accompanied with national tranquillity. Commotions arose in various parts of the country; rapacity and malice occasioned the destruction of many of the seats of the nobility, and 67 mansions were burnt to the ground within the narrow compass between the Maconnois and Beaugolois. On a charge of combining with the king against the cause of liberty, the marquis de Favras, the count de Puysegur, marshal Broglio, and others, were tried by the judges of the Chatelet; and if the first of these had not been condemned and executed, the ferocious rabble would doubtless have hanged him a la lanterne.

These commotions deeply affected Lewis. Influenced by his accustomed timidity, he repaired to the hall of the assembly, and addressed the members in a long speech, in which he took a review of the state of affairs, feelingly lamented the distractions of the realm, hoped that effectual reform and improvement might be prosecuted without further confusion or disturbance, and made many important concessions to the views of his democratical enemies. In return for this complaisance, a new oath was adopted, importing that every representative would be faithful to the nation, the law, and the king, and would maintain the constitution to the utmost of his power. These demonstrations were succeeded by applausive addresses from the different municipalities. By the oratorical plausibility of Necker, the means of supplying the deficiency of the revenue were magnified; and the king, at the request of the assembly, agreed to establish the civil list on a basis, which might combine œconomy of expence with the reputability of his throne. But while the royal dignity was thus maintained, the annulment of titles, and the extinction of the hereditary nobility, moved by Lambal, and carried in the assembly by a large majority, contributed to undo these beneficial regulations.

As the anniversary of the revolution, which was reckoned from the destruction of the Bastile, approached, great preparations were made for the celebration of a national confederation, or constitutional league. A spacious amphitheatre was erected in the Champ de Mars, mass was solemnly performed, and, when the king had taken an oath of fidelity to the constitution, the assembly, the delegates who had been invited from the provinces, the regular troops, the militia, and the spectators, bound themselves by a similar sanction.

1790. After an interval of comparative tranquillity, new disturbances arose, which were chiefly imputable to the arts of a democratic society, notorious for the profligacy, villany, and cruelty of the members, of whom it was ultimately composed. It was the offspring of a club, instituted in the year 1789, by the Breton deputies; and as its place of meeting was the hall of an edifice lately occupied by Jacobin monks, this designation was assumed by the society. Societies under a similar denomination, corresponding with that of Paris, were established in the provinces, and became the grand focus of every seditious intrigue. The soldier and the seaman, the tradesman and the mechanic, were seduced from their allegiance; and the members of the liberal professions were courted to assist in the great work of reforming and perfecting political institutions.

The garrison of Nanci mutinied against the officers, extorted, on pretence of a lawful claim, considerable sums of money, and seized the chests of the regiments. Complaint was made of these proceedings to the assembly, and orders were given for the enforcement of a new decree against military treason or rebellion. On the approach of the marquis de Bouillé, with a small army, the officers were liberated, the garrison seemed ready to leave the town, and an accommodation was confidently expected. The imprudence of two bodies of Swiss rendered these expectations fallacious; but M. Bouillé was finally successful, and reinstated the municipality, which had lost its authority during the mutiny. The scarcity of bread excited the discontent of the inhabitants of Angers, and a body of workmen fired ineffectually on the soldiers. The troops returned the fire, and killed 61 persons. The departure of Necker immediately succeeded this event. The moderation of his principles had deprived him of the good opinion of the Jacobin council, and finding his situation as dangerous as it was unpleasing, he relinquished all concern in the administration, and retired to his native country. An insurrection at Brest hastened the retreat of the naval minister, M. de Luzerne, who was succeeded by Fleurieu; M. Lambert regulated the finances, and then gave way to M. de Lauzert. After these charges, a decree was proposed, commanding the clergy, who had exhibited many indications of resentment at the injustice and privations to which they had been subjected, to take the new oath without delay, upon pain of losing their stipends, and being subjected to further penalties. The king, with his usual irresolution, first refused, and then vouchsafed his sanction; and it was declined by a great majority of the clerical body sitting in the assembly. Two months were allowed for re-consideration, and the decree was then enforced by the appointment of constitutional bishops and priests.

Our attention is now called to the conduct of the French government towards foreign nations. We at this time find it addressing a manifesto to other states, in which they declared, that the French nation, proud of having regained the rights of nature, would never outrage them in other men. That they would present to the world the new spectacle of a nation, truly free, submissive to the laws of justice amid the storms of war, and respecting every where, and on every occasion, towards all men, the rights which are the same to all. "Peace," said they, "which imposture, intrigue, and treason have banished, will never cease to be the object of our wishes." Those persons who are led by a consciousness of integrity in themselves to rely on the faith of a great nation, could not but congratulate themselves on the arrival of this harbinger of peace, and the prospect of those happy days, when other nations would be induced, by the example of France, to adopt these pacific principles; and when, of course, the world would exhibit an universal scene of justice, benevolence, and tranquillity. Fortunately those who, from their stations in society, were most interested in knowing the maxims of this state, knew that expediency, and a regard to the peculiar interests of the existing government, were the standard of their conduct. This was so clearly manifested in their contemporary transactions, that the delusion could take place only among such as did not attend to them. The national assembly, we have seen, had violated the laws of justice, stripping the church of the greater part of its revenues, without even making the present proprietors, who had given up the profit they might have derived from other pursuits, an adequate compensation. That they might give them a further proof of their sincerity in the paternal embrace, with which they had been received by the tiers etat, when they needed their support, they now passed a decree, that such of them as should neglect to take the oath to the nation, the law, and the king, enjoined by a former decree, should be deemed virtually ejected from their benefices. This oath was intended to free the existing government of the danger it apprehended from the intrigues of the clergy, who were disaffected to it, and may, therefore, be justified on the principle of expediency. But if we consider, that the decree called on them virtually to retract the oath of allegiance which they had taken to the old government; and that they conceived this could not be conscientiously done, and that the greater part of them had discovered no seditious disposition, it cannot but be deemed an act of injustice and oppression. The only compensation to the suffering clergy was the opportunity afforded them of shewing their integrity; and a more eminent example of virtue was, perhaps, never exhibited. For, of 131 bishops, three only chose to sacrifice their principles to their temporal interests.

ANOTHER example of the maxims by which the French government regulated its conduct, and the arbitrary manner in which it determined points relative to foreign as well as domestic policy, was the affair between it and the pope respecting the comtat of Avignon. This country, which had been the property of the counts of Provence, was given to the see of Rome, in the fourteenth century, by the heiress of it, Joanna, queen of Naples, and countess of Provence. This year a powerful party in the comtat and the Vendissin, which also belonged to the ecclesiastical state, revolted against the papal government, and desired to be incorporated in the state of France. A contest ensued between them and the pope's partisans, which was attended with some bloodshed. And the result was that, after some deliberations in the assembly, it was resolved, that the territory of Avignon, and the county of Venaissin, should henceforth be considered as a part of the French dominions, and that a compensation should be offered to his holiness. In consequence of this agreement, a body of troops was sent to support the French partisans, and to take possession of the city and territories.

THAT the national assembly did not carry their professed submission to the laws of justice, to every branch of the human race, was seen in another transaction which occurred at this time. In the autumn of 1789, the ministry had received the alarming intelligence of a violent contest in the island of St. Domingo, between the mulattoes and the planters, supported by the white inhabitants, occasioned by a petition from the former to the assembly of the island, that they might be admitted to the common rights of citizens. This privilege was not granted them; on the contrary, they were insulted and abused for their presumption in asking it. A representation of what had passed was laid before the national assembly this year. But instead of conferring on the mulattoes the rights which they had declared to be due to all mankind, and which they had themselves asserted by the subversion of the antient monarchy, they thought it expedient to temporise, and passed a decree which pleased neither party, and left a source of discord and enmity among them, which soon after broke out in a tremendous civil war.

Among the occurrences of this year, the appearance of an extraordinary character, bearing the name of Anacharsis Clootz, before the national assembly, deserves to be noticed, as it shews, though in a trifling incident, the effect of those sentiments, which the French government were endeavouring to impress on the minds of men. This man, who was a malcontent Prussian, introduced himself to the assembly at the head of a motley tribe, who called themselves the virtual ambassadors of all those enslaved nations who wished to be free, and were therefore disposed to enter into fraternity with France, for the glorious purpose of establishing liberty throughout the world. What the origin of this farce was, whether created in the brain of the enthusiast himself, or suggested to him by persons who had some political purposes to answer, does not appear to have been known. The ambassadors were seen in too ridiculous a light to claim any further notice from the assembly, than what the bombast harangue of their chief demanded. But it was immediately followed by a decree for a removal of those figures of chained slaves, intended to represent prostrate and conquered nations, surrounding the statue of Lewis XIV, in the Place de Victoires.

In the Netherlands, faction and animosity attended the revolt of the provinces from the Austrian yoke. The nobles were too selfish and ambitious to unite cordially with the clerical body, or to consult the general welfare of their country. The clergy, equally aspiring, were anxious to retain the people in that state of subservience, to which they had been long accustomed. The middle class sought an improvement in their condition, in point of political and civil liberty. In this state of affairs the death of Joseph occurred, and the three protestant allied powers, sensible of the difficulty of framing an independent republic from such ill-assorted materials, negotiated, in December, an accommodation with the revolters and Leopold, the new head of the Austrian family, on terms advantageous to the former. Before this event, Frederic-William had formed a confederacy with Selim, who had recently obtained the Ottoman diadem, and menaced the Austrians with the vigour of his arms, should they persist in harassing his Turkish friends. Leopold, unwilling to embroil his subjects with the Prussian monarch, consented to the terms of peace adjusted at Reichenbach, under the mediation and guarantee of Great Britain and Holland. He engaged to restore all the fortresses, towns, and districts, which he had obtained during the war, and to settle all his disputes with the Turks, without any regard to his alliance with Russia. While the empress thus lost a friend, she freed herself from the hostilities of a prince, who had repeatedly filled her capital with alarm. She obtained, at the same time, a separate pacification from the king of Sweden, who defied the indignation of the Turkish potentate, in concert with whom he was bound to treat; and disregarded the remonstrances of the kings of Great Britain and Prussia, whom, since they declaimed against him, as the betrayer of the cause in which he had taken arms, he accused in return, of having dishonourably neglected his interests. 1790.

While many of the European states were rent by civil dissension, oppressed by despotism, or burdened or distressed by wars, for which they were indebted to the ambition of their sovereigns, Great Britain now enjoyed the fair fruits of liberty and peace. Notwithstanding the late war had left the kingdom burdened with an enormous debt, yet, such had been the rapid improvement made in agriculture, such the advancement of manufactures and trade, in consequence of the commercial arrangements with the American colonies, and the late treaty with France, that industry received its due reward, and the nation wore an aspect of affluence and prosperity. The customs, at the same time, had received such an increase from the extension of trade, that the minister was enabled, in his statement of revenue and expenditure, to communicate the satisfactory intelligence, that the duties had exceeded those of the preceding year, in the sum of half a million sterling; that the exports of the last year amounted to £18,513,000, surpassing, by three millions, the average of six years before the American war. The affairs of India also, which may now be considered as intimately connected with those of the state, in a political as well as a commercial view, were in so prosperous a condition under the wise, just, and humane administration of the earl of Cornwallis, that, according to Mr. Dundas's annual statement of the revenue of Bengal, it had exceeded the charges by a sum of £2,136,711, which excess was £178,000 above the estimate of the last year.

In the mean time, the important revolutions which were taking place in France, where the old government was completely thrown from its base, and not a wreck of the former feudal system was suffered to remain, that might remind the people of its existence, could not but be viewed with anxiety by this and other neighbouring nations.

The contrast of sentiment on the subject of this momentous revolution, was manifested on the meeting of parliament, in the speeches of several members of the lower house. In a debate on the army-estimates, Mr. Burke contrasted the prosperity and security enjoyed in this country with the fallen and disordered state of France; and painted, in glowing colours, the disastrous consequences of the revolution. "In the last age," said he, "we were in danger of being entangled, by the example of France, in the net of a relentless despotism; a despotism indeed proudly arrayed in manners, gallantry, splendor, magnificence, and even covered over with the imposing robes of science and literature. Our present danger, from the example of a people whose character knows no medium, is, with regard to government, a danger from licentious violence; a danger of being led, from admiration, to imitate the excesses of an unbridled, plundering, ferocious, bloody, and tyrannical democracy, of a people whose government is anarchy, and whose religion is atheism." Mr. Fox and Mr. Sheridan agreed with Mr. Burke in deploring the miseries of France, and execrating the acts of barbarous outrage perpetrated in that country; but these they imputed to the old despotic government, and not to the efforts with which the people had violently relieved themselves from it. Mr. Pitt, and other members, expressed their warm approbation of Mr. Burke's sentiments; and the estimates of the army were then voted by the house.

One of the first objects that engaged the attention of parliament was the repeal of the test act. The dissenters, who were much disappointed by the issue of Mr. Beaufoy's motion, encouraged by the smallness of the majority against it, had been indefatigable in their labours to strengthen their party, and were still sanguine in their hopes of success. Their cause was now espoused by an abler patron; Mr. Fox, moving the repeal, recommended the measure, as a means of promoting peace. "Persecution," said he, "is a bond of union; remove the barriers which separate the dissenters from the body of the citizens, and, in their collective capacity, they would be no longer known. Men unite to resist oppression; but cease to oppress, and the union is dissolved." The premier opposed the motion, upon the grounds of the propriety of investing the executive power with a right of judging of the fitness or unfitness of the persons who are to occupy stations. He insisted on the expediency of a church establishment; that toleration, not equality, should be enjoyed by the dissenters. And he enforced his sentiments by adverting to the present conduct of the dissenters; who, at the moment when they were reprobating a test, had discovered an intention of forming associations throughout the country, for the purpose of putting the members of that house to a test, and of resolving to judge of their fitness to fill their seats by their votes on this single question. He was followed by Mr. Burke, who proved the justness of the premier's remarks by citations from the writings of some dissenting divines upon the subject of ecclesiastical establishments, of a tendency dangerous to the constitution. The motion was rejected by a majority of 294 to 105 votes.

A few days after this decision, a matter of great importance was submitted to the consideration of the house, in which our welfare and repute, as well as the national good, were much interested, by a motion made by Mr. Flood, for a more equal representation of the people in parliament. The grounds upon which he went were these; "that as by the general law of the constitution, the majority is to decide for the whole, the representatives of the nation ought to be chosen by a body of constituents, whereof the elective franchise may extend to a majority of the people." To supply the defect of our constitution in this respect, Mr. Flood proposed, "that 100 members should be added, and that they should be chosen by the resident householders in every county." And he supported his motion in an elaborate speech, to demonstrate the necessity of such a measure, for the preservation of that balance, among the constituent parts of the state, which is essential to its welfare. It was opposed by Mr. Windham, as dangerous in the present ferment of the public mind. And the premier, agreeing with him in his sentiments, declared himself still an advocate for reform; but said, were the motion before them the same proposition he had himself formerly offered, he should now vote against it, from a conviction of its actual impropriety; but that, at a more seasonable opportunity, he would certainly again submit his ideas upon the subject to the consideration of the house. Mr. Flood, perceiving the prevalence of the premier's sentiments, thought it advisable to withdraw his motion.

WHILST the government thus carefully avoided whatever might afford the spirit of innovation an opportunity to effect its mischievous purpose, of disturbing the domestic tranquillity of the kingdom, the nation was threatened with an interruption of that external peace, on which it founded its hopes of a continuance and increase of its prosperity, by a dispute with the court of Madrid, upon a subject in itself of small importance. An association of British merchants had, in 1786, opened a trade for furs on the north-west coast of America, the profits of which induced them, two years after, to form a permanent settlement at Nootka Sound. The Spaniards, who claimed the whole of this coast, by virtue of prior discovery, and by the treaty of 1763, which made the Mississippi the boundary of the British dominions, maintained their right by capturing two vessels employed in this trade, in the late year. The Spanish ambassador justified the capture by requiring of the British government, that its subjects should no longer frequent those coasts. This the legislative bodies were now made acquainted with, by a message from his majesty, informing them of the event, of his application to the court of Madrid for satisfaction, of the claims made by Spain to an exclusive right of navigation in those seas, and its hostile preparations. The British government, having received the sanction of parliament, and a vote of credit for one million, prepared to justify the claim which it had made, in a memorial to the Spanish court, and by an immediate armament for the purpose of maintaining it. Happily for his Britannic majesty, he was relieved from the embarrassment into which this ill-advised affair had brought him, by the weakness of his adversary. The catholic king being unprepared for war, the result of these transactions was a convention, signed in the autumn, by which it engaged, that reparation should be made the English merchants; that the coast on the north of the Spanish settlements should be considered free; and that the right of fishing should be secured to England, under certain restrictions.

A FEW days after the delivery of his majesty's message, the parliament was prorogued, and afterwards dissolved.

THE new parliament, which met in the month of November, re-elected Mr. Addington speaker of the house of commons. His majesty had the satisfaction to inform the legislature of the happy termination of the affair with Spain. This was followed by the consideration of ways and means for defraying the expence of the armament, amounting to about three millions sterling. Supplies having been provided for that purpose, the parliament was soon after prorogued.

DURING this political warfare, the miseries of actual hostility prevailed in India. The origin of the war may be thus stated. The rajah of Travancore, having purchased of the Dutch the ports of Cranganour and Jacottah, refused to comply with the demand of the sultan Tippoo, who, alleging that he was the feudal sovereign of that part of the coast, insisted on the renunciation of the agreement. To enforce submission, this prince assaulted the lines of Travancore; but his troops were repelled with loss and disgrace. In the following year he renewed the attack, and dispossessed the rajah of his capital and other parts of his territories.

AFFECTING to foresee the aims of Tippoo, the English had previously sent a body of soldiers to the aid of their ally, the rajah; and they seem to have wished for these hostilities on the part of the sultan, that they might have a pretext for waging war against one who was known to be a determined enemy to the possessors of British India, and had courted an alliance with France for the subversion of their ill-acquired power. War was now declared against Tippoo; and general Medows, invading the country of Combatone, took several forts with ease, while that of Dindigul was reduced with difficulty by one of his detachments. Colonel Floyd was surprised by a considerable part of the sultan's grand army; but he firmly maintained his ground in a sharp engagement. In another conflict with a numerous host, he displayed the superiority of skill and well-disciplined valour, in a small body, over the efforts of desultory courage in a multitude; and ably secured his retreat to Velladi.

Having in vain endeavoured to prevent the junction of general Medows with colonel Maxwell, Tippoo entered the Carnatic, in the hope of diverting his adversaries from the immediate invasion of Mysore. He marked his progress with inhuman ravages, and escaped the pursuit of Medows, who returned in disappointment to Madras.

1791. In the same campaign, the exertions of lieutenant-colonel Hartley retrieved the affairs of the rajah of Travancore. He afterwards defeated a strong body of the Mysoreans, and reduced Trincalour and other forts; while major-general Robert Abercrombie met with success in a battle near Cananour, and gained possession of some important posts. The Mahrattas and the nizam, whose jealousy of Tippoo had led them into an alliance with a power, of which they should have been equally jealous, did not perform, in this stage of the war, any memorable act.

During these transactions abroad, a message was delivered, from his Britannic majesty to both houses of parliament, on the 29th of March 1791, purporting, that his majesty deemed it incumbent upon him to inform them, that the endeavours he had employed to accomplish a reconciliation between Russia and the porte having proved abortive, he had judged it necessary, in order to give weight to his negotiations, to make some fresh additions to his naval force, relying on the zeal and affection of parliament, for defraying such expences as might be incurred by these preparations.

The king of Prussia, who succeeded Frederic the Great, discovered a prudent jealousy of the designs of Catharine; and, by forming an intimate alliance with Poland, as well as by the adoption of other measures, no less political, endeavoured to frustrate her designs of aggrandisement. Great Britain, in concert with Prussia and Holland, offered to mediate a peace in the east of Europe, soon after the surrender of Oczakow, in the year 1788. She prevented Denmark from uniting with Prussia, in order to assist the Swedes, with the avowed resolution of supporting the balance of power in the north. In the summer of 1790, Britain made a fresh treaty with Prussia, of more than defensive alliance, of strict and lasting union, to protect the interest of the contracting parties, as well as the security and tranquillity of Europe. We had now in vain pressed our mediation on Russia a second time; and while she refused to renew any commercial treaty with us, she made one with France, and another with Spain, entering into a quadruple alliance with those two kingdoms, which was obviously pointed against Great Britain. In fine, the empress of Russia assumed a threatening attitude, and frowning aspect; flushed as she was with success, and fortified by treaties of alliance, which naturally produced a counter confederation, and excited a spirit of jealousy, vigilance, and hostile opposition, through a large portion of Europe.

On the meeting of parliament, after the usual forms, an address to his majesty was moved by the minister, who supported the measures recommended with regard to Russia, declaring that we had a very important interest in the war between that power and the Ottoman porte. As defensive alliances were allowed to be both wise and political, and having once entered into these it was our duty to adhere to them; since Prussia was our ally, she ought to be supported, while the progress of the Russians against the porte was truly alarming. Should the power of the Turks be still farther humbled by their haughty and ambitious rival, it would be instantly felt by Prussia, and even by the whole of Europe, of which the political system might be shaken to its very basis.

In the opinion of Mr. Fox, no danger could happen to Prussia from the progress of the Russian arms in the Turkish dominions. The empress offered to cede all her conquests between the Neister and the Danube, wishing to retain those only which lay between the Neister and the Don; while we insisted that
